Georgia
Law Enforcement Handbook

Criminal Law & Procedure

2010-2011
Edition

WEST®

2010-2011 LAW ENFORCEMENT HANDBOOK
QUICK REFERENCE GUIDE

Page

Abandonment of Child 16-5-72 Codes-130
Affray 16-11-32 Codes-221
Aggressive Driving 40-6-397 Codes-802
AIDS, HIV Reckless Conduct 16-5-60 Codes-129
Alcoholic Beverages, Possession by Minor 3-3-23 Codes-4
Arrests 17-4-1 Codes-361
— Breaking open doors 17-4-3 Codes-362
— Family violence 17-4-20.1 Codes-362
— Warrants for arrest 17-4-40 thru 17-4-46 Codes-364
— Without warrant 17-4-20 Codes-362
Arson, First Degree 16-7-60 Codes-159
Assault and Battery 16-5-20 thru 16-5-25 Codes-120
Assembly, Unlawful 16-11-33 Codes-221
Burglary 16-7-1 Codes-151
Campus or School Grounds, Failure to Leave 16-11-35 Codes-222
Concealed Weapons, Carrying 16-11-126 Codes-237
Contributing to Delinquency of Minors 16-12-1 Codes-255
Controlled Substances 16-13-1 thru 16-13-114 Codes-285
Cruelty to Animals 16-12-4 Codes-257
Cruelty to Children 16-5-70 Codes-129
Disorderly Conduct 16-11-39 Codes-224
Drunkenness, Public 16-11-41 Codes-225
DUI 40-6-391 Codes-793
Exclusionary Rule 17-5-1, 17-5-30 Codes-367, Codes-369
Family Violence 19-13-1 Codes-503
Financial Transaction Cards, Illegal Use of 16-9-30 thru 16-9-39 Codes-186
Force, Use of 16-3-21 thru 16-3-24 Codes-115
Forgery and Fraudulent Practices 16-9-1 Codes-182
Gambling 16-12-20 Codes-257
Handguns, Carrying and Possession 16-11-126 thru 16-11-134 Codes-237
Heidi's Law 40-5-64, 40-5-121 Codes-716, Codes-732
40-6-393, 42-8-110, 42-8-111 ..... Codes-800, Codes-872
Hindering Apprehension 16-10-50 Codes-212
HIV, Reckless Conduct 16-5-60 Codes-129
Homicide 16-5-1 thru 16-5-5 Codes-119
Impersonating Officer 16-10-23 Codes-209
Implied Consent 40-5-67.1 Codes-719
Insurance, Proof of 40-6-10 Codes-751
Kidnapping 16-5-40 Codes-125
Liability of Officers 35-1-7 Codes-556
Loitering 16-11-36 Codes-222
Manslaughter 16-5-2, 16-5-3 Codes-120
Masks, Wearing 16-11-38 Codes-224
Minors, Contributing to Delinquency of 16-12-1 Codes-255
Molestation of Child 16-6-4 Codes-137
Motor Vehicles
— Abandoned vehicle 16-11-100 Codes-232
— Fleeing or eluding police officer 40-6-395 Codes-801
— Forfeiture of, operator convicted of pandering 16-6-13.2 Codes-143
— Hijacking 16-5-44.1 Codes-127
— Insurance requirements 40-6-10, 40-9-37 Codes-751, Codes-826

— License suspended or revoked, driving while 40-5-121 Codes-732
— Open container law 40-6-253 Codes-782
— Police, display of blue lights 40-1-7 Codes-601
— Removal by peace officers, negligence 40-11-3 Codes-833
— Stolen vehicles and theft, 40-3-5 Codes-662
— Unlicensed drivers 40-5-20, 40-9-5 Codes-689, Codes-822
Motorcycle Helmet Law 40-6-315 Codes-788
Motorcycle Proof of Insurance 40-6-11 Codes-754
Murder 16-5-1 Codes-119
Obstruction of Public Safety Official 16-10-24 Codes-209
— Giving false name 16-10-25 Codes-210
— Refusal to disperse 16-10-30 Codes-211
Peeping Tom 16-11-61 Codes-226
Possession of Weapon While Committing Crime 16-11-106, Codes-233
16-11-160 ..... Codes-251
Protective Order Registry 19-13-50 thru 19-13-56 Codes-507
Public Drunkenness 16-11-41 Codes-225
Public Order and Safety, Offenses Against 16-11-1 thru 16-11-184 Codes-218
— Affray 16-11-32 Codes-221
— Disorderly conduct 16-11-39 Codes-224
— Loitering 16-11-36 Codes-222
— Terroristic threats 16-11-37 Codes-223
Rape 16-6-1 Codes-135
Robbery 16-8-40 Codes-173
School Ground, Failure to Leave 16-11-35 Codes-222
Searches and Seizures 17-5-1 thru 17-5-54 Codes-367
— Exclusionary rule 17-5-1, 17-5-30 Codes-367, Codes-369
— Execution of 17-5-25 Codes-369
— Use of force 17-5-27 Codes-369
Self-defense 16-3-21 thru 16-3-24 Codes-115
Sex Offenders, Registration of 42-1-12 Codes-855
Sexual Offenses 16-6-1 thru 16-6-24 Codes-135
— Aggravated sexual battery 16-6-22.2 Codes-149
— Enticing child 16-6-5 Codes-138
— Molestation of child 16-6-4 Codes-137
— Prostitution 16-6-9 Codes-141
— Public indecency 16-6-8 Codes-141
— Rape 16-6-1 Codes-135
Shoplifting 16-8-14 Codes-171
Smoking in Public Places 16-12-2 Codes-256
Stalking 16-5-90 thru 16-5-94 Codes-131
Terroristic Threats 16-11-37 Codes-223
Theft 16-8-1 thru 16-8-21 Codes-167
Ticket Scalping 43-4B-25 Codes-878
Traffic Signal Monitoring Devices 40-6-20, Codes-756
40-14-20 thru 40-14-24 ..... Codes-848
Training Reimbursement 35-8-22 Codes-590
Transportation Passenger Safety 16-12-123 Codes-277
Uniforms, Officers Assigned to Traffic Duties 40-1-6 Codes-601
Weapons
— Armed robbery 16-8-41 Codes-174
— Concealed weapons 16-11-126 Codes-237
— Discharge of firearms 16-11-104 Codes-233
— Pointing weapons 16-11-102 Codes-233
— Possession of weapon while committing crime 16-11-106 Codes-233
16-11-160 ..... Codes-251

Georgia Law Enforcement Handbook

Criminal Law & Procedure

2010-2011 Edition

Prepared by The Editorial Staff of the Publisher

WEST®
A Thomson Reuters business

For Customer Assistance Call 1-800-328-4880

Mat #40843697

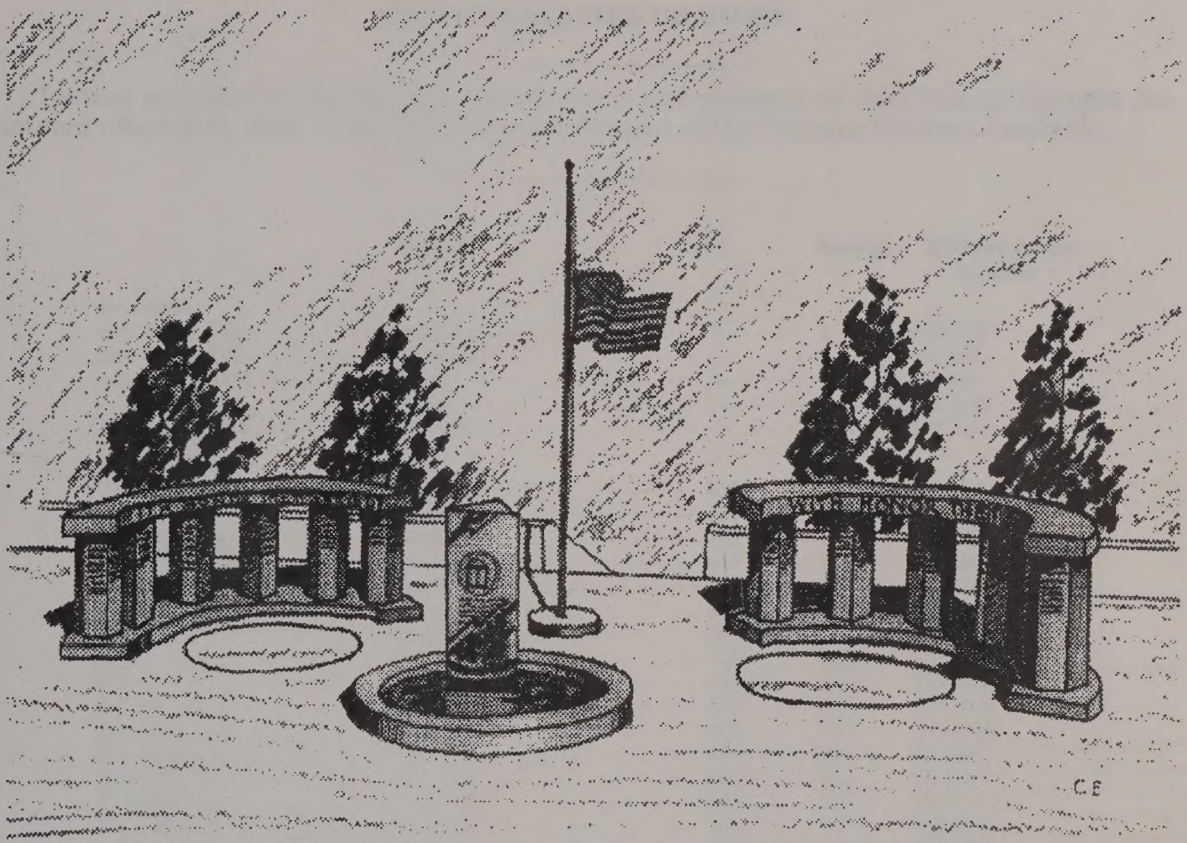
© 2010 Thomson Reuters

This publication was created to provide you with accurate and authoritative information concerning the subject matter covered; however, this publication was not necessarily prepared by persons licensed to practice law in a particular jurisdiction. The publisher is not engaged in rendering legal or other professional advice and this publication is not a substitute for the advice of an attorney. If you require legal or other expert advice, you should seek the services of a competent attorney or other professional.

IMPORTANT NOTICE

The statutes and Constitution are current through the 2010 Regular Session of the Georgia General Assembly.

The statutes are subject to changes provided by the Georgia Code Commission. The Georgia Code Commission is authorized by section 28-9-5 of West's Code of Georgia Annotated to correct the spelling of words; change capitalization for the purpose of uniformity; correct manifest typographical and grammatical errors; substitute the proper Code section number, chapter number, or other number or designation for the terms "this Act," "the preceding Code section," and similar words or phrases; renumber, redesignate, and rearrange chapters, articles, parts, subparts, Code sections, or any combination or portion thereof; change cross-reference numbers to agree with renumbered chapters, Code sections, or portions of the Code; substitute the proper calendar date for "the effective date of this chapter" and other phrases of similar import; strike out figures if they are merely a repetition of written words or vice versa, or substitute figures for written words or vice versa for the purpose of uniformity; correct manifest errors in references to laws; correct inaccurate references to the titles of officers, the names of departments or other agencies of the state, local governments, or the federal government, and the short titles of other laws and make such other name changes as are necessary to be consistent with the laws currently in effect; rearrange definitions in alphabetical order; insert or delete hyphens in words so as to follow correct grammatical usage; change numerals or symbols to words or vice versa for purposes of uniformity and style; change nouns from the singular to the plural or vice versa for purposes of style and grammar; and change punctuation for purposes of uniformity and consistency of style.



THE GEORGIA PUBLIC SAFETY MEMORIAL

"WITH HONOR THEY SERVED"

This publication is dedicated to The State of Georgia's law enforcement officers, firefighters, correction officers and emergency medical technicians and their families for their valor, loyalty and commitment to preserving law and order in Georgia and these United States.

Artistic Rendering courtesy of Celeste Edge, Forsyth, GA

2010 LEGISLATIVE CHANGES

Listing sections of the Georgia Constitution and sections of the Code of Georgia Annotated affected by Acts of the 2010 Regular Session of the Georgia General Assembly.

	Effect	Act	Section	Bill/Resolution Number
Ga Const.
Art. 3, § 6, ¶IV	Amended	—	1	HR 178
Art. 3, § 9, ¶VI	Amended	—	1	SR 277
Art. 7, § 4, ¶XII	Added	—	1	SR 821
	Added	—	1	SR 1231
Art. 11, § 1, ¶IV	Amended	—	1	HR 136
Code Section
2-1-4	Amended	615	10	SB 388
2-1-5	Amended	360	1-1	HB 1055
2-2-8.1	Amended	360	1-2	HB 1055
2-5-8	Amended	615	10	SB 388
2-7-55	Amended	360	1-3	HB 1055
2-7-57	Amended	360	1-4	HB 1055
2-7-66	Repealed	360	1-4.1	HB 1055
	Reserved	360	1-4.1	HR 1055
2-7-71	Amended	360	1-4.2	HB 1055
2-7-99	Amended	360	1-5	HB 1055
2-9-33	Amended	360	1-6	HB 1055
2-9-42.1	Amended	615	10	SB 388
2-10-53	Amended	615	10	SB 388
2-11-25	Amended	615	10	SB 388
2-11-26	Amended	360	1-7	HB 1055
2-12-4	Amended	360	1-8	HB 1055
2-12-8	Amended	360	1-9	HB 1055
2-12-43	Amended	360	1-10	HB 1055
2-12-73	Amended	360	1-11	HB 1055
2-13-6	Amended	360	1-12	HB 1055
2-14-40	Amended	621	2	SB 296
2-14-102	Amended	360	1-13	HB 1055
2-15-12	Amended	615	10	SB 388
2-21-4	Amended	360	1-14	HB 1055
3-2-2	Amended	615	10	SB 388
3-2-10	Amended	621	2	SB 296
4-4-60	Amended	615	10	SB 388
4-4-82	Amended	360	1-15	HB 1055
4-10-5	Amended	360	1-16	HB 1055
4-11-3	Amended	360	1-17	HB 1055
4-11-5.1	Amended	386	1	HB 788
4-11-5.2	Added	556	1	HB 1106
5-6-35	Amended	389	1	HB 571
7-1-43	Amended	621	2	SB 296
7-1-74	Amended	615	10	SB 388
7-1-242	Amended	506	2	SB 131
7-1-243	Amended	624	7	HB 1387
7-1-285	Amended	346	1	HB 926
7-1-437	Amended	624	7	HB 1387
7-1-653	Amended	624	7	HB 1387
7-1-660	Amended	624	7	HB 1387
7-1-669	Amended	624	7	HB 1387
7-1-683	Amended	624	7	HB 1387
7-1-684.1	Amended	624	7	HB 1387

Code Section—continued	Effect	Act	Section	Bill/Resolution Number
7–1–692	Amended	624	7	HB 1387
7–1–700	Amended	624	7	HB 1387
7–1–704	Amended	624	7	HB 1387
7–1–707.2	Amended	624	7	HB 1387
7–1–1001	Amended	624	7	HB 1387
7–1–1002	Amended	624	7	HB 1387
7–1–1003.5	Amended	621	2	SB 296
7–1–1003.7	Amended	624	7	HB 1387
7–1–1004	Amended	624	7	HB 1387
7–1–1009	Amended	624	7	HB 1387
7–1–1011	Amended	360	1-18	HB 1055
7–4–12.1	Amended	624	7	HB 1387
8–2–3	Amended	542	8	SB 370
		634	1	HB 244
8–2–4	Added	461	1	HB 1196
8–2–23	Amended	542	9	SB 370
		634	1	HB 244
8–2–111	Amended	427	1	HB 516
			2	HB 516
8–2–112	Amended	427	3	HB 516
8–2–135	Amended	360	1-19	HB 1055
8–2–135.1	Amended	360	1-20	HB 1055
8–2–161	Amended	360	1-21	HB 1055
		615	10	SB 388
8–2–164	Amended	360	1-22	HB 1055
8–2–170	Added	420	1	SB 384
8–2–171	Added	420	1	SB 384
8–3–30	Amended	445	1	SB 369
8–3–206	Amended	615	10	SB 388
8–3–303	Amended	621	3	SB 296
8–3–304	Amended	621	3	SB 296
8–3–305	Amended	621	2	SB 296
8–3–309	Amended	621	3	SB 296
9–2–8	Added	543	2	SB 138
9–10–91	Amended	611	1	SB 491
9–10–152	Amended	418	9	SB 244
9–11–4	Amended	611	2	SB 491
			3	SB 491
			4	SB 491
9–11–4.1	Added	611	5	SB 491
9–11–133	Amended	624	9	HB 1387
10–1–157	Amended	360	1-23	HB 1055
10–1–159	Amended	360	1-24	HB 1055
10–1–161	Repealed	360	1-25	HB 1055
	Reserved	360	1-25	HR 1055
10–1–187	Amended	615	10	SB 388
10–1–203	Amended	360	1-26	HB 1055
10–1–206	Amended	615	10	SB 388
10–1–392	Amended	372	3	HB 1345
10–1–393	Amended	419	1	SB 368
10–1–393.4	Amended	402	1	SB 237
10–1–393.5	Amended	643	2-1	SB 308
10–1–393.11	Added	372	4	HB 1345
10–1–397	Amended	372	5	HB 1345
		419	2	SB 368
10–1–594	Amended	621	2	SB 296
10–1–622	Amended	645	2	HB 1072
10–1–623	Amended	645	3	HB 1072
10–1–624	Amended	645	4	HB 1072
10–1–627	Amended	645	5	HB 1072
10–1–641	Amended	645	6	HB 1072

Code Section—continued	Effect	Act	Section	Bill/Resolution Number
10–1–651	Amended	645	7	HB 1072
10–1–661	Amended	645	8	HB 1072
10–1–662	Amended	645	9	HB 1072
10–2–42	Amended	360	1-27	HB 1055
10–4–12	Amended	360	1-28	HB 1055
10–4–17	Amended	360	1-29	HB 1055
10–4–31	Amended	615	10	SB 388
10–4–101	Amended	360	1-30	HB 1055
10–4–115	Amended	360	1-31	HB 1055
10–4–142	Amended	360	1-32	HB 1055
10–5–25	Amended	615	10	SB 388
10–5–71	Amended	615	10	SB 388
10–5A–20	Amended	615	10	SB 388
10–6–142	Amended	506	3	SB 131
10–10–7	Amended	615	10	SB 388
10–14–6	Amended	506	4	SB 131
11–1–201	Amended	470	2-1	HB 451
11–2–103	Amended	470	2-2	HB 451
11–2–104	Amended	470	2-3	HB 451
11–2–310	Amended	470	2-4	HB 451
11–2–323	Amended	470	2-5	HB 451
11–2–401	Amended	470	2-6	HB 451
11–2–503	Amended	470	2-7	HB 451
11–2–505	Amended	470	2-8	HB 451
11–2–506	Amended	470	2-9	HB 451
11–2–509	Amended	470	2-10	HB 451
11–2–605	Amended	470	2-11	HB 451
11–2–705	Amended	470	2-12	HB 451
11–2A–103	Amended	470	2-13	HB 451
11–2A–514	Amended	470	2-14	HB 451
11–2A–526	Amended	470	2-15	HB 451
11–4–104	Amended	470	2-16	HB 451
11–4–210	Amended	470	2-17	HB 451
11–7–101	Amended	470	1-1	HB 451
11–7–102	Amended	470	1-1	HB 451
11–7–103	Amended	470	1-1	HB 451
11–7–104	Amended	470	1-1	HB 451
11–7–105	Amended	470	1-1	HB 451
11–7–106	Added	470	1-1	HB 451
11–7–201	Amended	470	1-1	HB 451
11–7–202	Amended	470	1-1	HB 451
11–7–203	Amended	470	1-1	HB 451
11–7–204	Amended	470	1-1	HB 451
11–7–205	Amended	470	1-1	HB 451
11–7–206	Amended	470	1-1	HB 451
11–7–207	Amended	470	1-1	HB 451
11–7–208	Amended	470	1-1	HB 451
11–7–209	Amended	470	1-1	HB 451
11–7–210	Amended	470	1-1	HB 451
11–7–301	Amended	470	1-1	HB 451
11–7–302	Amended	470	1-1	HB 451
11–7–303	Amended	470	1-1	HB 451
11–7–304	Amended	470	1-1	HB 451
11–7–305	Amended	470	1-1	HB 451
11–7–306	Amended	470	1-1	HB 451
11–7–307	Amended	470	1-1	HB 451
11–7–308	Amended	470	1-1	HB 451
11–7–309	Amended	470	1-1	HB 451
11–7–401	Amended	470	1-1	HB 451
11–7–402	Amended	470	1-1	HB 451
11–7–403	Amended	470	1-1	HB 451

Code Section—continued	Effect	Act	Section	Bill/Resolution Number
11-7-404	Amended	470	1-1	HB 451
11-7-501	Amended	470	1-1	HB 451
11-7-502	Amended	470	1-1	HB 451
11-7-503	Amended	470	1-1	HB 451
11-7-504	Amended	470	1-1	HB 451
11-7-505	Amended	470	1-1	HB 451
11-7-506	Amended	470	1-1	HB 451
11-7 507	Amended	470	1-1	HB 451
11-7-508	Amended	470	1-1	HB 451
11-7-509	Amended	470	1-1	HB 451
11-7-601	Amended	470	1-1	HB 451
11-7 602	Amended	470	1-1	HB 451
11-7-603	Amended	470	1-1	HB 451
11-8 103	Amended	470	2-18	HB 451
11-8-602	Repealed	506	5	SB 131
11-9-102	Amended	470	2-19	HB 451
11-9-203	Amended	470	2-20	HB 451
11-9-207	Amended	470	2-21	HB 451
11-9-208	Amended	470	2-22	HB 451
11-9-301	Amended	470	2-23	HB 451
11-9 310	Amended	470	2-24	HB 451
11-9-312	Amended	470	2-25	HB 451
11-9-313	Amended	470	2-26	HB 451
11-9-314	Amended	470	2-27	HB 451
11-9-317	Amended	470	2-28	HB 451
11-9 338	Amended	470	2-29	HB 451
11-9-406	Amended	506	6	SB 131
11-9-408	Amended	506	7	SB 131
11-9-526	Amended	615	10	SB 388
12-2 3	Amended	615	11	SB 388
12-2-4	Amended	615	11	SB 388
12-2 6	Amended	369	1	HB 1199
12-3-10	Amended	643	2-2	SB 308
12-3 34	Amended	373	1	SB 99
12-3-53	Amended	615	11	SB 388
12-3-93	Amended	615	10	SB 388
12-3-241	Amended	621	2	SB 296
12-3-522.1	Added	431	2	SB 523
12-3-550	Amended	431	3	SB 523
12-3-551	Amended	431	3	SB 523
12-3-552	Amended	431	3	SB 523
12-3-553	Amended	431	3	SB 523
12-3 554	Amended	431	3	SB 523
12-3-562	Amended	431	1	SB 523
12-3-562.1	Added	431	1	SB 523
12-3 580	Repealed	547	1	SB 449
12-3-581	Repealed	547	1	SB 449
12-3-582	Repealed	547	1	SB 449
12-3-583	Repealed	547	1	SB 449
12-3-584	Repealed	547	1	SB 449
12-3-585	Repealed	547	1	SB 449
12-3-586	Repealed	547	1	SB 449
12-3-587	Repealed	547	1	SB 449
12-3-588	Repealed	547	1	SB 449
12-3-589	Repealed	547	1	SB 449
12-3-590	Repealed	547	1	SB 449
12-3-591	Repealed	547	1	SB 449
12-3-592	Repealed	547	1	SB 449
12-3-651	Amended	378	1	HB 1090
12-3-662	Added	378	2	HB 1090
12 4-1	Amended	615	10	SB 388

Code Section—continued	Effect	Act	Section	Bill/Resolution Number
12–4–73	Amended	615	10	SB 388
12–4–101	Amended	621	2	SB 296
12–5–1	Amended	615	10	SB 388
12–5–4	Added	542	2	SB 370
12–5–4.1	Added	542	3	SB 370
12–5–7	Amended	542	4	SB 370
12–5–9	Added	364	1	HB 169
12–5–31	Amended	542	5	SB 370
12–5–38.1	Amended	634	1	HB 244
12–5–105	Amended	542	6	SB 370
12–5–122	Amended	411	1	HB 1206
12–5–125	Amended	411	2	HB 1206
12–5–134	Amended	411	3	HB 1206
12–5–135	Amended	624	12	HB 1387
12–5–180.1	Amended	542	7	SB 370
12–5–200	Added	397	2	SB 380
12–5–201	Added	397	2	SB 380
12–5–202	Added	397	2	SB 380
12–5–203	Added	397	2	SB 380
12–5–204	Added	397	2	SB 380
12–5–211	Amended	615	10	SB 388
12–5–471	Amended	634	1	HB 244
12–5–482	Amended	621	3	SB 296
12–5–524	Amended	634	1	HB 244
12–5–542	Amended	634	1	HB 244
12–5–580	Amended	634	1	HB 244
12–5–582	Amended	615	10	SB 388
12–5–583	Amended	615	10	SB 388
12–5–584	Amended	615	10	SB 388
12–6–5	Amended	615	10	SB 388
12–6–93	Amended	360	1-33	HB 1055
12–6A–2	Amended	634	1	HB 244
		668	1	SB 402
12–7–6	Amended	481	1	HB 1359
12–8–23.1	Amended	634	1	HB 244
12–8–24	Amended	407	1	HB 1059
12–8–31	Amended	634	1	HB 244
12–8–62	Amended	488	4	SB 78
		612	1	SB 490
12–8–92	Amended	488	5	SB 78
		612	2	SB 490
12–8–97	Amended	615	10	SB 388
12–8–102	Amended	624	12	HB 1387
12–8–104	Amended	488	1	SB 78
12–8–104.1	Added	488	2	SB 78
12–8–107	Amended	488	3	SB 78
12–8–108	Amended	488	3	SB 78
		624	12	HB 1387
12–11–4	Amended	428	1	HB 493
12–11–5	Amended	428	2	HB 493
12–11–7	Amended	428	2A	HB 493
12–11–8	Amended	428	3	HB 493
13–1–11	Amended	624	13	HB 1387
13–2–2	Amended	624	13	HB 1387
13–10–3	Added	421	1	SB 447
13–10–90	Amended	421	2	SB 447
13–10–91	Amended	421	2.A	SB 447
14–2–122	Amended	360	1-34	HB 1055
14–2–1109	Amended	506	8	SB 131
14–2–1110	Amended	506	9	SB 131
14–2–1408	Amended	621	2	SB 296

Code Section—continued	Effect	Act	Section	Bill/Resolution Number
14–2–1433	Amended	621	2	SB 296
14–2–1440	Amended	621	2	SB 296
14–3–1108	Amended	506	10	SB 131
14–3–1409	Amended	621	2	SB 296
14–3–1409.1	Amended	624	14	HB 1387
14–3–1433	Amended	621	2	SB 296
14–3–1440	Amended	621	2	SB 296
14–9–1101	Amended	360	1-35	HB 1055
14–10–4	Amended	360	1-36	HB 1055
14–11–1101	Amended	360	1-37	HB 1055
15–2–43	Amended	621	2	SB 296
15–5–21	Amended	624	15	HB 1387
15–5–24	Amended	615	10	SB 388
15–6–77	Amended	360	1-38	HB 1055
15–6–77.3	Amended	506	11	SB 131
15–9–30.8	Added	365	2-1	HB 207
15–9–60	Amended	360	1-39	HB 1055
		643	2-3	SB 308
15–9–127	Amended	506	12	SB 131
15–10–80	Amended	360	1-40	HB 1055
15–10–81	Amended	360	1-41	HB 1055
15–10–82	Amended	360	1-42	HB 1055
15–11–19	Amended	615	10	SB 388
15–11–30.3	Amended	674	1	HB 1104
15–11–40.1	Added	674	2	HB 1104
15–11–55	Amended	418	10	SB 244
15–11–58	Amended	469	1	HB 1085
			2	HB 1085
			3	HB 1085
15–11–63	Amended	465	1	SB 299
		674	3	HB 1104
			4	HB 1104
15–11–64.2	Amended	403	1	HB 567
15–11–66	Amended	674	5	HB 1104
15–11–78	Amended	403	2	HB 567
15–11–84	Amended	624	15	HB 1387
15–11–103	Amended	418	11	SB 244
15–11–154	Amended	624	15	HB 1387
15–11–155	Amended	403	3	HB 567
15–12–68	Amended	620	1	SB 313
15–16–21	Amended	360	1-43	HB 1055
15–21–74	Amended	621	2	SB 296
15–21–147	Amended	464	1	HB 1310
		621	3	SB 296
15–21–148	Amended	621	3	SB 296
15–21–180	Amended	621	2	SB 296
15–21–181	Amended	621	2	SB 296
15–21A–6	Amended	360	1-43.1	HB 1055
15–21A–6.1	Added	360	1-44	HB 1055
15–21A–6.2	Added	360	1-44	HB 1055
15–21A–7	Amended	624	15	HB 1387
16–5–21	Amended	646	1	HB 1002
16–6–5.1	Amended	389	2	HB 571
16–6–22	Amended	389	3	HB 571
16–7–2	Added	674	6	HB 1104
16–7–29	Amended	389	4	HB 571
16–8–104	Amended	678	1	SB 371
16–9–121	Amended	501	1	HB 1016
16–9–128	Amended	501	2	HB 1016
16–9–151	Amended	422	1	SB 470
16–9–154	Amended	422	2	SB 470

Code Section—continued	Effect	Act	Section	Bill/Resolution Number
16–10–4	Amended	680	24	SB 17
16–10–5	Amended	680	25	SB 17
16–10–6	Amended	405	1	HB 1007
16–10–51	Amended	643	2-4	SB 308
16–10–97	Amended	646	2	HB 1002
16–11–34.1	Amended	643	2-5	SB 308
16–11–37	Amended	646	3	HB 1002
16–11–37.1	Amended	646	4	HB 1002
16–11–101.1	Amended	643	2-6	SB 308
16–11–125.1	Added	643	1-1	SB 308
16–11–126	Amended	643	1-2	SB 308
16–11–127	Amended	643	1-3	SB 308
16–11–127.1	Amended	465	2	SB 299
		643	1-4	SB 308
16–11–127.2	Amended	643	1-5	SB 308
16–11–128	Amended	643	1-6	SB 308
16–11–129	Amended	643	1-7	SB 308
16–11–130	Amended	643	2-7	SB 308
16–11–132	Amended	643	1-8	SB 308
16–11–135	Amended	643	1-9	SB 308
16–12–1	Amended	674	7	HB 1104
16–12–120	Amended	624	16	HB 1387
16–12–123	Amended	643	2-8	SB 308
16–12–127	Amended	643	2-9	SB 308
16–13–25	Amended	433	1	HB 1309
		619	1	SB 353
16–13–26	Amended	619	2	SB 353
16–13–28	Amended	619	3	SB 353
16–13–29	Amended	619	4	SB 353
16–13–71	Amended	619	5	SB 353
			6	SB 353
			7	SB 353
		629	1	HB 1021
16–13–72	Amended	629	2	HB 1021
16–14–3	Amended	674	8	HB 1104
16–15–2	Amended	406	1	HB 1015
16–15–3	Amended	406	2	HB 1015
16–15–4	Amended	406	3	HB 1015
16–15–7	Amended	406	4	HB 1015
16–15–9	Amended	406	5	HB 1015
16–15–10	Amended	406	6	HB 1015
16–15–11	Added	406	7	HB 1015
17–4–40	Amended	423	1	HB 199
17–5–51	Amended	643	2-10	SB 308
17–6–1	Amended	404	1	HB 889
		406	8	HB 1015
			9	HB 1015
17–6–12	Amended	404	2	HB 889
17–7–23	Amended	643	2-11	SB 308
17–7–130	Amended	418	12	SB 244
17–8–30	Amended	418	13	SB 244
17–10–1	Amended	406	10	HB 1015
17–10–1.2	Amended	403	4	HB 567
17–10–7	Amended	498	1	HB 901
17–10–11	Amended	674	9	HB 1104
17–10–35.1	Amended	452	1	HB 323
17–10–37	Amended	452	2	HB 323
17–12–6	Amended	615	10	SB 388
17–12–22	Amended	404	2A	HB 889
17–14–3	Amended	403	5	HB 567
17–17–1	Amended	403	6	HB 567

Code Section—continued	Effect	Act	Section	Bill/Resolution Number
17–17–3	Amended	403	7	HB 567
17–17–5	Amended	403	8	HB 567
17–17–5.1	Added	403	9	HB 567
17–17–8	Amended	403	10	HB 567
17–17–8.1	Added	403	11	HB 567
17–17–9	Amended	403	12	HB 567
17–17–9.1	Added	403	13	HB 567
17–17–12	Amended	403	14	HB 567
17–17–12.1	Added	403	15	HB 567
19–3–30	Amended	439	1	SB 238
19–3–39	Amended	439	2	SB 238
19–3–42	Amended	439	3	SB 238
19–3–46	Amended	439	4	SB 238
19–3–48	Amended	439	5	SB 238
19–6–15	Amended	624	19	HB 1387
19–6–51	Amended	624	19	HB 1387
19–6–53	Amended	615	10	SB 388
19–7–1	Amended	624	19	HB 1387
19–9–127	Amended	624	19	HB 1387
19–9–129	Amended	624	19	HB 1387
19–11–3	Amended	410	1	HB 1118
19–11–9	Amended	621	2	SB 296
19–11–12	Amended	410	2	HB 1118
19–11–26	Amended	410	3	HB 1118
19–11–27	Amended	410	4	HB 1118
19–11–28	Amended	410	5	HB 1118
19–11–29	Amended	410	6	HB 1118
19–11–31	Reserved	624	19	HB 1387
19–13–17	Amended	621	2	SB 296
19–14–21	Amended	621	3	SB 296
19–14–22	Amended	621	3	SB 296
19–15–2	Amended	418	14	SB 244
20–1–10	Added	447	1	SB 392
20–1A–4	Amended	360	1-45	HB 1055
20–1A–10	Amended	360	1-46	HB 1055
		615	10	SB 388
20–1A–12	Amended	360	1-46.1	HB 1055
20–2–14.1	Added	448	1	SB 427
20–2–49	Added	463	1	SB 84
20–2–51	Amended	463	2	SB 84
20–2–52	Amended	463	3	SB 84
20–2–55	Amended	463	4	SB 84
20–2–57	Amended	463	5	SB 84
20–2–61	Amended	463	6	SB 84
20–2–63	Amended	463	7	SB 84
20–2–64	Amended	506	13	SB 131
20–2–72	Added	463	8	SB 84
		626	1	HB 1200
20–2–73	Added	463	8	SB 84
20–2–82	Amended	408	1C	HB 1079
20–2–101	Amended	463	9	SB 84
20–2–133	Amended	418	15	SB 244
20–2–142	Amended	449	1	SB 518
20–2–157	Amended	441	1	SB 340
20–2–161	Amended	615	10	SB 388
20–2–167	Amended	384	1	HB 908
20–2–182	Amended	384	3	HB 908
20–2–184.1	Amended	384	4	HB 908
20–2–188	Amended	647	1	HB 936
20–2–200	Amended	408	1	HB 1079
			1D	HB 1079

Code Section—continued	Effect	Act	Section	Bill/Resolution Number
20–2–200	Amended	413	1	HB 1307
20–2–211	Amended	349	1	HB 906
		408	1A	HB 1079
20–2–211.1	Added	408	1B	HB 1079
20–2–212	Amended	456	1	HB 923
20–2–212.6	Added	367	1	HB 977
20–2–230	Amended	463	10	SB 84
20–2–244	Amended	384	5	HB 908
		408	1E	HB 1079
20–2–250	Amended	418	16	SB 244
20–2–257	Amended	624	20	HB 1387
20–2–260	Amended	385	1	HB 905
			2	HB 905
20–2–262	Amended	385	3	HB 905
20–2–281	Amended	390	2	HB 400
20–2–315	Amended	383	1	HB 910
20–2–325	Added	390	1	HB 400
20–2–326	Added	390	1	HB 400
20–2–327	Added	390	1	HB 400
20–2–328	Added	390	1	HB 400
20–2–329	Added	390	1	HB 400
20–2–329.1	Added	390	1	HB 400
20–2–500	Amended	421	3	SB 447
20–2–520	Amended	544	0.5	HB 703
20–2–552	Amended	647	2	HB 936
20–2–553	Amended	647	3	HB 936
20–2–555	Amended	647	4	HB 936
20–2–556	Amended	647	5	HB 936
20–2–559	Amended	647	6	HB 936
20–2–560	Amended	647	7	HB 936
20–2–564	Amended	621	2	SB 296
		647	8	HB 936
20–2–567	Amended	647	9	HB 936
20–2–568	Amended	647	10	HB 936
20–2–569	Amended	647	11	HB 936
20–2–570	Amended	647	12	HB 936
20–2–571	Amended	647	13	HB 936
20–2–572	Amended	647	14	HB 936
20–2–577	Amended	647	15	HB 936
20–2–751.4	Amended	471	2	SB 250
20–2–881	Amended	615	10	SB 388
20–2–891	Amended	621	2	SB 296
			3	SB 296
20–2–911	Amended	615	10	SB 388
20–2–919	Amended	621	2	SB 296
			3	SB 296
20–2–982.1	Amended	408	1F	HB 1079
20–2–1010	Amended	490	1	SB 319
20–2–1181	Amended	471	3	SB 250
20–2–1184	Amended	643	2-12	SB 308
20–2–2064	Amended	492	1	SB 457
20–2–2065	Amended	408	1G	HB 1079
20–3–55	Amended	621	2	SB 296
20–3–63	Amended	621	2	SB 296
20–3–86	Amended	505	2-1	HB 1128
20–3–241	Amended	615	10	SB 388
20–3–242	Added	446	1	SB 387
20–3–250.27	Amended	621	3	SB 296
20–3–294	Amended	615	10	SB 388
20–3–328	Amended	615	10	SB 388
20–3–423	Amended	615	10	SB 388

Code Section—continued	Effect	Act	Section	Bill/Resolution Number
20–3–513	Amended	418	17	SB 244
20–3–519.6	Amended	442	1	SB 341
20–3–632	Amended	621	5	SB 296
20–3–633	Amended	621	3	SB 296
20–3–635	Amended	621	2	SB 296
			4	SB 296
20–3–637	Amended	621	4	SB 296
20–4–3	Amended	621	2	SB 296
20–4–17	Amended	624	20	HB 1387
20–4–21.1	Amended	505	2-2	HB 1128
21–2–2	Amended	632	1	HB 540
21–2–13	Amended	621	3	SB 296
21–2–31	Amended	615	10	SB 388
21–2–90	Amended	632	2	HB 540
21–2–92	Amended	632	3	HB 540
21–2–98	Amended	632	4	HB 540
21–2–101	Amended	632	5	HB 540
21–2–171	Amended	632	6	HB 540
21–2–212	Amended	632	7	HB 540
21–2–219	Amended	502	1	HB 1073
		632	8	HB 540
21–2–223	Amended	632	9	HB 540
21–2–224	Amended	632	10	HB 540
21–2–225	Amended	632	11	HB 540
21–2–230	Amended	632	12	HB 540
21–2–235	Amended	632	13	HB 540
21–2–284	Amended	632	14	HB 540
21–2–291	Amended	632	15	HB 540
21–2–379.8	Amended	632	16	HB 540
21–2–380	Amended	632	17	HB 540
21–2–381	Amended	502	2	HB 1073
		632	18	HB 540
21–2–381.1	Amended	502	3	HB 1073
21–2–382	Amended	632	19	HB 540
21–2–383	Amended	632	20	HB 540
21–2–384	Amended	502	4	HB 1073
			5	HB 1073
21–2–385	Amended	632	21	HB 540
21–2–387	Amended	557	1	HB 665
21–2–414	Amended	632	22	HB 540
21–2–419	Amended	632	23	HB 540
21–2–501	Amended	632	24	HB 540
21–2–540	Amended	632	25	HB 540
21–2–562	Amended	632	26	HB 540
21–2–568	Amended	632	27	HB 540
21–2–574	Amended	632	28	HB 540
21–2–575	Amended	632	29	HB 540
21–2–576	Amended	632	30	HB 540
21–2–578	Amended	632	31	HB 540
21–2–579	Amended	632	32	HB 540
21–2–587	Amended	632	33	HB 540
21–2–588	Amended	632	34	HB 540
21–2–594	Amended	632	35	HB 540
21–5–3	Amended	680	2	SB 17
21–5–4	Amended	680	3	SB 17
21–5–5	Amended	680	4	SB 17
21–5–6	Amended	615	10	SB 388
		680	5	SB 17
21–5–7.1	Amended	680	6	SB 17
21–5–11	Amended	680	7	SB 17
21–5–13	Amended	680	8	SB 17

Code Section—continued	Effect	Act	Section	Bill/Resolution Number
21–5–14	Added	680	9	SB 17
21–5–30	Amended	621	3	SB 296
		680	10	SB 17
21–5–34	Amended	360	1-47	HB 1055
		680	11	SB 17
21–5–34.1	Amended	680	12	SB 17
21–5–36	Amended	680	13	SB 17
21–5–40	Amended	680	14	SB 17
21–5–41	Amended	680	15	SB 17
21–5–50	Amended	360	1-48	HB 1055
		680	16	SB 17
21–5–51	Amended	680	17	SB 17
21–5–52	Repealed	680	18	SB 17
21–5–53	Repealed	680	19	SB 17
21–5–70	Amended	680	20	SB 17
21–5–71	Amended	360	1-49	HB 1055
		615	10	SB 388
		680	21	SB 17
21–5–73	Amended	680	22	SB 17
21–5–76	Amended	680	23	SB 17
24–4–23.1	Amended	624	24	HB 1387
24–9–61.1	Amended	403	16	HB 567
24–9–100	Amended	624	24	HB 1387
24–10–27.1	Amended	624	24	HB 1387
24–10–97	Amended	624	24	HB 1387
25–2–4.1	Amended	360	1-50	HB 1055
25–2–20	Amended	360	1-50.1	HB 1055
25–4–6	Amended	624	25	HB 1387
25–10–5	Amended	360	1-51	HB 1055
25–11–4	Amended	360	1-52	HB 1055
25–11–5	Amended	360	1-53	HB 1055
25–11–6	Amended	360	1-54	HB 1055
25–11–7	Amended	360	1-55	HB 1055
25–12–8	Amended	360	1-56	HB 1055
25–14–4	Amended	624	25	HB 1387
26–2–25	Amended	360	1-57	HB 1055
26–2–27.1	Amended	466	2	HB 883
			3	HB 883
			4	HB 883
26–2–232	Amended	615	10	SB 388
26–2–312	Amended	360	1-58	HB 1055
26–2–411	Amended	360	1-59	HB 1055
26–4–5	Amended	417	1	SB 195
26–4–29	Amended	615	10	SB 388
26–4–41	Amended	417	2	SB 195
26–4–42	Amended	417	3	SB 195
26–4–46	Amended	417	4	SB 195
26–4–81	Amended	417	5	SB 195
		494	1	HB 194
26–4–210	Added	392	1	HB 361
26–4–211	Added	392	1	HB 361
26–4–212	Added	392	1	HB 361
26–4–213	Added	392	1	HB 361
26–4–214	Added	392	1	HB 361
27–1–2	Amended	635	1	SB 474
27–1–6	Amended	615	10	SB 388
27–1–39	Amended	635	2	SB 474
27–2–3.1	Amended	624	27	HB 1387
27–2–7	Amended	624	27	HB 1387
27–2–30	Amended	621	3	SB 296
27–2–41	Amended	615	10	SB 388

Code Section—continued	Effect	Act	Section	Bill/Resolution Number
27–3–1.1	Amended	643	2-13	SB 308
27–3–4	Amended	635	3	SB 474
27–3–6	Amended	643	2-14	SB 308
27–3–15	Amended	635	4	SB 474
27–3–19.1	Added	635	5	SB 474
27–3–26	Amended	635	6	SB 474
27–3–28	Added	635	7	SB 474
27–3–47	Repealed and Reserved	635	8	SB 474
27–3–180	Added	635	9	SB 474
27–3–181	Added	635	9	SB 474
27–3–182	Added	635	9	SB 474
27–3–183	Added	635	9	SB 474
27–3–184	Added	635	9	SB 474
27–3–185	Added	635	9	SB 474
27–4–11.1	Amended	643	2-15	SB 308
27–4–130.1	Amended	635	10	SB 474
27–4–262	Amended	615	10	SB 388
28–4–3	Amended	615	1	SB 388
28–5–122	Amended	615	10	SB 388
28–12–1	Added	541	1	HB 1405
28–12–2	Added	541	1	HB 1405
28–12–3	Added	541	1	HB 1405
28–12–4	Added	541	1	HB 1405
29–3–32	Amended	506	14	SB 131
29–4–18	Added	616	2	SB 367
29–5–32	Amended	506	15	SB 131
30–5–8	Amended	624	30	HB 1387
31–1–11	Added	548	1	SB 411
31–2–4	Amended	650	1	HB 994
31–2–14	Amended	624	31	HB 1387
31–2–17.1	Added	491	1-3	SB 435
31–7–18	Amended	486	1	HB 1179
31–8–35	Amended	621	3	SB 296
31–8–133	Amended	624	31	HB 1387
31–8–152	Amended	621	3	SB 296
31–8–157	Amended	621	3	SB 296
31–8–158	Amended	621	3	SB 296
31–8–179	Added	360	2-1	HB 1055
31–8–179.1	Added	360	2-1	HB 1055
31–8–179.2	Added	360	2-1	HB 1055
31–8–179.3	Added	360	2-1	HB 1055
31–8–179.4	Added	360	2-1	HB 1055
31–8–179.5	Added	360	2-1	HB 1055
31–8–179.6	Added	360	2-1	HB 1055
31–8–179.7	Added	360	2-1	HB 1055
31–8–179.8	Added	360	2-1	HB 1055
31–8–195.1	Amended	399	1	SB 344
31–9–2	Amended	616	1	SB 367
31–10–1	Amended	615	11	SB 388
31–10–9	Amended	615	10	SB 388
31–10–15	Amended	546	1	SB 493
		624	31	HB 1387
		632	36	HB 540
31–12A–9	Amended	615	11	SB 388
31–21–7	Amended	398	1	SB 355
31–22–2	Amended	615	10	SB 388
31–33–4	Amended	418	18	SB 244
31–33–8	Amended	418	19	SB 244
31–34–1	Amended	429	1	HB 866
31–34–2	Amended	429	1	HB 866
31–34–3	Amended	429	1	HB 866

Code Section—continued	Effect	Act	Section	Bill/Resolution Number
31–34–4	Amended	429	1	HB 866
31–34–4.1	Added	429	1	HB 866
31–34–5	Amended	429	1	HB 866
31–34–6	Amended	429	1	HB 866
31–34–7	Amended	429	1	HB 866
31–34–8	Amended	429	1	HB 866
31–34–9	Amended	429	1	HB 866
31–38–4.1	Added	491	2-1	SB 435
31–38–8	Amended	491	2-2	SB 435
31–41–1	Amended	488	6	SB 78
31–41–2	Amended	488	6	SB 78
31–41–3	Amended	488	6	SB 78
31–41–4	Amended	488	6	SB 78
31–41–5	Amended	488	6	SB 78
31–47–1	Added	673	4	HB 1119
31–47–2	Added	673	4	HB 1119
31–47–3	Added	673	4	HB 1119
32–2–2	Amended	621	3	SB 296
32–2–20	Amended	610	1	SB 520
32–2–41	Amended	440	1	SB 305
		554	1.1	HB 277
		610	2	SB 520
32–2–41.2	Amended	615	10	SB 388
32–2–43	Amended	554	2	HB 277
32–2–66	Amended	615	10	SB 388
32–2–81	Amended	440	1	SB 305
32–5–1	Amended	621	3	SB 296
32–5–2	Amended	621	3	SB 296
32–6–24	Amended	460	1	HB 1174
32–6–27	Amended	460	2	HB 1174
32–6–28	Amended	460	3	HB 1174
32–6–75.2	Amended	360	1-60	HB 1055
32–7–2	Amended	443	1	SB 354
32–9–4	Amended	360	1-61	HB 1055
32–9–8	Amended	360	1-62	HB 1055
32–9–13	Added	554	3	HB 277
32–9–14	Added	554	3	HB 277
32–12–1	Added	554	4	HB 277
32–12–2	Added	554	4	HB 277
32–12–3	Added	554	4	HB 277
32–12–4	Added	554	4	HB 277
32–12–5	Added	554	4	HB 277
32–12–6	Added	554	4	HB 277
33–2–24	Amended	360	1-63	HB 1055
33–2–29	Amended	621	2	SB 296
33–5–32	Amended	621	2	SB 296
33–21–17	Amended	621	2	SB 296
33–21A–4	Amended	615	10	SB 388
33–24–21.1	Amended	362	1	HB 1268
33–24–59.13	Added	548	2	SB 411
33–34–5.1	Amended	366	1	HB 656
33–35–15	Amended	621	2	SB 296
33–36–11	Amended	666	1	HB 1364
33–36–14	Amended	666	2	HB 1364
33–36–20	Added	666	3	HB 1364
33–41–20.1	Amended	666	4	HB 1364
33–43–3	Amended	374	1	SB 316
33–50–3	Amended	549	2	SB 310
33–50–5	Amended	549	3	SB 310
33–50–6	Amended	549	4	SB 310
33–50–7	Amended	549	5	SB 310

Code Section—continued	Effect	Act	Section	Bill/Resolution Number
33–50–14	Added	549	6	SB 310
33–59–2	Amended	624	33	HB 1387
33–64–1	Added	549	1	SB 310
33–64–2	Added	549	1	SB 310
33–64–3	Added	549	1	SB 310
33–64–4	Added	549	1	SB 310
33–64–5	Added	549	1	SB 310
33–64–6	Added	549	1	SB 310
33–64–7	Added	549	1	SB 310
34–2–6	Amended	615	10	SB 388
34–8–76	Amended	615	10	SB 388
34–8–177	Amended	621	2	SB 296
34–8–197	Amended	624	34	HB 1387
34–9–12	Amended	377	1	HB 1101
34–9–40	Amended	621	2	SB 296
34–9–61	Amended	615	10	SB 388
34–9–106	Amended	377	2	HB 1101
34–9–127	Amended	377	3	HB 1101
34–9–129	Amended	621	2	SB 296
34–9–205	Amended	615	10	SB 388
34–9–352	Amended	621	3	SB 296
34–9–380	Amended	377	4	HB 1101
34–9–381	Amended	377	4	HB 1101
34–9–382	Amended	377	4	HB 1101
34–9–383	Amended	377	4	HB 1101
34–9–384	Amended	377	4	HB 1101
34–9–385	Amended	377	4	HB 1101
34–9–386	Amended	377	4	HB 1101
34–9–387	Amended	377	4	HB 1101
34–9–388	Amended	377	4	HB 1101
34–9–389	Amended	377	4	HB 1101
34–11–8	Amended	615	10	SB 388
34–14–1	Added	361	1	HB 1195
34–14–2	Added	361	1	HB 1195
34–14–3	Added	361	1	HB 1195
34–14–4	Added	361	1	HB 1195
34–15–7	Amended	621	2	SB 296
34–15–16	Amended	621	2	SB 296
35–2–120	Added	379	1	HB 1074
35–2–121	Added	379	1	HB 1074
35–2–122	Added	379	1	HB 1074
35–2–123	Added	379	1	HB 1074
35–2–124	Added	379	1	HB 1074
35–3–4	Amended	678	2	SB 371
35–3–4.2	Added	678	3	SB 371
35–3–33	Amended	615	10	SB 388
35–3–191	Added	473	1	SB 397
35–6A–5	Amended	622	1	SB 173
35–6A–7	Amended	615	10	SB 388
		622	2	SB 173
35–6A–9	Amended	622	3	SB 173
35–8–7	Amended	401	1	SB 324
36–9–3	Amended	544	1	HB 703
		663	1	SB 390
36–15–7	Amended	495	1	HB 858
36–15–11	Amended	495	2	HB 858
36–17–2	Amended	621	2	SB 296
			3	SB 296
36–17–3	Amended	621	2	SB 296
36–31–11.1	Added	353	1	HB 203
36–37–6	Amended	663	2	SB 390

Code Section—continued	Effect	Act	Section	Bill/Resolution Number
36–40–22	Amended	621	2	SB 296
36–40–24	Amended	621	2	SB 296
36–40–42	Amended	621	2	SB 296
36–40–44	Amended	621	2	SB 296
36–40–45	Amended	621	2	SB 296
36–40–46	Amended	621	2	SB 296
36–42–3	Amended	415	1	HB 1388
36–44–3	Amended	624	36	HB 1387
36–60–17.1	Amended	634	1	HB 244
36–61–19	Amended	613	1	SB 456
36–62–2	Amended	415	2	HB 1388
36–62–5	Amended	613	2	SB 456
36–62A–1	Amended	613	3	SB 456
36–66B–1	Added	430	1	SB 432
36–66B–2	Added	430	1	SB 432
36–66B–3	Added	430	1	SB 432
36–66B–4	Added	430	1	SB 432
36–70–27	Amended	667	1	HB 406
36–75–11	Amended	353	2	HB 203
36–80–15	Amended	621	3	SB 296
			4	SB 296
36–80–21	Added	472	1	HB 122
36–82–7	Amended	445	2	SB 369
36–83–7	Amended	621	3	SB 296
36–83–8	Amended	621	3	SB 296
			4	SB 296
36–89–3	Amended	624	36	HB 1387
37–1–6	Added	418	1	SB 244
37–1–21	Amended	418	2	SB 244
37–1–28	Amended	418	3	SB 244
37–1–50	Amended	418	4	SB 244
37–1–70	Amended	418	5	SB 244
37–2–4	Amended	418	6	SB 244
37–2–5.2	Amended	418	7	SB 244
		624	37	HB 1387
37–2–6	Amended	624	37	HB 1387
37–2–6.1	Amended	624	37	HB 1387
37–2–6.5	Amended	624	37	HB 1387
37–2–7	Amended	615	10	SB 388
37–2–10	Amended	624	37	HB 1387
37–3–1	Amended	418	8	SB 244
37–4–21	Amended	624	37	HB 1387
37–5–2	Amended	624	37	HB 1387
37–5–6	Amended	615	10	SB 388
37–7–3	Amended	624	37	HB 1387
37–9–8	Amended	506	16	SB 131
39–2–11	Amended	624	39	HB 1387
40–1–1	Amended	381	1	HB 1005
		460	4	HB 1174
40–2–8	Amended	381	2	HB 1005
40–2–9	Amended	360	1-64	HB 1055
		381	2.1	HB 1005
40–2–20	Amended	381	3	HB 1005
40–2–22	Amended	360	1-65	HB 1055
40–2–26	Amended	381	3.1	HB 1005
40–2–29	Amended	381	4	HB 1005
40–2–30	Amended	360	1-66	HB 1055
40–2–31	Amended	360	1-67	HB 1055
40–2–32	Reserved	360	1-74	HB 1055
40–2–32.1	Repealed	360	1-75	HB 1055
40–2–33	Amended	360	1-68	HB 1055

Code Section—continued	Effect	Act	Section	Bill/Resolution Number
33-50-14	Added	549	6	SB 310
33-59-2	Amended	624	33	HB 1387
33-64-1	Added	549	1	SB 310
33-64-2	Added	549	1	SB 310
33-64-3	Added	549	1	SB 310
33-64-4	Added	549	1	SB 310
33-64-5	Added	549	1	SB 310
33-64-6	Added	549	1	SB 310
33-64-7	Added	549	1	SB 310
34-2-6	Amended	615	10	SB 388
34-8-76	Amended	615	10	SB 388
34-8-177	Amended	621	2	SB 296
34-8-197	Amended	624	34	HB 1387
34-9-12	Amended	377	1	HB 1101
34-9-40	Amended	621	2	SB 296
34-9-61	Amended	615	10	SB 388
34-9-106	Amended	377	2	HB 1101
34-9-127	Amended	377	3	HB 1101
34-9-129	Amended	621	2	SB 296
34-9-205	Amended	615	10	SB 388
34-9-352	Amended	621	3	SB 296
34-9-380	Amended	377	4	HB 1101
34-9-381	Amended	377	4	HB 1101
34-9-382	Amended	377	4	HB 1101
34-9-383	Amended	377	4	HB 1101
34-9-384	Amended	377	4	HB 1101
34-9-385	Amended	377	4	HB 1101
34-9-386	Amended	377	4	HB 1101
34-9-387	Amended	377	4	HB 1101
34-9-388	Amended	377	4	HB 1101
34-9-389	Amended	377	4	HB 1101
34-11-8	Amended	615	10	SB 388
34-14-1	Added	361	1	HB 1195
34-14-2	Added	361	1	HB 1195
34-14-3	Added	361	1	HB 1195
34-14-4	Added	361	1	HB 1195
34-15-7	Amended	621	2	SB 296
34-15-16	Amended	621	2	SB 296
35-2-120	Added	379	1	HB 1074
35-2-121	Added	379	1	HB 1074
35-2-122	Added	379	1	HB 1074
35-2-123	Added	379	1	HB 1074
35-2-124	Added	379	1	HB 1074
35-3-4	Amended	678	2	SB 371
35-3-4.2	Added	678	3	SB 371
35-3-33	Amended	615	10	SB 388
35-3-191	Added	473	1	SB 397
35-6A-5	Amended	622	1	SB 173
35-6A-7	Amended	615	10	SB 388
		622	2	SB 173
35-6A-9	Amended	622	3	SB 173
35-8-7	Amended	401	1	SB 324
36-9-3	Amended	544	1	HB 703
		663	1	SB 390
36-15-7	Amended	495	1	HB 858
36-15-11	Amended	495	2	HB 858
36-17-2	Amended	621	2	SB 296
			3	SB 296
36-17-3	Amended	621	2	SB 296
36-31-11.1	Added	353	1	HB 203
36-37-6	Amended	663	2	SB 390

Code Section—continued	Effect	Act	Section	Bill/Resolution Number
36–40–22	Amended	621	2	SB 296
36–40–24	Amended	621	2	SB 296
36–40–42	Amended	621	2	SB 296
36–40–44	Amended	621	2	SB 296
36–40–45	Amended	621	2	SB 296
36–40–46	Amended	621	2	SB 296
36–42–3	Amended	415	1	HB 1388
36–44–3	Amended	624	36	HB 1387
36–60–17.1	Amended	634	1	HB 244
36–61–19	Amended	613	1	SB 456
36–62–2	Amended	415	2	HB 1388
36–62–5	Amended	613	2	SB 456
36–62A–1	Amended	613	3	SB 456
36–66B–1	Added	430	1	SB 432
36–66B–2	Added	430	1	SB 432
36–66B–3	Added	430	1	SB 432
36–66B–4	Added	430	1	SB 432
36–70–27	Amended	667	1	HB 406
36–75–11	Amended	353	2	HB 203
36–80–15	Amended	621	3	SB 296
			4	SB 296
36–80–21	Added	472	1	HB 122
36–82–7	Amended	445	2	SB 369
36–83–7	Amended	621	3	SB 296
36–83–8	Amended	621	3	SB 296
			4	SB 296
36–89–3	Amended	624	36	HB 1387
37–1–6	Added	418	1	SB 244
37–1–21	Amended	418	2	SB 244
37–1–28	Amended	418	3	SB 244
37–1–50	Amended	418	4	SB 244
37–1–70	Amended	418	5	SB 244
37–2–4	Amended	418	6	SB 244
37–2–5.2	Amended	418	7	SB 244
		624	37	HB 1387
37–2–6	Amended	624	37	HB 1387
37–2–6.1	Amended	624	37	HB 1387
37–2–6.5	Amended	624	37	HB 1387
37–2–7	Amended	615	10	SB 388
37–2–10	Amended	624	37	HB 1387
37–3–1	Amended	418	8	SB 244
37–4–21	Amended	624	37	HB 1387
37–5–2	Amended	624	37	HB 1387
37–5–6	Amended	615	10	SB 388
37–7–3	Amended	624	37	HB 1387
37–9–8	Amended	506	16	SB 131
39–2–11	Amended	624	39	HB 1387
40–1–1	Amended	381	1	HB 1005
		460	4	HB 1174
40–2–8	Amended	381	2	HB 1005
40–2–9	Amended	360	1-64	HB 1055
		381	2.1	HB 1005
40–2–20	Amended	381	3	HB 1005
40–2–22	Amended	360	1-65	HB 1055
40–2–26	Amended	381	3.1	HB 1005
40–2–29	Amended	381	4	HB 1005
40–2–30	Amended	360	1-66	HB 1055
40–2–31	Amended	360	1-67	HB 1055
40–2–32	Reserved	360	1-74	HB 1055
40–2–32.1	Repealed	360	1-75	HB 1055
40–2–33	Amended	360	1-68	HB 1055

Code Section—continued	Effect	Act	Section	Bill/Resolution Number
40–2–49.2	Repealed	360	1-75	HB 1055
40–2–49.3	Repealed	360	1-75	HB 1055
40–2–60	Amended	360	1-69	HB 1055
40–2–60.1	Amended	360	1-70	HB 1055
40–2–61	Amended	360	1-71	HB 1055
40–2–62	Amended	360	1-72	HB 1055
40–2–64.1	Amended	360	1-73	HB 1055
40–2–75	Reserved	360	1-74	HB 1055
40–2–76	Reserved	360	1-74	HB 1055
40–2–77	Reserved	360	1-74	HB 1055
40–2–78	Reserved	360	1-74	HB 1055
40–2–85.3	Redesignated from 40–2–86.18	360	1-76	HB 1055
40–2–86	Redesignated from 40–2–86.21	360	1-77	HB 1055
40–2–86.1	Repealed	360	1-75	HB 1055
	Redesignated from 40–2–86.22	360	1-77	HB 1055
40–2–86.2	Repealed	360	1-75	HB 1055
40–2–86.4	Repealed	360	1-75	HB 1055
40–2–86.5	Repealed	360	1-75	HB 1055
40–2–86.7	Repealed	360	1-75	HB 1055
40–2–86.8	Repealed	360	1-75	HB 1055
40–2–86.9	Repealed	360	1-75	HB 1055
40–2–86.10	Repealed	360	1-75	HB 1055
40–2–86.11	Repealed	360	1-75	HB 1055
40–2–86.12	Repealed	360	1-75	HB 1055
40–2–86.14	Repealed	360	1-75	HB 1055
40–2–86.18	Redesignated as 40–2–85.3	360	1-76	HB 1055
	Amended	380	1	HB 1012
40–2–86.19	Repealed	360	1-75	HB 1055
40–2–86.20	Repealed	360	1-75	HB 1055
40–2–86.21	Redesignated as 40–2–86	360	1-77	HB 1055
	Amended	381	4.1	HB 1005
40–2–86.22	Redesignated as 40–2–86.1	360	1-77	HB 1055
40–2–131	Amended	621	3	SB 296
40–2–137	Amended	381	5	HB 1005
40–2–168	Added	381	6	HB 1005
40–3–26	Amended	381	7	HB 1005
40–5–1	Amended	360	1-78	HB 1055
		633	1	HB 396
40–5–2	Amended	633	1.1	HB 396
40–5–21.1	Amended	633	2	HB 396
40–5–21.2	Amended	633	3	HB 396
40–5–22	Amended	394	1	HB 258
40–5–23	Amended	633	5	HB 396
40–5–24	Amended	394	2	HB 258
		633	6	HB 396
40–5–25	Amended	360	1-79	HB 1055
		633	7	HB 396
40–5–28	Amended	633	8	HB 396
40–5–30	Amended	623	1	SB 6
		625	1	HB 1224
40–5–32	Amended	633	9	HB 396
40–5–38	Added	649	1	SB 419
40–5–52	Amended	633	4	HB 396
40–5–53	Amended	633	10	HB 396
40–5–56	Amended	633	12	HB 396
40–5–57	Amended	676	1	HB 23
		677	2	SB 360
40–5–63	Amended	633	13	HB 396
40–5–64	Amended	394	3	HB 258
		633	14	HB 396
40–5–67.1	Amended	360	1-80	HB 1055

Code Section—continued	Effect	Act	Section	Bill/Resolution Number
40–5–71	Repealed	381	8	HB 1005
40–5–72	Amended	381	9	HB 1005
40–5–75	Amended	633	15	HB 396
40–5–82	Amended	633	16	HB 396
40–5–83	Amended	633	17	HB 396
40–5–100	Amended	633	18	HB 396
40–5–103	Amended	360	1-81	HB 1055
		633	19	HB 396
40–5–120	Amended	633	20	HB 396
40–5–171	Amended	633	21	HB 396
40–5–173	Amended	633	22	HB 396
40–5–174	Amended	633	23	HB 396
40–5–175	Amended	633	24	HB 396
40–6–10	Amended	381	10	HB 1005
40–6–70	Amended	460	5	HB 1174
40–6–120	Amended	412	1	HB 1231
40–6–228	Amended	482	1	HB 1338
		643	2-16	SB 308
40–6–241	Amended	676	2	HB 23
		677	3	SB 360
40–6–241.1	Added	676	3	HB 23
		677	4	SB 360
40–6–250	Amended	677	5	SB 360
40–6–315	Amended	615	10	SB 388
40–6–352	Amended	615	10	SB 388
40–6–391	Amended	454	1	HB 898
40–6–395	Amended	412	2	HB 1231
40–7–3	Amended	365	1-1	HB 207
40–7–4	Amended	365	1-2	HB 207
40–7–6	Amended	365	1-3	HB 207
40–8–76.1	Amended	609	1	SB 458
40–8–78	Amended	615	10	SB 388
40–8–90	Amended	360	1-82	HB 1055
40–8–91	Amended	368	1-1	HB 981
40–8–92	Amended	363	1	SB 410
40–9–39	Amended	621	3	SB 296
40–13–2.1	Amended	633	25	HB 396
40–14–9	Amended	460	6	HB 1174
40–16–4	Amended	633	26	HB 396
40–16–5	Amended	615	10	SB 388
41–1–10	Added	635	11	SB 474
42–1–11.1	Added	416	2	SB 136
42–1–12	Amended	388	1	HB 651
		389	5	HB 571
			6	HB 571
			7	HB 571
			8	HB 571
			9	HB 571
			10	HB 571
			11	HB 571
42–1–14	Amended	389	12	HB 571
		624	42	HB 1387
42–1–15	Amended	389	13	HB 571
42–1–16	Added	389	14	HB 571
42–1–17	Added	389	14	HB 571
42–1–18	Added	389	14	HB 571
42–1–19	Added	389	15	HB 571
42–2–8	Amended	615	10	SB 388
42–5–50	Amended	403	17	HB 567
42–8–34.1	Amended	426	1	HB 329
42–8–36	Amended	496	1	HB 859

Code Section—continued	Effect	Act	Section	Bill/Resolution Number
42–8–151	Amended	624	42	HB 1387
42–9–43.1	Amended	416	3	SB 136
43–1–2	Amended	417	6	SB 195
			7	SB 195
43–1–3	Amended	621	3	SB 296
43–1–5	Amended	417	8	SB 195
		643	2-17	SB 308
43–1–9	Amended	417	9	SB 195
43–1–10	Amended	417	10	SB 195
43–1–11	Amended	417	11	SB 195
43–1A–1	Amended	437	1	SB 149
43–1A–2	Amended	437	1	SB 149
43–1A–3	Amended	437	1	SB 149
43–1A–4	Amended	437	1	SB 149
43–1A–5	Amended	437	1	SB 149
43–1A–6	Amended	437	1	SB 149
43–1A–7	Amended	437	1	SB 149
43–1A–8	Amended	437	1	SB 149
43–1A–9	Amended	437	1	SB 149
43–4–1	Amended	545	1	HB 231
43–4–9	Amended	417	12	SB 195
43–4–14	Amended	545	2	HB 231
43–4–30	Amended	545	3	HB 231
43–4–33	Amended	545	4	HB 231
43–4A–1	Amended	437	2	SB 149
43–4A–2	Amended	437	2	SB 149
43–4A–3	Repealed	437	2	SB 149
	Redesignated from 43–4A–4	437	2	SB 149
43–4A–4	Redesignated as 43–4A–3	437	2	SB 149
	Redesignated from 43–4A–4.1	437	2	SB 149
43–4A–4.1	Redesignated as 43–4A–4	437	2	SB 149
43–4A–5	Amended	437	2	SB 149
43–4A–6	Repealed	437	2	SB 149
	Redesignated from 43–4A–7	437	2	SB 149
43–4A–7	Redesignated as 43–4A–6	437	2	SB 149
	Redesignated from 43–4A–8	437	2	SB 149
43–4A–8	Redesignated as 43–4A–7	437	2	SB 149
	Redesignated from 43–4A–9	437	2	SB 149
43–4A–9	Redesignated as 43–4A–8	437	2	SB 149
	Redesignated from 43–4A–10	437	2	SB 149
43–4A–10	Redesignated as 43–4A–9	437	2	SB 149
	Redesignated from 43–4A–11	437	2	SB 149
43–4A–11	Redesignated as 43–4A–10	437	2	SB 149
	Redesignated from 43–4A–12	437	2	SB 149
43–4A–12	Redesignated as 43–4A–11	437	2	SB 149
	Redesignated from 43–4A–13	437	2	SB 149
43–4A–13	Redesignated as 43–4A–12	437	2	SB 149
	Redesignated from 43–4A–14	437	2	SB 149
43–4A–14	Redesignated as 43–4A–13	437	2	SB 149
	Redesignated from 43–4A–16	437	2	SB 149
43–4A–15	Redesignated from 43–4A–16.1	437	2	SB 149
	Redesignated as 43–4A–17	437	2	SB 149
43–4A–16	Redesignated as 43–4A–14	437	2	SB 149
	Redesignated from 43–4A–17	437	2	SB 149
43–4A–16.1	Redesignated as 43–4A–15	437	2	SB 149
43–4A–17	Redesignated as 43–4A–16	437	2	SB 149
	Redesignated from 43–4A–15	437	2	SB 149
43–4A–18	Redesignated from 43–4A–20	437	2	SB 149
	Redesignated as 43–4A–19	437	2	SB 149
43–4A–19	Redesignated from 43–4A–18	437	2	SB 149

Code Section—continued	Effect	Act	Section	Bill/Resolution Number
43–4A–19	Redesignated as 43–4A–20	437	2	SB 149
43–4A–20	Redesignated as 43–4A–18	437	2	SB 149
	Redesignated from 43–4A–19	437	2	SB 149
43–6–13	Amended	417	13	SB 195
43–7–7	Amended	417	14	SB 195
43–7–12	Amended	417	15	SB 195
43–7–16	Amended	417	16	SB 195
43–9–7	Amended	417	17	SB 195
43–9–14	Amended	417	18	SB 195
43–10–6	Amended	417	19	SB 195
43–11A–7	Amended	615	10	SB 388
43–12–3	Amended	395	1	HB 128
43–12A–6	Amended	633	27	HB 396
43–13–4	Amended	633	28	HB 396
43–13–5	Amended	633	29	HB 396
43–13–6.1	Amended	633	30	HB 396
43–13–9	Amended	621	2	SB 296
43–14–8.1	Amended	417	20	SB 195
43–14–13	Amended	400	1	SB 339
43–15–12	Amended	417	21	SB 195
43–16–4	Amended	438	1	SB 162
43–17–2	Amended	497	1	HB 863
			2	HB 863
43–17–3	Amended	497	3	HB 863
43–17–8	Amended	497	4	HB 863
43–17–8.1	Added	497	5	HB 863
43–17–11	Amended	615	10	SB 388
43–18–41	Amended	417	22	SB 195
43–18–42	Amended	417	23	SB 195
43–19–13	Amended	417	24	SB 195
43–20–5	Amended	417	25	SB 195
43–20–6	Amended	417	26	SB 195
43–20–8	Amended	417	27	SB 195
43–20–9	Amended	417	28	SB 195
43–20–12	Amended	417	29	SB 195
43–23–8	Amended	417	30	SB 195
43–24A–3	Amended	444	1	SB 364
43–24A–7	Amended	444	2	SB 364
43–24A–15	Amended	444	3	SB 364
43–24A–17	Amended	444	4	SB 364
43–24A–22	Amended	444	5	SB 364
43–24A–24	Amended	444	6	SB 364
43–25–3	Amended	360	1-83	HB 1055
43–26–8	Amended	624	43	HB 1387
43–26–12	Amended	675	1	HB 1040
43–28–9	Amended	417	31	SB 195
43–29–7	Amended	417	32	SB 195
43–29–8	Amended	417	33	SB 195
43–29–11	Amended	417	34	SB 195
43–30–7	Amended	417	35	SB 195
43–33–9	Amended	417	36	SB 195
43–33–10	Amended	615	10	SB 388
43–34–2	Amended	489	1	SB 252
43–34–5.1	Added	489	2	SB 252
43–34–6	Amended	643	2-18	SB 308
43–34–8	Amended	489	3	SB 252
		624	43	HB 1387
43–34–26	Amended	624	43	HB 1387
43–34–26.1	Amended	487	1	HB 1154
		624	43	HB 1387
43–34–30	Amended	624	43	HB 1387

Code Section—continued	Effect	Act	Section	Bill/Resolution Number
43–34–37	Amended	624	43	HB 1387
43–34–103	Amended	624	43	HB 1387
43–34–244	Amended	624	43	HB 1387
43–34–248	Amended	624	43	HB 1387
43–35–12	Amended	417	37	SB 195
43–35–14	Amended	417	38	SB 195
43–38–6	Amended	417	39	SB 195
43–38–7	Amended	417	40	SB 195
		438	2	SB 162
43–38–10	Amended	643	2-19	SB 308
43–39–9	Amended	417	41	SB 195
43–39A–1	Amended	552	1	HB 1050
43–39A–2	Amended	552	2	HB 1050
43–39A–6	Amended	552	3	HB 1050
43–39A–7	Amended	552	4	HB 1050
43–39A–11	Amended	552	5	HB 1050
43–39A–13	Amended	552	6	HB 1050
43–39A–14.1	Added	552	7	HB 1050
43–39A–21	Amended	552	8	HB 1050
43–39A–22	Amended	552	9	HB 1050
43–41–8	Amended	351	1	HB 579
43–41–9	Amended	417	42	SB 195
			43	SB 195
43–41–10	Amended	615	10	SB 388
43–47–6	Amended	615	10	SB 388
43–47–8	Amended	417	44	SB 195
43–50–21	Amended	615	11	SB 388
43–50–31	Amended	417	45	SB 195
43–50–40	Amended	417	46	SB 195
43–51–7	Amended	417	47	SB 195
44–2–191	Amended	621	3	SB 296
44–2–192	Amended	621	3	SB 296
44–2–193	Amended	621	3	SB 296
			4	SB 296
44–2–194	Amended	621	3	SB 296
			4	SB 296
44–2–195	Amended	621	3	SB 296
			4	SB 296
44–3–111	Amended	624	44	HB 1387
44–14–361.1	Amended	618	1	SB 362
44–14–363	Amended	553	1	HB 1147
44–14–518	Amended	553	2	HB 1147
45–1–6	Amended	680	26	SB 17
45–6–3	Amended	615	10	SB 388
45–7–7	Amended	680	27	SB 17
45–8–1	Amended	621	3	SB 296
			4	SB 296
45–8–13.1	Amended	621	4	SB 296
45–8–17	Amended	621	4	SB 296
45–9–4	Amended	418	20	SB 244
		621	2	SB 296
			3	SB 296
45–9–76	Amended	360	1-84	HB 1055
45–9–84.1	Amended	621	2	SB 296
			3	SB 296
45–10–26	Amended	680	28	SB 17
45–10–90	Amended	680	29	SB 17
45–10–91	Amended	680	29	SB 17
45–10–92	Amended	680	29	SB 17
45–10–93	Amended	615	10	SB 388
45–11–8	Amended	458	1	HB 980

Code Section—continued	Effect	Act	Section	Bill/Resolution Number
45–12–71	Amended	391	1	SB 206
45–12–72	Amended	621	3	SB 296
45–12–75	Amended	391	2	SB 206
45–12–78	Amended	621	3	SB 296
45–12–82	Amended	621	3	SB 296
45–12–83.1	Amended	621	2	SB 296
45–12–92	Amended	371	1	HB 1284
45–12–92.1	Added	360	1-84.1	HB 1055
45–12–93	Amended	387	1	SB 421
45–13–22	Amended	615	2	SB 388
45–13–24	Amended	615	3	SB 388
45–13–27	Amended	615	10	SB 388
45–13–41	Amended	615	10	SB 388
45–13–45	Amended	615	11	SB 388
45–14–20	Amended	621	2	SB 296
			3	SB 296
45–14–23	Amended	621	2	SB 296
45–15–35.1	Added	632	37	HB 540
45–16–25	Amended	503	1	HB 1095
45–16–27	Amended	414	3	HB 1322
45–16–32	Amended	503	2	HB 1095
45–18–1	Amended	624	45	HB 1387
45–18–2	Amended	624	45	HB 1387
45–18–5	Amended	624	45	HB 1387
45–18–5.1	Amended	624	45	HB 1387
45–18–5.2	Amended	624	45	HB 1387
45–18–6	Amended	624	45	HB 1387
45–18–7.1	Amended	624	45	HB 1387
45–18–7.2	Amended	624	45	HB 1387
45–18–7.3	Amended	624	45	HB 1387
45–18–7.5	Amended	624	45	HB 1387
45–18–7.6	Amended	624	45	HB 1387
45–18–7.7	Amended	624	45	HB 1387
45–18–7.8	Added	617	1	SB 363
45–18–9	Amended	624	45	HB 1387
45–18–10	Amended	624	45	HB 1387
45–18–12	Amended	624	45	HB 1387
45–18–13	Amended	621	2	SB 296
			3	SB 296
45–18–14	Amended	624	45	HB 1387
45–18–15	Amended	615	10	SB 388
		624	45	HB 1387
45–18–16	Amended	624	45	HB 1387
45–18–20	Amended	624	45	HB 1387
45–18–21	Amended	624	45	HB 1387
45–22–9	Amended	615	10	SB 388
46–2–33	Added	370	1	HB 1233
46–3–427	Amended	621	2	SB 296
46–3–436	Amended	621	2	SB 296
46–3–438	Amended	621	2	SB 296
46–4A–2	Amended	634	1	HB 244
46–4A–12	Amended	634	1	HB 244
46–4A–14	Amended	634	1	HB 244
46–5–70	Amended	360	1-85	HB 1055
46–5–73	Amended	360	1-86	HB 1055
46–5–100	Amended	360	1-87	HB 1055
46–5–134.1	Amended	624	46	HB 1387
46–5–166	Amended	671	3	HB 168
46–5–167	Amended	671	4	HB 168
46–5–222	Amended	671	5	HB 168
46–5–250	Added	671	6	HB 168

Code Section—continued	Effect	Act	Section	Bill/Resolution Number
43–34–37	Amended	624	43	HB 1387
43–34–103	Amended	624	43	HB 1387
43–34–244	Amended	624	43	HB 1387
43–34–248	Amended	624	43	HB 1387
43–35–12	Amended	417	37	SB 195
43–35–14	Amended	417	38	SB 195
43–38–6	Amended	417	39	SB 195
43–38–7	Amended	417	40	SB 195
		438	2	SB 162
43–38–10	Amended	643	2-19	SB 308
43–39–9	Amended	417	41	SB 195
43–39A–1	Amended	552	1	HB 1050
43–39A–2	Amended	552	2	HB 1050
43–39A–6	Amended	552	3	HB 1050
43–39A–7	Amended	552	4	HB 1050
43–39A–11	Amended	552	5	HB 1050
43–39A–13	Amended	552	6	HB 1050
43–39A–14.1	Added	552	7	HB 1050
43–39A–21	Amended	552	8	HB 1050
43–39A–22	Amended	552	9	HB 1050
43–41–8	Amended	351	1	HB 579
43–41–9	Amended	417	42	SB 195
			43	SB 195
43–41–10	Amended	615	10	SB 388
43–47–6	Amended	615	10	SB 388
43–47–8	Amended	417	44	SB 195
43–50–21	Amended	615	11	SB 388
43–50–31	Amended	417	45	SB 195
43–50–40	Amended	417	46	SB 195
43–51–7	Amended	417	47	SB 195
44–2–191	Amended	621	3	SB 296
44–2–192	Amended	621	3	SB 296
44–2–193	Amended	621	3	SB 296
			4	SB 296
44–2–194	Amended	621	3	SB 296
			4	SB 296
44–2–195	Amended	621	3	SB 296
			4	SB 296
44–3–111	Amended	624	44	HB 1387
44–14–361.1	Amended	618	1	SB 362
44–14–363	Amended	553	1	HB 1147
44–14–518	Amended	553	2	HB 1147
45–1–6	Amended	680	26	SB 17
45–6–3	Amended	615	10	SB 388
45–7–7	Amended	680	27	SB 17
45–8–1	Amended	621	3	SB 296
			4	SB 296
45–8–13.1	Amended	621	4	SB 296
45–8–17	Amended	621	4	SB 296
45–9–4	Amended	418	20	SB 244
		621	2	SB 296
			3	SB 296
45–9–76	Amended	360	1-84	HB 1055
45–9–84.1	Amended	621	2	SB 296
			3	SB 296
45–10–26	Amended	680	28	SB 17
45–10–90	Amended	680	29	SB 17
45–10–91	Amended	680	29	SB 17
45–10–92	Amended	680	29	SB 17
45–10–93	Amended	615	10	SB 388
45–11–8	Amended	458	1	HB 980

Code Section—continued	Effect	Act	Section	Bill/Resolution Number
45–12–71	Amended	391	1	SB 206
45–12–72	Amended	621	3	SB 296
45–12–75	Amended	391	2	SB 206
45–12–78	Amended	621	3	SB 296
45–12–82	Amended	621	3	SB 296
45–12–83.1	Amended	621	2	SB 296
45–12–92	Amended	371	1	HB 1284
45–12–92.1	Added	360	1-84.1	HB 1055
45–12–93	Amended	387	1	SB 421
45–13–22	Amended	615	2	SB 388
45–13–24	Amended	615	3	SB 388
45–13–27	Amended	615	10	SB 388
45–13–41	Amended	615	10	SB 388
45–13–45	Amended	615	11	SB 388
45–14–20	Amended	621	2	SB 296
			3	SB 296
45–14–23	Amended	621	2	SB 296
45–15–35.1	Added	632	37	HB 540
45–16–25	Amended	503	1	HB 1095
45–16–27	Amended	414	3	HB 1322
45–16–32	Amended	503	2	HB 1095
45–18–1	Amended	624	45	HB 1387
45–18–2	Amended	624	45	HB 1387
45–18–5	Amended	624	45	HB 1387
45–18–5.1	Amended	624	45	HB 1387
45–18–5.2	Amended	624	45	HB 1387
45–18–6	Amended	624	45	HB 1387
45–18–7.1	Amended	624	45	HB 1387
45–18–7.2	Amended	624	45	HB 1387
45–18–7.3	Amended	624	45	HB 1387
45–18–7.5	Amended	624	45	HB 1387
45–18–7.6	Amended	624	45	HB 1387
45–18–7.7	Amended	624	45	HB 1387
45–18–7.8	Added	617	1	SB 363
45–18–9	Amended	624	45	HB 1387
45–18–10	Amended	624	45	HB 1387
45–18–12	Amended	624	45	HB 1387
45–18–13	Amended	621	2	SB 296
			3	SB 296
45–18–14	Amended	624	45	HB 1387
45–18–15	Amended	615	10	SB 388
		624	45	HB 1387
45–18–16	Amended	624	45	HB 1387
45–18–20	Amended	624	45	HB 1387
45–18–21	Amended	624	45	HB 1387
45–22–9	Amended	615	10	SB 388
46–2–33	Added	370	1	HB 1233
46–3–427	Amended	621	2	SB 296
46–3–436	Amended	621	2	SB 296
46–3–438	Amended	621	2	SB 296
46–4A–2	Amended	634	1	HB 244
46–4A–12	Amended	634	1	HB 244
46–4A–14	Amended	634	1	HB 244
46–5–70	Amended	360	1-85	HB 1055
46–5–73	Amended	360	1-86	HB 1055
46–5–100	Amended	360	1-87	HB 1055
46–5–134.1	Amended	624	46	HB 1387
46–5–166	Amended	671	3	HB 168
46–5–167	Amended	671	4	HB 168
46–5–222	Amended	671	5	HB 168
46–5–250	Added	671	6	HB 168

Code Section—continued	Effect	Act	Section	Bill/Resolution Number
46–5–251	Added	671	6	HB 168
46–5–252	Added	671	6	HB 168
46–7–3	Amended	447	2	SB 392
46–7–15	Amended	624	46	HB 1387
46–7–26	Amended	624	46	HB 1387
46–7–85.10	Amended	633	31	HB 396
46–7–92	Added	633	32	HB 396
46–8–123	Amended	621	2	SB 296
47–1–5	Amended	621	3	SB 296
			4	SB 296
47–1–7	Amended	681	65	SB 436
47–1–9	Amended	681	2	SB 436
47–1–13.1	Amended	681	64	SB 436
47–1–14	Amended	681	65	SB 436
47–1–62	Amended	457	1	HB 969
47–1–80.1	Amended	457	2	HB 969
47–1–81	Amended	681	64	SB 436
47–1–82	Amended	457	3	HB 969
		681	64	SB 436
47–2–1	Amended	681	3	SB 436
			64	SB 436
47–2–21	Amended	621	3	SB 296
47–2–25	Amended	681	65	SB 436
47–2–26	Amended	681	65	SB 436
47–2–28	Amended	681	4	SB 436
47–2–29	Amended	681	5	SB 436
47–2–58	Repealed and Reserved	681	6	SB 436
47–2–70	Amended	681	7	SB 436
47–2–71	Amended	681	8	SB 436
47–2–72	Amended	681	9	SB 436
47–2–90	Amended	681	10	SB 436
47–2–91	Amended	681	64	SB 436
47–2–95	Repealed	681	11	SB 436
47–2–96	Repealed and Reserved	681	12	SB 436
47–2–96.1	Repealed	681	13	SB 436
47–2–96.2	Repealed	681	14	SB 436
47–2–97	Repealed and Reserved	681	15	SB 436
47–2–110	Amended	455	1	HB 916
			2	HB 916
		681	16	SB 436
47–2–111	Amended	681	17	SB 436
47–2–120	Amended	681	18	SB 436
47–2–123	Amended	681	64	SB 436
47–2–125	Amended	450	1	HB 172
47–2–142	Repealed	681	19	SB 436
47–2–160	Repealed and Reserved	681	20	SB 436
47–2–161	Repealed and Reserved	681	21	SB 436
47–2–166	Repealed	681	22	SB 436
47–2–167	Repealed	681	23	SB 436
47–2–168	Repealed	681	24	SB 436
47–2–180	Repealed and Reserved	681	25	SB 436
47–2–200	Repealed and Reserved	681	26	SB 436
47–2–201	Amended	621	3	SB 296
	Repealed and Reserved	681	27	SB 436
47–2–222	Amended	681	64	SB 436
47–2–224	Repealed	681	28	SB 436
47–2–260	Amended	681	64	SB 436
47–2–261	Repealed and Reserved	681	29	SB 436
47–2–262	Amended	681	30	SB 436
47–2–266	Amended	681	31	SB 436
47–2–290	Amended	681	64	SB 436

Code Section—continued	Effect	Act	Section	Bill/Resolution Number
47–2–292	Amended	681	32	SB 436
47–2–298	Amended	681	33	SB 436
47–2–299	Repealed	681	34	SB 436
47–2–311	Repealed and Reserved	681	35	SB 436
47–2–318	Amended	393	1	HB 320
47–2–319	Repealed and Reserved	681	36	SB 436
47–2–325	Repealed and Reserved	681	37	SB 436
47–2–334	Amended	681	38	SB 436
47–2–352	Amended	681	64	SB 436
47–2–354	Amended	681	39	SB 436
47–3–1	Amended	457	4	HB 969
			5	HB 969
		681	40	SB 436
47–3–21	Amended	621	3	SB 296
47–3–23	Amended	681	65	SB 436
47–3–24	Amended	681	65	SB 436
47–3–27	Amended	681	64	SB 436
47–3–41.1	Amended	457	6	HB 969
47–3–60	Amended	681	41	SB 436
47–3–61	Repealed and Reserved	681	42	SB 436
47–3–65	Amended	681	43	SB 436
47–3–66	Amended	621	2	SB 296
		681	44	SB 436
47–3–67	Amended	621	2	SB 296
		681	45	SB 436
47–3–87	Repealed and Reserved	681	46	SB 436
47–3–93	Amended	457	7	HB 969
47–3–94	Repealed and Reserved	681	47	SB 436
47–3–101	Amended	457	8	HB 969
47–3–122	Amended	457	9	HB 969
			10	HB 969
47–4–2	Amended	681	48	SB 436
47–4–24	Amended	681	65	SB 436
47–4–26	Amended	681	65	SB 436
47–4–60	Amended	621	3	SB 296
47–4–80	Amended	681	49	SB 436
47–4–100	Amended	681	50	SB 436
47–4–106	Amended	457	11	HB 969
47–6–22	Amended	681	65	SB 436
47–6–40	Amended	681	51	SB 436
47–6–41	Repealed and Reserved	681	52	SB 436
47–6–42	Amended	681	53	SB 436
47–7–1	Amended	459	1	HB 1150
			2	HB 1150
47–7–22	Amended	681	65	SB 436
47–7–23	Amended	681	65	SB 436
47–7–61	Amended	459	3	HB 1150
			4	HB 1150
47–7–83	Amended	681	54	SB 436
47–7–100	Amended	459	5	HB 1150
47–7–103	Amended	459	6	HB 1150
47–7–104	Amended	459	7	HB 1150
47–7–124	Amended	459	8	HB 1150
47–7–127	Added	451	1	HB 249
47–7A–1	Repealed	459	9	HB 1150
		681	55	SB 436
47–7A–20	Repealed	459	9	HB 1150
		681	55	SB 436
47–7A–21	Repealed	459	9	HB 1150
		681	55	SB 436
47–7A–22	Repealed	459	9	HB 1150

Code Section—continued	Effect	Act	Section	Bill/Resolution Number
47–7A–22	Repealed	681	55	SB 436
47–7A–23	Repealed	459	9	HB 1150
		681	55	SB 436
47–7A–24	Repealed	459	9	HB 1150
		681	55	SB 436
47–7A–25	Repealed	459	9	HB 1150
		681	55	SB 436
47–7A–40	Repealed	459	9	HB 1150
		681	55	SB 436
47–7A–41	Repealed	459	9	HB 1150
		681	55	SB 436
47–7A–60	Repealed	459	9	HB 1150
		681	55	SB 436
47–7A–61	Repealed	459	9	HB 1150
		681	55	SB 436
47–7A–80	Repealed	459	9	HB 1150
		681	55	SB 436
47–7A–81	Repealed	459	9	HB 1150
		681	55	SB 436
47–7A–82	Repealed	459	9	HB 1150
		681	55	SB 436
47–7A–83	Repealed	459	9	HB 1150
		681	55	SB 436
47–7A–84	Repealed	459	9	HB 1150
		681	55	SB 436
47–7A–100	Repealed	459	9	HB 1150
		681	55	SB 436
47–7A–101	Repealed	459	9	HB 1150
		681	55	SB 436
47–7A–102	Repealed	459	9	HB 1150
		681	55	SB 436
47–7A–103	Repealed	459	9	HB 1150
		681	55	SB 436
47–7A–120	Repealed	459	9	HB 1150
		681	55	SB 436
47–7A–121	Repealed	459	9	HB 1150
		681	55	SB 436
47–7A–122	Repealed	459	9	HB 1150
		681	55	SB 436
47–7A–123	Repealed	459	9	HB 1150
		681	55	SB 436
47–7A–124	Repealed	459	9	HB 1150
		681	55	SB 436
47–7A–125	Repealed	459	9	HB 1150
		681	55	SB 436
47–7A–126	Repealed	459	9	HB 1150
		681	55	SB 436
47–7A–127	Repealed	459	9	HB 1150
		681	55	SB 436
47–8–2	Amended	621	3	SB 296
47–8–41	Amended	681	64	SB 436
47–8–67	Amended	681	64	SB 436
47–11–22	Amended	681	64	SB 436
			66	SB 436
47–11–23	Amended	681	65	SB 436
47–11–40	Amended	681	66	SB 436
47–11–50	Amended	681	64	SB 436
47–12–21	Amended	621	3	SB 296
47–14–23	Amended	681	65	SB 436
			66	SB 436
47–14–72	Amended	681	66	SB 436

Code Section—continued	Effect	Act	Section	Bill/Resolution Number
47–14–77	Amended	453	1	HB 486
47–14–79	Added	453	2	HB 486
47–16–21	Amended	621	3	SB 296
47–16–29	Amended	681	66	SB 436
47–16–41	Amended	681	64	SB 436
47–16–101	Amended	681	64	SB 436
			66	SB 436
47–16–102	Amended	681	64	SB 436
47–17–1	Amended	681	64	SB 436
47–17–23	Amended	681	65	SB 436
47–17–26	Amended	681	66	SB 436
47–17–41	Amended	631	1	HB 974
47–17–80	Amended	631	2	HB 974
47–18–2	Amended	682	1	HB 997
47–18–20	Amended	682	2	HB 997
47–18–21	Amended	682	2	HB 997
47–18–22	Amended	682	2	HB 997
47–18–40	Amended	681	64	SB 436
		682	3	HB 997
47–18–41	Amended	621	3	SB 296
		682	4	HB 997
47–18–43	Amended	682	5	HB 997
47–18–44	Amended	681	64	SB 436
47–18–60	Amended	682	6	HB 997
47–18–70	Amended	682	7	HB 997
47–19–1	Amended	621	3	SB 296
47–20–11	Repealed and Reserved	681	56	SB 436
47–20–12	Repealed and Reserved	681	57	SB 436
47–20–20	Amended	681	58	SB 436
47–20–21	Amended	621	3	SB 296
			4	SB 296
47–20–83.1	Amended	621	3	SB 296
47–21–22	Amended	681	65	SB 436
47–22–4	Amended	681	59	SB 436
47–22–6	Amended	681	65	SB 436
47–22–9	Amended	681	60	SB 436
47–23–25	Amended	681	64	SB 436
47–23–46	Amended	681	61	SB 436
47–23–47	Amended	681	64	SB 436
47–23–49	Repealed and Reserved	681	62	SB 436
47–23–50	Amended	681	63	SB 436
47–23–80	Amended	681	64	SB 436
47–23–81	Amended	621	2	SB 296
		681	64	SB 436
47–23–82	Amended	621	2	SB 296
47–23–124	Amended	681	64	SB 436
47–24–60	Amended	621	2	SB 296
			3	SB 296
47–25–81	Amended	681	66	SB 436
48–1–2	Amended	627	1	HB 1138
48–1–10	Added	396	2	SB 409
48–2–7	Amended	615	10	SB 388
48–2–12	Amended	615	10	SB 388
48–2–15	Amended	615	11	SB 388
48–2–17	Amended	621	2	SB 296
48–2–18	Amended	670	8-1	SB 346
48–2–82	Amended	621	2	SB 296
48–3–3	Amended	624	48	HB 1387
48–3–9	Amended	624	48	HB 1387
48–3–19	Amended	624	48	HB 1387
48–4–5	Amended	624	48	HB 1387

Code Section—continued	Effect	Act	Section	Bill/Resolution Number
48–4–63	Amended	624	48	HB 1387
48–4–78	Amended	624	48	HB 1387
48–5–2	Amended	670	5-1	SB 346
			5-2	SB 346
			5-3	SB 346
			5-4	SB 346
48–5–8	Amended	360	3-1	HB 1055
48–5–9.1	Added	670	9-2	SB 346
48–5–13	Amended	670	4-1	SB 346
48–5–15	Amended	499	1	HB 963
48–5–18	Amended	670	3-1	SB 346
48–5–23	Amended	670	9-1	SB 346
48–5–32.1	Amended	670	10-1	SB 346
48–5–41	Amended	644	1	HB 1186
48–5–41.2	Amended	624	48	HB 1387
48–5–48.3	Amended	624	48	HB 1387
48–5–52	Amended	499	2	HB 963
48–5–131	Amended	621	2	SB 296
48–5–291	Amended	670	4-2	SB 346
48–5–302	Amended	624	48	HB 1387
48–5–303	Amended	670	12-1	SB 346
48–5–304	Amended	621	2	SB 296
		670	11-1	SB 346
48–5–306	Amended	670	1-1	SB 346
48–5–311	Amended	670	2-1	SB 346
			4-3	SB 346
			6-1	SB 346
48–5–330	Amended	621	2	SB 296
48–5–346	Amended	615	10	SB 388
		621	2	SB 296
48–5–380	Amended	670	7-1	SB 346
48–5–421.1	Added	644	2	HB 1186
48–5–478.4	Amended	624	48	HB 1387
48–5–504	Amended	624	48	HB 1387
48–5–504.40	Amended	504	1	HB 1105
48–5B–1	Amended	670	6-2	SB 346
48–6–4	Amended	484	1	HB 1192
48–6–69	Amended	485	1	HB 1191
48–7–1	Amended	483	1	HB 1198
48–7–21	Amended	627	2	HB 1138
48–7–27	Amended	360	4-1	HB 1055
48–7–29.14	Amended	634	1	HB 244
		679	3	HB 1069
48–7–40.29	Added	679	1	HB 1069
48–7–40.30	Added	679	2	HB 1069
48–7–54	Amended	627	3	HB 1138
48–7–60	Amended	615	11	SB 388
48–7–112	Amended	615	10	SB 388
		621	2	SB 296
48–7–140	Repealed	382	1	HB 984
	Added	382	2	HB 984
48–7–141	Repealed	382	1	HB 984
48–7–142	Repealed	382	1	HB 984
48–7–143	Repealed	382	1	HB 984
48–7–144	Repealed	382	1	HB 984
48–7–145	Repealed	382	1	HB 984
48–7–146	Repealed	382	1	HB 984
48–7–147	Repealed	382	1	HB 984
48–7–148	Repealed	382	1	HB 984
48–7–149	Repealed	382	1	HB 984
48–7–167	Added	507	27	HB 1221

Code Section—continued	Effect	Act	Section	Bill/Resolution Number
48–7A–1	Repealed and Reserved	679	4	HB 1069
48–7A–3	Amended	679	5	HB 1069
48–8–2	Amended	507	1	HB 1221
48–8–3	Amended	507	2	HB 1221
48–8–6	Amended	507	3	HB 1221
		554	5	HB 277
		607	1	HB 1393
		624	48	HB 1387
48–8–14	Amended	507	4	HB 1221
48–8–17	Amended	507	5	HB 1221
48–8–17.1	Amended	507	6	HB 1221
48–8–30	Amended	507	7	HB 1221
48–8–31	Amended	507	8	HB 1221
48–8–32	Amended	507	9	HB 1221
48–8–38	Amended	507	10	HB 1221
48–8–39	Amended	507	11	HB 1221
48–8–45	Amended	507	12	HB 1221
48–8–49	Amended	507	13	HB 1221
48–8–50	Amended	507	14	HB 1221
48–8–52	Amended	507	15	HB 1221
48–8–58	Amended	507	16	HB 1221
48–8–59	Amended	507	17	HB 1221
48–8–68	Added	507	18	HB 1221
48–8–69	Added	507	18	HB 1221
48–8–70	Added	507	18	HB 1221
48–8–71	Added	507	18	HB 1221
48–8–72	Added	507	18	HB 1221
48–8–73	Added	507	18	HB 1221
48–8–74	Added	507	18	HB 1221
48–8–75	Added	507	18	HB 1221
48–8–76	Added	507	18	HB 1221
48–8–77	Added	507	18	HB 1221
48–8–82	Amended	507	19	HB 1221
48–8–87	Amended	507	20	HB 1221
48–8–89	Amended	639	1	HB 991
48–8–89.1	Amended	639	2	HB 991
			3	HB 991
48–8–92	Amended	639	4	HB 991
48–8–96	Amended	507	21	HB 1221
48–8–102	Amended	507	22	HB 1221
48–8–104	Amended	507	23	HB 1221
48–8–110.1	Amended	507	24	HB 1221
48–8–113	Amended	507	25	HB 1221
48–8–141	Amended	630	1	HB 1013
48–8–161	Amended	507	26	HB 1221
48–8–200	Amended	507	28	HB 1221
48–8–201	Amended	507	29	HB 1221
48–8–203	Amended	507	30	HB 1221
		679	6	HB 1069
48–8–204	Amended	507	31	HB 1221
48–8–240	Added	554	6	HB 277
48–8–241	Added	554	6	HB 277
48–8–242	Added	554	6	HB 277
		610	3	SB 520
48–8–243	Added	554	6	HB 277
48–8–244	Added	554	6	HB 277
48–8–244.1	Added	554	6	HB 277
48–8–245	Added	554	6	HB 277
48–8–246	Added	554	6	HB 277
48–8–247	Added	554	6	HB 277
48–8–248	Added	554	6	HB 277

Code Section—continued	Effect	Act	Section	Bill/Resolution Number
48–8–249	Added	554	6	HB 277
48–8–250	Added	554	6	HB 277
48–8–251	Added	554	6	HB 277
48–8–252	Added	554	6	HB 277
48–8–253	Added	554	6	HB 277
48–8–254	Added	554	6	HB 277
48–8–255	Added	554	6	HB 277
48–8–256	Added	554	6	HB 277
48–9–3	Amended	607	2	HB 1393
48–9–10	Amended	621	2	SB 296
48–9–36	Amended	621	2	SB 296
48–11–9	Amended	621	2	SB 296
48–11–15	Amended	621	2	SB 296
48–11–16	Amended	621	2	SB 296
48–13–20.1	Added	555	1	HB 1093
48–13–31	Amended	621	2	SB 296
48–13–51	Amended	606	1	HB 903
			2	HB 903
			3	HB 903
48–13–55	Amended	506	17	SB 131
48–14–3	Amended	621	2	SB 296
48–17–1	Amended	360	1-88	HB 1055
		468	1	SB 454
48–17–2	Amended	360	1-89	HB 1055
		468	2	SB 454
48–17–9	Amended	360	1-90	HB 1055
		468	3	SB 454
48–17–11	Amended	360	1-91	HB 1055
		468	4	SB 454
48–17–14	Amended	468	5	SB 454
48–17–15	Amended	468	6	SB 454
48–17–16	Added	468	7	SB 454
49–4–33	Amended	615	10	SB 388
49–4–53	Amended	615	10	SB 388
49–4–82	Amended	615	10	SB 388
49–4–156	Repealed	376	1	HB 1170
	Reserved	376	1	HB 1170
49–4–183	Amended	615	10	SB 388
49–4A–8	Amended	615	10	SB 388
		643	2-20	SB 308
49–5–12	Amended	615	10	SB 388
49–5–19	Amended	615	10	SB 388
49–5–41	Amended	424	1	HB 303
49–5–132	Amended	615	10	SB 388
		621	3	SB 296
49–5–220	Amended	615	11	SB 388
49–5–221	Amended	615	11	SB 388
49–5–273	Amended	615	10	SB 388
49–6–21	Amended	615	10	SB 388
50–1–9	Added	432	1	HB 1019
50–2–28	Amended	379	2	HB 1074
50–4–7	Amended	462	1	HB 1260
50–5–14	Amended	621	2	SB 296
			3	SB 296
50–5–16	Amended	621	2	SB 296
			3	SB 296
50–5–60.3	Amended	368	1-2	HB 981
50–5–60.4	Amended	615	10	SB 388
50–5–67	Amended	615	10	SB 388
50–5–69	Amended	418	21	SB 244
50–5–77	Amended	669	1	SB 194

Code Section—continued	Effect	Act	Section	Bill/Resolution Number
50–5–82	Amended	507	32	HB 1221
50–5–135	Amended	418	22	SB 244
50–5A–1	Amended	621	1	SB 296
50–5A–2	Amended	621	1	SB 296
50–5A–3	Amended	621	1	SB 296
50–5A–4	Amended	621	1	SB 296
50–5A–5	Amended	621	1	SB 296
50–5A–6	Amended	621	1	SB 296
50–5A–7	Amended	621	1	SB 296
50–5A–8	Amended	621	1	SB 296
50–5A–9	Amended	621	1	SB 296
50–5A–10	Amended	621	1	SB 296
50–5A–11	Amended	621	1	SB 296
50–5B–3	Amended	621	2	SB 296
50–6–32	Amended	630	2	HB 1013
		683	1	SB 389
50–7–8	Amended	615	10	SB 388
50–7–16	Amended	621	2	SB 296
50–7–18	Added	547	2	SB 449
50–7–41	Amended	621	2	SB 296
50–7–51	Amended	621	2	SB 296
50–7–70	Amended	360	1-92	HB 1055
50–8–7	Amended	615	10	SB 388
50–8–8	Amended	621	3	SB 296
		634	1	HB 244
50–8–13	Amended	634	1	HB 244
50–8–50	Added	467	1	HB 867
50–8–51	Added	467	1	HB 867
50–8–52	Added	467	1	HB 867
50–8–141	Amended	615	10	SB 388
50–8–170	Amended	634	1	HB 244
50–8–193	Amended	634	1	HB 244
50–9–9	Amended	379	3	HB 1074
50–9–13	Amended	425	1	HB 333
50–10–5	Amended	634	1	HB 244
50–12–64	Repealed and Reserved	547	3	SB 449
50–12–65	Repealed and Reserved	547	3	SB 449
50–12–66	Repealed and Reserved	547	3	SB 449
50–12–67	Repealed and Reserved	547	3	SB 449
50–12–68	Repealed and Reserved	547	3	SB 449
50–12–69	Repealed and Reserved	547	3	SB 449
50–12–69.1	Repealed and Reserved	547	3	SB 449
50–12–84	Amended	615	10	SB 388
50–13–2	Amended	468	8	SB 454
50–16–6	Amended	379	4	HB 1074
50–16–12	Amended	621	2	SB 296
			3	SB 296
50–16–14	Amended	379	5	HB 1074
50–16–18	Amended	505	1-1	HB 1128
50–16–32	Amended	621	3	SB 296
50–16–38	Amended	614	1	SB 455
50–17–2	Amended	621	2	SB 296
			3	SB 296
50–17–21	Amended	621	6	SB 296
50–17–22	Amended	375	1	HB 1258
		621	4	SB 296
50–17–23	Amended	621	3	SB 296
50–17–27	Amended	634	1	HB 244
50–17–50	Amended	621	3	SB 296
			4	SB 296
50–17–51	Amended	621	4	SB 296

Code Section—continued	Effect	Act	Section	Bill/Resolution Number
50–17–52	Amended	621	4	SB 296
50–17–53	Amended	621	4	SB 296
50–17–54	Amended	621	4	SB 296
50–17–56	Amended	621	4	SB 296
50–17–57	Amended	621	4	SB 296
50–17–59	Amended	621	4	SB 296
50–17–62	Amended	621	3	SB 296
			4	SB 296
50–17–63	Amended	621	2	SB 296
			4	SB 296
50–17–101	Amended	621	2	SB 296
50–18–2	Added	615	4	SB 388
50–18–20	Amended	615	5	SB 388
50–18–26	Amended	615	6	SB 388
50–18–27	Amended	615	7	SB 388
50–18–31	Amended	615	8	SB 388
50–18–37	Added	615	9	SB 388
50–18–72	Amended	409	1	HB 1086
			2	HB 1086
		418	23	SB 244
		451	2	HB 249
		643	2-21	SB 308
50–21–33	Amended	621	2	SB 296
			3	SB 296
50–22–2	Amended	545	5	HB 231
50–23–1	Amended	634	1	HB 244
50–23–2	Amended	634	1	HB 244
50–23–3	Amended	634	1	HB 244
50–23–4	Amended	634	1	HB 244
50–23–5	Amended	634	1	HB 244
			1A	HB 244
			2	HB 244
50–23–20	Amended	621	3	SB 296
50–23–25	Amended	634	1	HB 244
50–23–26	Amended	634	1	HB 244
50–23–28.1	Added	397	3	SB 380
50–23–30	Amended	634	1	HB 244
50–23–31	Amended	634	1	HB 244
50–23–32	Amended	634	1	HB 244
50–25–7.10	Amended	615	10	SB 388
50–27–13	Amended	621	3	SB 296
			4	SB 296
50–32–5	Added	554	7	HB 277
50–32–15	Amended	634	1	HB 244
50–32–39	Amended	634	1	HB 244
50–32–54	Amended	621	3	SB 296
50–37–1	Added	669	2	SB 194
50–37–2	Added	669	2	SB 194
50–37–3	Added	669	2	SB 194
50–37–4	Added	669	2	SB 194
50–37–5	Added	669	2	SB 194
50–37–6	Added	669	2	SB 194
50–37–7	Added	669	2	SB 194
50–37–8	Added	669	2	SB 194
51–12–5.1	Amended	621	2	SB 296
52–2–2	Amended	628	1	HB 1060
52–2–3	Amended	628	2	HB 1060
52–2–9	Amended	621	2	SB 296
		628	3	HB 1060
52–2–10	Amended	672	1	HB 958
52–2–11	Amended	628	4	HB 1060

	Effect	Act	Section	Bill/Resolution Number
Code Section—continued
52–2–14	Amended	621	2	SB 296
52–2–19	Amended	628	5	HB 1060
52–2–23	Amended	628	6	HB 1060
52–2–31	Amended	628	7	HB 1060
52–2–33	Amended	628	8	HB 1060
52–2–36	Amended	628	9	HB 1060
52–7–13	Amended	373	2	SB 99
53–4–75	Added	493	1	SB 461
53–7–1	Amended	506	18	SB 131
53–12–1	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–2	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–3	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–4	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–5	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–6	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–7	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–20	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–21	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–22	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–22.1	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–23	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–24	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–25	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–26	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–27	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–28	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–40	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–41	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–42	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–43	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–44	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–45	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–50	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–51	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–52	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–53	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–54	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–55	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–56	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–57	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–58	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–59	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–60	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–61	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–62	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–63	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–64	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–65	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–70	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–71	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–72	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–73	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–74	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–80	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–81	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–82	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–83	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–90	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–91	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–92	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–93	Repealed	506	1	SB 131

Code Section—continued	Effect	Act	Section	Bill/Resolution Number
53–12–94	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–100	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–101	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–102	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–103	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–110	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–111	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–112	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–113	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–114	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–115	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–116	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–120	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–121	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–122	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–123	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–124	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–125	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–126	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–127	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–128	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–129	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–130	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–131	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–132	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–133	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–150	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–151	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–152	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–153	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–154	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–155	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–156	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–157	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–158	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–159	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–170	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–171	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–172	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–173	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–173.1	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–174	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–175	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–176	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–180	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–181	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–182	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–183	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–184	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–190	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–191	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–192	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–193	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–194	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–195	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–196	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–197	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–198	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–199	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–200	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–201	Added	506	1	SB 131

Code Section—continued	Effect	Act	Section	Bill/Resolution Number
53–12–202	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–203	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–204	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–210	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–211	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–212	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–213	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–214	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–215	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–216	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–217	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–218	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–219	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–220	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–221	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–222	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–230	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–231	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–232	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–233	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–234	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–240	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–241	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–242	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–243	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–244	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–245	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–246	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–247	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–250	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–251	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–252	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–253	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–254	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–255	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–256	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–257	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–258	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–259	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–260	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–261	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–262	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–263	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–264	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–265	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–270	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–280	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–281	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–282	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–283	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–284	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–285	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–286	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–287	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–288	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–289	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–290	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–291	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–292	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–300	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–301	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131

Code Section—continued	Effect	Act	Section	Bill/Resolution Number
53–12–302	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–303	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–304	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–305	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–306	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–307	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–308	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–320	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–321	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–322	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–323	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–340	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–341	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–342	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–343	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–344	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–345	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–350	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–351	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–352	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–353	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–354	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–360	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–361	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–362	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–363	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–364	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–370	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–371	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–372	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–373	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–374	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–375	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–376	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–380	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–381	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–390	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–391	Repealed and Reenacted	506	1	SB 131
53–12–392	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–393	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–394	Repealed	506	1	SB 131
53–12–400	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–401	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–402	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–410	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–411	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–412	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–420	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–421	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–422	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–423	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–424	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–425	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–426	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–427	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–428	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–429	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–430	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–431	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–450	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–451	Added	506	1	SB 131

Code Section—continued	Effect	Act	Section	Bill/Resolution Number
53–12–452	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–453	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–454	Added	506	1	SB 131
53–12–455	Added	506	1	SB 131

TABLE OF CONTENTS

Chapter		Page
	PART I. ARREST AND CRIMINAL INVESTIGATIVE PROCEDURE
1.	INTRODUCTION	1
2.	ARRESTS	3
3.	STOP-AND-FRISK	29
4.	SEARCH AND SEIZURE	55
5.	CONFESSIONS AND SELF-INCRIMINATION	109
6.	PRE-TRIAL IDENTIFICATION	133
	PART II. CRIMINAL OFFENSES—ELEMENTS OF A CRIME AND LAW ENFORCEMENT LIABILITY
	ARSON	147
	ASSAULT	153
	BATTERY	164
	CRUELTY TO CHILDREN AND RELATED OFFENSES	170
	DEFENSE OF PROPERTY AND HABITATION	180
	DISORDERLY CONDUCT CRIMES	183
	DRUG-RELATED CRIMES	191
	HOMICIDE	222
	IMPEDING ARREST OR PROSECUTION	266
	LAW ENFORCEMENT DEFENSE	278
	MOTOR VEHICLE CRIMES	281
	PROPERTY DAMAGE CRIMES	324
	RAPE	339
	ROBBERY	354
	SEXUAL OFFENSES AGAINST CHILDREN	362
	THEFT CRIMES	384
	UNLAWFUL EAVESDROPPING AND SURVEILLANCE AND RELATED CRIMES	411
	PART III. CRIMINAL CODE OF GEORGIA, CRIMINAL PROCEDURE, AND MISCELLANEOUS CRIMINAL PROVISIONS
	TITLE 3. ALCOHOLIC BEVERAGES
2.	STATE ADMINISTRATION AND ENFORCEMENT	Codes-1
3.	REGULATION OF ALCOHOLIC BEVERAGES GENERALLY	Codes-3
5.	MALT BEVERAGES	Codes-9
10.	SALE OR POSSESSION OF DISTILLED SPIRITS IN DRY COUNTIES ANDMUNICIPALITIES	Codes-10
	TITLE 4. ANIMALS
3.	LIVESTOCK RUNNING AT LARGE OR STRAYING	Codes-11
8.	DOGS	Codes-11
	TITLE 10. COMMERCE AND TRADE
1.	SELLING AND OTHER TRADE PRACTICES	Codes-13
	TITLE 15. COURTS
8.	CITY COURTS	Codes-14
10.	MAGISTRATE COURTS	Codes-14
11.	JUVENILE PROCEEDINGS	Codes-30

Chapter		Page
13.	OFFICERS OF COURT GENERALLY	Codes-104
16.	SHERIFFS	Codes-106
24.	SEXUAL ASSAULT PROTOCOL	Codes-109
	TITLE 16. CRIMES AND OFFENSES
1.	GENERAL PROVISIONS	Codes-111
2.	CRIMINAL LIABILITY	Codes-113
3.	DEFENSES TO CRIMINAL PROSECUTIONS	Codes-114
4.	CRIMINAL ATTEMPT, CONSPIRACY, AND SOLICITATION	Codes-117
5.	CRIMES AGAINST THE PERSON	Codes-119
6.	SEXUAL OFFENSES	Codes-135
7.	DAMAGE TO AND INTRUSION UPON PROPERTY	Codes-150
8.	OFFENSES INVOLVING THEFT	Codes-167
9.	FORGERY AND FRAUDULENT PRACTICES	Codes-181
10.	OFFENSES AGAINST PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION	Codes-205
11.	OFFENSES AGAINST PUBLIC ORDER AND SAFETY	Codes-216
12.	OFFENSES AGAINST PUBLIC HEALTH AND MORALS	Codes-254
13.	CONTROLLED SUBSTANCES	Codes-284
14.	RACKETEER INFLUENCED AND CORRUPT ORGANIZATIONS	Codes-343
15.	STREET GANG TERRORISM AND PREVENTION	Codes-350
16.	FORFEITURE OF PROPERTY USED IN BURGLARY OR ARMED ROBBERY	Codes-353
17.	PAYDAY LENDING	Codes-355
	TITLE 17. CRIMINAL PROCEDURE
1.	GENERAL PROVISIONS	Codes-358
2.	JURISDICTION AND VENUE	Codes-359
3.	LIMITATIONS ON PROSECUTION	Codes-360
4.	ARREST OF PERSONS	Codes-361
5.	SEARCHES AND SEIZURES	Codes-367
6.	BONDS AND RECOGNIZANCES	Codes-373
7.	PRETRIAL PROCEEDINGS	Codes-387
8.	TRIAL	Codes-403
9.	VERDICT AND JUDGMENT GENERALLY	Codes-410
10.	SENTENCE AND PUNISHMENT	Codes-411
11.	ASSESSMENT AND PAYMENT OF COSTS OF CRIMINAL PROCEEDINGS	Codes-432
12.	LEGAL DEFENSE FOR INDIGENTS	Codes-434
13.	CRIMINAL EXTRADITION	Codes-458
14.	RESTITUTION AND DISTRIBUTION OF PROFITS TO VICTIMS OF CRIMES	Codes-463
15.	VICTIM COMPENSATION	Codes-469
15A.	COMPENSATION FOR CRIMINALLY INFLICTED PROPERTY DAMAGE	Codes-474
16.	DISCOVERY	Codes-475
17.	CRIME VICTIMS' BILL OF RIGHTS	Codes-479
18.	WRITTEN STATEMENTS OF INFORMATION TO VICTIMS OF RAPE OR FORCIBLE SODOMY	Codes-485
	TITLE 19. DOMESTIC RELATIONS
7.	PARENT AND CHILD RELATIONSHIP GENERALLY	Codes-486

Chapter		Page
9.	CHILD CUSTODY PROCEEDINGS	Codes-490
10.	ABANDONMENT OF SPOUSE OR CHILD	Codes-500
10A.	SAFE PLACE FOR NEWBORNS	Codes-502
13.	FAMILY VIOLENCE	Codes-503
15.	CHILD ABUSE	Codes-508
	TITLE 20. EDUCATION
1.	GENERAL PROVISIONS	Codes-515
2.	ELEMENTARY AND SECONDARY EDUCATION	Codes-516
8.	CAMPUS POLICEMEN	Codes-520
	TITLE 24. EVIDENCE
1.	GENERAL PROVISIONS	Codes-522
2.	RELEVANCY	Codes-522
3.	HEARSAY	Codes-523
4.	PROOF GENERALLY	Codes-526
5.	BEST EVIDENCE RULE	Codes-527
9.	WITNESSES GENERALLY	Codes-528
	TITLE 25. FIRE PROTECTION AND SAFETY
2.	REGULATION OF FIRE AND OTHER HAZARDS TO PERSONS AND PROPERTY GENERALLY	Codes-532
	TITLE 27. GAME AND FISH
1.	GENERAL PROVISIONS	Codes-533
4.	FISH	Codes-534
	TITLE 30. HANDICAPPED PERSONS
5.	PROTECTION OF DISABLED ADULTS AND ELDER PERSONS	Codes-535
	TITLE 31. HEALTH
22.	CLINICAL LABORATORIES	Codes-539
	TITLE 32. HIGHWAYS, BRIDGES, AND FERRIES
1.	GENERAL PROVISIONS	Codes-541
6.	REGULATION OF MAINTENANCE AND USE OF PUBLIC ROADS GENERALLY	Codes-541
	TITLE 33. INSURANCE
1.	GENERAL PROVISIONS	Codes-554
	TITLE 35. LAW ENFORCEMENT OFFICERS AND AGENCIES
1.	GENERAL PROVISIONS	Codes-555
2.	DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC SAFETY	Codes-558
3.	GEORGIA BUREAU OF INVESTIGATION	Codes-569
8.	EMPLOYMENT AND TRAINING OF PEACE OFFICERS	Codes-582
	TITLE 37. MENTAL HEALTH
3.	EXAMINATION, TREATMENT, ETC., FOR MENTAL ILLNESS	Codes-593
	TITLE 40. MOTOR VEHICLES AND TRAFFIC
1.	GENERAL PROVISIONS	Codes-597
2.	REGISTRATION AND LICENSING OF MOTOR VEHICLES	Codes-601
3.	CERTIFICATES OF TITLE, SECURITY INTERESTS, AND LIENS	Codes-660
4.	IDENTIFICATION OF AND PURCHASE AND RESALE OF MOTOR VEHICLES ANDPARTS	Codes-679
5.	DRIVERS' LICENSES	Codes-682

Chapter		Page
6.	UNIFORM RULES OF THE ROAD	Codes-746
7.	OFF-ROAD VEHICLES	Codes-802
8.	EQUIPMENT AND INSPECTION OF MOTOR VEHICLES	Codes-803
9.	REPORTING ACCIDENTS; GIVING PROOF OF FINANCIAL RESPONSIBILITY	Codes-821
10.	FORMULATION AND COORDINATION OF STATE AND LOCAL HIGHWAYSAFETY PROGRAMS	Codes-830
11.	ABANDONED MOTOR VEHICLES	Codes-831
12.	ACTIONS AGAINST NONRESIDENTS	Codes-837
13.	PROSECUTION OF TRAFFIC OFFENSES	Codes-839
14.	USE OF SPEED DETECTION AND TRAFFIC-CONTROL SIGNAL MONITORINGDEVICES	Codes-845
15.	MOTORCYCLE OPERATOR SAFETY TRAINING PROGRAM	Codes-850
16.	DEPARTMENT OF DRIVER SERVICES	Codes-851
	TITLE 42. PENAL INSTITUTIONS
1.	GENERAL PROVISIONS	Codes-855
4.	JAILS	Codes-865
8.	PROBATION	Codes-869
	TITLE 43. PROFESSIONS AND BUSINESSES
4B.	GEORGIA ATHLETIC AND ENTERTAINMENT COMMISSION	Codes-878
38.	OPERATORS OF PRIVATE DETECTIVE BUSINESSES AND PRIVATE SECURITYBUSINESSES	Codes-880
	TITLE 45. PUBLIC OFFICERS AND EMPLOYEES
11.	MISCELLANEOUS OFFENSES CONCERNING PUBLIC OFFICERS ANDEMPLOYEES	Codes-888
16.	CORONERS	Codes-890
	TITLE 46. PUBLIC UTILITIES AND PUBLIC TRANSPORTATION
2.	PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION	Codes-905
5.	TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH SERVICE	Codes-906
7.	MOTOR CARRIERS	Codes-917
	TITLE 48. REVENUE AND TAXATION
9.	MOTOR FUEL AND ROAD TAXES	Codes-929
	TITLE 49. SOCIAL SERVICES
4.	PUBLIC ASSISTANCE	Codes-933
4A.	DEPARTMENT OF JUVENILE JUSTICE	Codes-936
	PART IV. GLOSSARY
	INDICES
Index to Part I		Index to Part I-1
Index to Part III		Index to Part III-1

Part I

ARREST AND CRIMINAL INVESTIGATIVE PROCEDURES*

Chapter 1

Introduction

§ 1-1 General considerations
§ 1-2 Scope and purpose

KeyCite®: Cases and other legal materials listed in KeyCite Scope can be researched through the KeyCite service on Westlaw®. Use KeyCite to check citations for form, parallel references, prior and later history, and comprehensive citator information, including citations to other decisions and secondary materials.

§ 1-1 General considerations

The importance of procedure in the area of substantive criminal law has, in recent years, received the attention it so rightly deserves by commentators and textbook writers alike. From a practical standpoint, the practitioner is well aware that cases can be won or lost on procedural grounds. Thus, this book is designed to aid Georgia practitioners in the handling of a criminal case. It is hoped that through the sequential examination of the various stages of the criminal process from arrest to final judgment, the reader will easily be able to find the point of law with which he is concerned.

While this book focuses on Georgia law, attention is given to federal constitutional law. It should be obvious to anyone who has even a passing knowledge of criminal law that in the past few years the Supreme Court's concern with the constitutional aspects of procedure has taken on great, if not a paramount, importance.

Criminal procedure has also been guided and influenced greatly by the federal courts and to a lesser extent by other sources, such as the American Bar Association Standards for Criminal Justice. In view of the importance of procedure in criminal cases, especially in light of the new sources of criminal procedure, many of which are not readily available to the average practitioner, it was felt that there was a need for this book.

§ 1-2 Scope and purpose

This book was conceived as a handbook of Georgia criminal procedure as practiced in our superior courts. Because of the interrelationship between pre-trial and trial practice, it soon became apparent that criminal procedure prior to trial would have to be included. Basically, however, this book remains a guide to those matters relating to trial practice in our courts of general criminal jurisdiction. Efforts have been made to refer to some of the rules and practices in state courts, city courts, or other special courts as those rules affect the trial of criminal cases.

This book is not intended to be, and is not, a book on substantive criminal law. The prosecution and defense of criminal cases are dealt with only in a general manner without any attempt to discuss the particularities of various kinds of prosecutions and their defenses.

Hopefully, this book will be helpful to those who will be involved in the trial of criminal cases.

---

This information is taken from Daniel's Georgia Criminal Trial Practice, 2009-2010 Edition, by Jack Goger (Thomson Reuters, 2009). Footnotes in the original volume were deleted to conserve space and reduce cost.

This Daniel's Georgia Criminal Trial Practice data can also be accessed in its entirety on Westlaw at the sign-on GACRMTRIAL. The Westlaw sign-on GA-HARRISON, Georgia Harrison Analytical Library, contains documents from all available Georgia Harrison Analytical texts published by Thomson Reuters and The Harrison Company.

Chapter 2

Arrests

§ 2-1 Scope
§ 2-2 Definitions of arrest
§ 2-3 Immunity from arrest
§ 2-4 Delay in making an arrest
§ 2-5 Place of arrest
§ 2-6 Procedure for arrest
§ 2-7 Right to resist illegal arrest
§ 2-8 What persons have an officer's power to arrest?
§ 2-9 Overview of prerequisites for warrantless arrests
§ 2-10 Probable cause—General
§ 2-11 Probable cause to arrest
§ 2-12 —Illustrative cases
§ 2-13 Arrest by officer—General
§ 2-14 —Offense committed in presence of officer
§ 2-15 —Offender is trying to escape
§ 2-16 —Act of family violence
§ 2-17 Warrantless arrest by officer—Physical abuse against vulnerable adult
§ 2-18 —Failure of justice
§ 2-19 Arrest warrants
§ 2-20 Magistrates who may issue arrest warrants
§ 2-21 Arrests by a private citizen
§ 2-22 Custody and disposition after arrest
§ 2-23 Extradition of fugitives—The Uniform Criminal Extradition Act
§ 2-24 The exclusionary rule—Background
§ 2-25 —Present application at trial
§ 2-26 — —Good faith of officer conducting search pursuant to warrant
§ 2-27 — —The independent source exception
§ 2-28 — —The inevitable discovery exception
§ 2-29 — —Attenuation
§ 2-30 — —Discovery of prosecution witness
§ 2-31 — —Confessions obtained
§ 2-32 — —Impeachment
§ 2-33 Real evidence discovered as a result of Miranda violation
§ 2-34 The exclusionary rule—Present application—Non-trial proceedings
§ 2-35 — —Civil proceedings

KeyCite®: Cases and other legal materials listed in KeyCite Scope can be researched through the KeyCite service on Westlaw®. Use KeyCite to check citations for form, parallel references, prior and later history, and comprehensive citator information, including citations to other decisions and secondary materials.

§ 2-1 Scope

This chapter involves the law relating to taking a person into custody in connection with a charge of violating a criminal law. The validity of an arrest has taken on new meaning with the federal constitutional application of the exclusionary rule. In addition to the material on arrests contained in this chapter, stop and frisk is discussed in Chapter 3, and search and seizure is discussed in Chapter 4, which contains sections on searches incident to a valid arrest and material on the question of probable cause. Custodial interrogation is discussed in Chapter 5, and Chapter 6 contains some material on arrest and identification procedures.

§ 2-2 Definitions of arrest

At the threshold, it must be understood that the word "arrest" has two distinct meanings. First, there is a common law, or in some states, a statutory meaning. Second, there is the federal constitutional meaning which has been recognized by the United States Supreme Court.

For the common law definition of the word "arrest," the Georgia Court of Appeals has stated:

"An arrest is the taking, seizing, or detaining of the person of another, either by touching or putting hands on him, or by any act indicating an intention to take such person into custody, and which subjects such person to the actual control and will of the person making the arrest. It is sufficient if the arrested person understands that he is in the power of the one arresting and submits in consequence thereof. The taking of another into custody for the purpose of investigating an alleged crime constitutes an arrest." See section 3-2, infra, on what constitutes a seizure.

The Georgia Supreme Court has more concisely said that "a person is under arrest whenever his liberty to come and go as he pleases is restrained, no matter how slight such restraint may be."

In Georgia, as provided by statute, it is not necessary that a person actually be touched in order to be considered arrested. If the person voluntarily submits or gives in on the condition that he will only be allowed his freedom of movement under the direction of the officer, the arrest is complete.

In addition, it has been held that the seizure of one's property from his immediate presence is the functional equivalent of the seizure of his person. This includes the seizure and retention of personal property or money when the authorities do not make it absolutely clear how they plan to reunite the suspect and his possessions at some time and place.

These statements represent the general common-law concept of arrest. However, this is not the present federal constitutional concept of the term "arrest" or the term "custodial arrest."

Under the federal constitutional concept of arrest, a greater degree of intrusion or restraint is required in order to have an arrest than that which was required at common law. For example, a "stop and frisk" in terms of federal constitutional law amounts to a seizure, not to an arrest; and it does not require probable cause. However, in common-law terms a "stop and frisk" at least generally appears to be an arrest. The person frisked is certainly at least slightly restrained. On the other hand, the United States Supreme Court in the Terry case made it clear that the Fourth Amendment applies to "seizures" as well as to arrests.

Thus, from a federal constitutional standpoint, the terms "seizure" and "arrest" or "custodial arrest" together seem to approximate the common-law concept of arrest. That is, the common-law term "arrest" applies, of course, to what the United States Supreme Court has called an "arrest" or "custodial arrest" from a federal constitutional standpoint, but the common-law term "arrest" also encompasses a "stop and frisk" or "seizure" as defined by the Supreme Court.

The nomenclature used by the United States Supreme Court is important because a "seizure" or "stop and frisk" is valid if based on reasonable suspicion, which is grounded upon specific and articulable facts, judged against an objective standard. However, when such a "search" is permissible the "search" accompanying such a seizure is much more restricted than in the case of a search incident to a lawful "arrest," as that term is used by the Supreme Court. There may not be a federal constitutional "arrest" in the absence of probable cause, but if there is probable cause (and the arrest is otherwise valid) the search conducted incident to such an arrest may be much broader than in the "stop and frisk" or "seizure" situation. However, where a person thought to be only an eyewitness to a shooting was asked to wait in the back of a police car until he could be questioned about the shooting, and the "witness" made an incriminating statement when a detective approached 17 minutes later, the court concluded that from a federal constitutional standpoint the seizure was reasonable and a less severe intrusion than a traditional arrest and thus declined to suppress the statement.

In State v. Corbett, the court held that whether or not a person has been constitutionally arrested depends upon "whether a reasonable person in the suspect's position would have thought the detention would not be temporary." In State v. Davis, Judge Johnson pointed out that "[a] person has been 'seized' within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment only if, in view of all of the circumstances surrounding the incident, a reasonable person would have believed that he was not free to leave. Examples of circumstances that might indicate a seizure, even where the person did not attempt to leave, would be the threatening presence of several officers, the display of a weapon by an officer, some physical touching of the person . . ., or the use of language or tone of voice indicating that compliance with the officer's request might be compelled."

It should be noted, however, that notwithstanding the foregoing, not every custodial restraint of an individual by a police officer will constitute an "arrest." A person taken into custody pursuant to an order of civil protective custody is not "arrested." In Lindsey v. State, for example, an individual who was detained, placed in handcuffs and into a police cruiser and secured while being served with a civil order authorizing the individual's detention for purposes of a mental evaluation was not deemed under "arrest" for purposes of a Fourth Amendment challenge to contraband found during the search.

In Miranda v. State, in an opinion by Judge, now Chief Justice, Benham, the Court of Appeals said there are at least three kinds of police-citizen encounters: (1) verbal encounters involving no coercion or detention, (2) brief "stops" or "seizures" which must be accompanied by reasonable suspicion, and (3) "arrests" which must be supported by probable cause.

In Quinn v. State, the court pointed out that "[n]ot all encounters between police officers and citizens involve seizures which implicate Fourth Amendment protections. . . . '[E]ven when officers have no basis for suspecting a particular individual, they may generally ask questions . . .; [and] ask to examine the individual's identification . . .;—as long as the police do not convey a message that compliance with their requests is required.' "

See section 3-2 et seq., infra, on facts justifying a stop and frisk and what constitutes a seizure.

§ 2-3 Immunity from arrest

Certain persons while performing or preparing to perform official duties may only be arrested for certain offenses. For example, such limited immunity from arrest applies to members of the General Assembly, and militiamen. The federal Constitution provides for this type of immunity from arrest for members of Congress and diplomats of a foreign nation; their families and staffs enjoy a broader immunity under a federal statute.

See section 2-20, infra, on arrest of peace officers.

§ 2-4 Delay in making an arrest

While it is often said that an officer is under a duty to arrest a defendant immediately without a warrant where a crime is committed in his presence, it is established in Georgia, and under the federal Constitution, that a defendant has no general right to an immediate arrest. The United States Supreme Court has held that the Sixth Amendment right to a speedy trial does not apply until the defendant has been indicted or arrested. However, in United States v. Lovasco, the Court has acknowledged that the due process clause "has a limited role to play in protecting against oppressive delay." If such a due process violation is asserted and there is "proof of actual prejudice" then it is said that the due process claim is ripe for adjudication, but this does not make the claim automatically valid. A delay for purposes of further investigation normally "does not deprive . . . [a defendant] of due process, even if his defense might have been somewhat prejudiced by the lapse of time." A defendant is entitled to a dismissal of his indictment where the delay is taken by the prosecution as "an intentional device to gain tactical advantage over the accused." The Court in Lovasco concluded that a good faith investigative delay of one and one half years did not amount to a due process violation. However, in determining whether or not a delay in obtaining an indictment after an arrest violates the Sixth Amendment right to a speedy trial, the Georgia Supreme Court has applied a less rigorous standard. The Georgia court has evaluated such a delay by the Barker v. Wingo standard which the United States Supreme Court has applied to a delay in trial after indictment. This standard is discussed in section 14-65, infra. Nevertheless, from a federal constitutional standpoint the general rule is that "[t]here is no constitutional right to be arrested."

While some states have considered a delay in arrest as a due process violation, it has been said that a dismissal of an indictment is required for pre-arrest or pre-indictment delay only if it is shown that (1) the delay caused substantial prejudice to the defendant's right to a fair trial and that (2) the delay was an intentional device to gain a tactical advantage over the defendant. Thus, it has been held that where a delay only results in a defendant's loss of ability to recall his whereabouts at the time of the alleged offense, the indictment will not be dismissed if there is no indication that the arrest was delayed in order to gain a tactical advantage over the defendant.

Additionally, even prior to Chimel v. California, it was held that an officer has no right to use such a delay as an excuse to wait until a defendant is at a particular place which the officer wishes to search incident to an arrest. However, if the officer waits to arrest for the purpose of giving the offender an opportunity to repeat the offense, such conduct alone is not objectionable.

§ 2-5 Place of arrest

Georgia provides by statute that, where necessary, an officer with a valid arrest warrant may break into a home to arrest a concealed offender. However, generally an officer has no right in the execution of a search warrant or a warrantless arrest to "break" the door in to arrest a defendant, without first stating his authority and purpose for demanding admission.

In United States v. Watson, the Supreme Court held that there may be a warrantless arrest of a suspect in a public place if the officer has probable cause to believe that the suspect has committed a felony. In Payton v. New York, the Court further held that an officer has no right to arrest a suspect in the suspect's home without an arrest warrant in the absence of exigent circumstances. However, Payton does not prevent a warrantless arrest in a common hallway of an apartment house, or where a defendant "is sitting on his porch," nor does it prevent an arrest in a defendant's home where the officer attempted to stop the defendant outside his home only to have the defendant retreat into his home. Likewise, in Kendrick v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals held that a warrantless arrest effected after a valid consent to enter the home is not a Payton violation. Nevertheless, in United States v. Winchenbach, the court held that when officers have a search warrant for the defendant's residence and have probable cause to arrest him, they may arrest the defendant in his home without an arrest warrant.

In Welsh v. Wisconsin, the United States Supreme Court held that officers had no right to a warrantless entry of a defendant's home to arrest him for a non-jailable traffic offense in order to preserve evidence of his intoxication in the absence of other exigency. The Wisconsin Supreme Court had concluded that there were exigent circumstances based on the need to obtain a test of the blood alcohol level of the defendant and hot pursuit. The United States Supreme Court found that "there was no immediate or continuous pursuit of the . . . [defendant] from the scene of a crime," and thus no hot pursuit. The Court also held "that an important factor to be considered when determining whether any exigency exists is the gravity of the underlying offense for which the arrest is being made. Moreover, although no exigency is created simply because there is probable cause to believe that a serious crime has been committed, . . . application of the exigent-circumstances exception in the context of a home entry should rarely be sanctioned when there is probable cause to believe that only a minor offense . . . has been committed."

In State v. Nichols, an officer arrested the defendant in his father's home. The defendant backed into a car in the yard and when ordered to stop, he fled into the house. The court affirmed the validity of the arrest pointing out that "hot pursuit" need not involve a high speed chase.

In McCauley v. State, deputies responded to a domestic dispute where they found the wife of the defendant outside the residence crying and upset. She indicated that the defendant had been drinking and had struck and threatened her and their four-month-old infant. With the consent of the wife, the deputies entered the house and determined that the defendant was so impaired as to endanger the child. The appellate court affirmed the conviction, finding that the exigent circumstances justified the warrantless arrest of defendant in his home.

In Steagald v. United States, the United States Supreme Court held that an officer with an arrest warrant has no right to enter the home of a third party to search for the defendant unless the officer also has a search warrant to search the premises of the third party without his consent, or unless there are exigent circumstances.

In King v. State, a Georgia county deputy searched the residence of a third party in an attempt to execute an arrest warrant. The officer had been previously informed by the defendant that the person named in the arrest warrant no longer lived at that residence and was given permission by the defendant to search personal items of the former tenant that had been left at the residence. The court found that when the officer returned a second time, the fact that the defendant "started to back up in the doorway" and seemed "agitated" did not create exigent circumstances. Hence, it was error for the trial judge to deny a motion to suppress marijuana observed by the deputy in plain view after the officer entered the house.

The Eleventh Circuit in United States v. Bulman, while recognizing that there may be a lesser expectation of privacy in a motel room than a home, concluded that the Payton rule applied to the arrest of a defendant in his motel room. However, the Steagald rule is intended to protect the third party, whose home has been searched, and not the defendant who is arrested. Hence, it has been held where a defendant is arrested pursuant to an arrest warrant in a third party's home, without a search warrant, the defendant has no standing to move to suppress firearms and ammunition observed in plain view at the time of his arrest.

In United States v. Reed, the court said that the following factors may be considered in determining whether or not exigent circumstances exist to arrest a defendant in his home without an arrest warrant: (1) the gravity or violent nature of the offense; (2) whether the suspect is reasonably believed to be armed; (3) "a clear showing of probable cause . . . that the suspect committed the crime"; (4) a "strong reason to believe that the suspect is in the premises being entered"; (5) "a likelihood that the suspect will escape if not swiftly apprehended"; and (6) the peaceful circumstances of the entry by the officer.

In United States v. Segura, the Second Circuit found invalid the warrantless security check of the defendant's seventeenth floor apartment after his arrest in the lobby of the building.

§ 2-6 Procedure for arrest

In situations where a lawful arrest cannot be made without a warrant, the officer should have the warrant in his possession at the time of the arrest or so near at hand that it can be exhibited on demand. It has been said that an officer derives no authority or power from a warrant unless he has it with him and can display it. O.C.G.A. § 17-4-20 provides that an officer has a right to arrest with or without a warrant (1) if the offense was committed within his presence or within his immediate knowledge, or (2) if the offender is endeavoring to escape, or (3) if the officer has probable cause to believe an act of family violence has been committed, or (4) for other cause if there is likely to be a failure of justice from the want of a duly authorized officer to issue a warrant, or (5) if the officer has probable cause to believe that an offense involving physical abuse has been committed against a vulnerable adult who is defined as being a person 18 years old or older who is unable to protect himself or herself from physical or mental abuse.

In the absence of one of the five instances above, an officer generally has no right to arrest for a violation of a municipal ordinance or a misdemeanor unless the officer has a warrant in his possession at the time of the attempted arrest. This is said to be true because the officer is bound to have the warrant ready to be produced if asked for. For example, in Croker v. State, the court said that where the offense involved was a misdemeanor not committed in the presence of the officer and flight was not involved, the officer had no authority to arrest the defendant even though a warrant had been issued because the warrant was not accessible to the officer at the time. In the case of a felony, it is not necessary for the officer to have the warrant in his possession in order to make a valid arrest. Also, an officer may arrest without a warrant pursuant to O.C.G.A. § 17-4-20(a) or with probable cause. See section 2-13, infra. However, under Georgia law it has been held that if the officer wishes to arrest the defendant without a warrant, he should do so promptly. Without a warrant and in the absence of exigent circumstances, there is no right to make an arrest in a person's home. Moreover, even when an officer has an arrest warrant, the general rule requires that the officer knock and announce his presence before entering. See section 2-19, infra, on arrest warrants.

While it is provided by Georgia statute that where an officer has a warrant he may "break open the door of any house where the offender is concealed," and it is recognized that an officer may use such force as is reasonably necessary to arrest, nevertheless, he is not authorized to use any more force than is reasonably necessary. But see section 2-5, supra, on place of arrest. It has also been recognized that an officer may use more force to accomplish an arrest for a felony than for a misdemeanor.

In Tennessee v. Garner, the United States Supreme Court held a statute violative of the Fourth Amendment which permitted officers to use deadly force to prevent the escape of a suspected felon. The Court said that deadly force may not be used unless necessary to prevent escape and the officer has probable cause to believe that the suspect poses a significant threat of death or grave injury to the officer or others. In the case of a misdemeanor, an officer has no right to shoot merely to prevent his escape. This rule applies equally to an arrest for a violation of a municipal ordinance. However, even in the case of a misdemeanor, "in order to overcome declared, open and armed resistance to [the] execution of . . . [a warrant, an officer may] use such force as may be reasonably necessary to effect the arrest."

In 1986, Georgia added to O.C.G.A. § 17-4-20 a provision stating that an officer "may use deadly force to apprehend a suspected felon only when the officer reasonably believes that the suspect possesses a deadly weapon or any object, device, or instrument which, when used offensively against a person, is likely to or actually does result in serious bodily injury; when the officer reasonably believes that the suspect poses an immediate threat of physical violence to the officer or others; or when there is probable cause to believe that the suspect has committed a crime involving the infliction or threatened infliction of serious physical harm. Nothing in this Code section shall be construed so as to restrict such sheriffs or peace officers from the use of such reasonable nondeadly force as may be necessary to apprehend and arrest a suspected felon or misdemeanant."

Unless the person to be arrested knows that the person attempting to arrest him is an officer, the officer should notify him of his authority. Likewise, the person to be taken into custody should be notified of the offense with which he is being charged. If the officer has an arrest warrant, he should tell the suspect by what authority he is being arrested or should display the warrant to the accused. However, if a suspect knows he is being lawfully arrested by an officer, it is the duty of the suspect to submit quietly.

In the case of any offense involving a violation of any law or ordinance involving the operation, licensing, registration, maintenance or inspection of a motor vehicle, the officer may arrest by issuance of a citation if the offense was committed in the presence of the officer. If the offense results in an accident, an investigating officer may issue a citation regardless of whether the offense occurred in his presence. Also, a citation may be issued if the offense occurred before another officer. Any citation issued "shall enumerate the specific charges against the person and the date upon which the person is to appear and answer the charges." If the offense occurred before another officer, "the citation shall list the name of each officer and each must be present when the charges against the accused person are heard."

In Atwater v. City of Lago Vista, the United States Supreme Court held that an officer in Texas may, under the federal constitution, arrest the driver of an automobile for not wearing a seat belt even though the failure to utilize a seat belt is a non-jailable misdemeanor punishable only by a fine of not less than $25.00 or more than $50.00. Although the law permits officers to issue citations in lieu of arrest, the court pointed out that "the standard of probable cause 'applie[s] to all arrests, without the need to 'balance' the interests and circumstances involved in particular situations.' "

See Criminal Arrest in Georgia, Institute of Government, University of Georgia (1979), p. 34.

§ 2-7 Right to resist illegal arrest

Certain limitations exist on the power of an officer to arrest an individual. If the arrest is illegal and proceeds so far as to constitute an assault, the alleged offender may resist with such force as is reasonably necessary to prevent his arrest. However, an assault against an arresting officer is not justified unless the officer assaulted the person first. It is generally held that the killing of an individual who is illegally arresting another is manslaughter rather than murder. However, if the arresting officer intended to kill that individual prior to the attempted illegal arrest in order to effect the arrest, such a killing may amount to murder. The "law provides no right to resist a legal arrest." Where an arrest is unlawful, the person making the arrest may be subject to an action for damages and a possible action under the Civil Rights Act.

However, in Green v. State, a majority of the Court of Appeals held that where a person is charged with obstruction of a police officer, and his sole defense is that the arrest was illegal, it is not error for the trial judge to refuse to give a charge that "[e]very person has the right to resist an illegal arrest . . .," if the trial judge charges the essential elements of the obstruction offense requiring the state "to prove the lawfulness of the arrest in order to prove an essential element of the offense."

See section 2-11, infra, on probable cause to arrest.

§ 2-8 What persons have an officer's power to arrest?

Ordinarily the word "officer," for purposes of making an arrest, denotes a peace officer who is authorized by statute to make an arrest. An arrest by a security guard or a private citizen, or a citizen's arrest, is discussed in section 2-21, infra.

It should be noted that Georgia has provided by statute that no peace officer shall exercise the power to arrest if the officer has not complied with the Georgia Peace Officer Standards and Training Act. Also, in Holstein v. State the court held that an officer who has not completed the requirements of the Training Act may not obtain a search warrant. However, in Davis v. State the court held that an officer who has completed the training requirements of the statute may arrest even though he has not yet received his certification.

In Williams v. State, the court held that a federal DEA agent had no authority as an officer to make an arrest for a misdemeanor; however, the agent had the same right as any other citizen to arrest an offender who is committing a misdemeanor in his presence.

O.C.G.A. § 17-4-25 provides in part as follows:

"(a) Under a warrant issued by a judicial officer, an arresting officer may, in any county without regard to the residence of the arresting officer, arrest any person charged with a crime. It is the duty of the arresting officer to take the accused, with the warrant under which he was arrested, to the county in which the offense is alleged to have been committed, for examination before any judicial officer of that county."

This section does not apply to city police officers, but does apply to state officers and county police.

In Watkins v. State, the court held that under exigent circumstances a deputy sheriff has authority to make a warrantless arrest beyond the limits of his county.

See generally 6A C. J. S. Arrest § 17. See section 2-21, infra, on the authority of a private citizen to arrest, and section 2-20, infra, on arrest of peace officer. Generally, see section 2-13 et seq., infra, on arrest by an officer.

§ 2-9 Overview of prerequisites for warrantless arrests

In order to have a valid "stop and frisk" or "seizure" of a person in a federal constitutional sense, it is not necessary for an officer to have probable cause. An articulable suspicion is sufficient. See Chapter 3, infra. However, in order to have a valid arrest, the Fourth Amendment requires that there must be probable cause to believe that the suspect has violated the law, or is violating the law in the officer's presence. See section 2-2, supra, on the definition of an arrest.

By statute, Georgia has stated that an officer may arrest in five situations. However, the absolute prerequisite, which is sometimes lost sight of, is that from a federal constitutional standpoint an arrest is not valid unless there is probable cause, regardless of whether the situation falls within one of the five provisions of the Georgia statute authorizing an officer to make a warrantless arrest.

On the other hand, to have a valid arrest in the common law or Georgia tradition, one of the five statutory requirements must exist. Section 2-13 et seq., infra, discuss the question of whether or not one or more of the statutory requirements for an arrest can exist when there is no probable cause.

In summary, to have a valid arrest from both the federal constitutional and common law standpoint, there must first be probable cause. However, if one of the five situations of the Georgia statute exists there may be a valid "seizure" or "stop and frisk" in the federal constitutional sense, even in the absence of probable cause, if there is an articulable suspicion justifying the action.

§ 2-10 Probable cause—General

The Fourth Amendment provides as follows:

"The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized."

In Wong Sun v. United States, the Supreme Court stated that regardless of whether an arrest is made with a warrant or without a warrant, such an arrest "must stand upon firmer ground than mere suspicion . . . though the arresting officer need not have in hand evidence which would suffice to convict. The quantum of information which constitutes probable cause—evidence which would 'warrant a man of reasonable caution in the belief' that a felony has been committed . . . must be measured by the facts of the particular case." In Brown v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals said the "test of probable cause is whether it would justify a man of reasonable caution in believing that an offense has been or is being committed, and this requires merely a probability—less than a certainty but more than a mere suspicion or possibility." In arrests and searches the test, or requirement, of probable cause is objective; it is not a matter to be established by expert opinion nor a question of what the officer thought. However, "the judgment of seasoned officers should be treated with deference." Because of their expertise, these officers are 'able to perceive and articulate meaning in given conduct which would be wholly innocent to the untrained observer.' "

The same quantum of evidence is required to establish probable cause to arrest and probable cause to search. However, there are some different factual aspects of the two. In the case of an arrest without an arrest warrant, probable cause generally must exist before the arrest to believe that the particular person committed or is committing a particular offense, and there is little concern about whether or not the information is stale or current.

However, in the case of a search it is not necessary to name any person. A search and seizure is directed at a place. There is no constitutional requirement that a search warrant name the person who owns or has possession of the premises. In the case of a search there must be probable cause to believe that whatever is sought will be found at the place to be searched. Hence, the information may not be stale.

Lastly, it should be pointed out that even where there is probable cause to arrest a man, this does not mean that there is automatically probable cause to search his home, or place of business. Likewise, if there is probable cause to search a building, this does not mean that there is automatically probable cause to arrest the owner.

§ 2-11 Probable cause to arrest

As previously pointed out, in section 2-9, supra, there can be no valid arrest in the federal constitutional sense unless there is probable cause. And, shown in the last section, probable cause deals with probabilities, not certainties.

How is probable cause obtained? First of all:

"In order to have probable cause to make a warrantless arrest on the basis of personal observation, the presence of the peace officer at the place of observation, and the manner of observing, must be lawful, and this rule applies even where observations are made without entry into a private enclosure." In other words, the information used to establish probable cause must have been legally obtained.

Probable cause to arrest without a warrant has been said to be "a practical, non-technical conception affording the best compromise . . . for accommodating . . . often opposing interests. Requiring more would unduly hamper law enforcement. To allow less would be to leave law-abiding citizens at the mercy of the officers' whim or caprice."

In Lewis v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court said "[t]he test of probable cause is whether it would justify a person of reasonable caution in believing that an offense has been or is being committed, and this requires probability which is less than a certainty but more than mere suspicion or possibility."

Nevertheless, the factual basis supporting an officer's assessment of probable cause is at least as stringent as that which is applied when a magistrate weighs the facts in determining whether or not to issue an arrest warrant.

Probable cause must exist at the time of the arrest. In Vaughn v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court said:

"Whether that arrest was constitutionally valid depends in turn upon whether, at the moment the arrest was made, the officers had probable cause to make it—whether at that moment the facts and circumstances within their knowledge and of which they had reasonably trustworthy information were sufficient to warrant a prudent man in believing that the . . . [defendant] had committed or was committing an offense."

In determining whether or not probable cause to arrest exists, an officer may also consider what he knows, what he has seen, and what he has smelled. Thus, in Berry v. State, the court held that an officer, who had a degree in chemistry, who had received special training in drug identification, who knew the odor of hydrochloric acid, and who knew that hydrochloric acid is used to process cocaine and heroin, had probable cause to arrest a person fitting the drug courier profile when he detected the odor of hydrochloric acid. See section 3-4, infra, on drug courier profile.

In State v. Batty, a trial court's order finding that a police officer lacked probable cause to arrest the defendant for driving while intoxicated was affirmed where it appeared that the only objective evidence of impairment was the odor of alcohol. Although the stop of the defendant's motor vehicle was authorized because of a traffic violation, the trial court ruled that her arrest was not proper after she satisfactorily completed several field sobriety tests.

In Banks v. State, the court stated that "[f]light in connection with other circumstances may be sufficient probable cause to uphold" a warrantless arrest. In State v. Willis, the court held that where a defendant initially consented to a search and he then fled, these facts, "coupled with . . . [the defendant's] evasive answers regarding his presence in [a] high-crime area, would authorize a finding of probable cause to believe that the bulge in . . . [the defendant's] jacket pocket was contraband. . . ."

The standard for determining reliability of victims and informers in establishing probable cause for a warrantless arrest seem to be the same as in the case of evaluating an affidavit to determine probable cause for a search warrant. See section 4-7 et seq., infra, and see also 6A C. J. S. Arrest § 28 et seq.

In appraising the trustworthiness of information, and when an officer has to determine whether or not he has probable cause, the standard is an objective one, and subjective good faith alone is not sufficient. However, the known facts and reasonable inferences drawn therefrom may be evaluated from the standpoint of the expertise of the trained and experienced officer.

It must be remembered that it has been held that probable cause may rest upon the collective knowledge of the police when there is some degree of communication between them, rather than solely on the information possessed by the officer who actually makes the arrest. In Paxton v. State, the court pointed out that an NCIC printout is enough to establish probable cause to arrest. However, it must be remembered that under the rule of Whiteley v. Warden, if the officers initiating the NCIC report relating to the defendant did not themselves have probable cause, the arrest pursuant to the NCIC report would not be valid. But in United States v. Hensley, a stop-and-frisk situation, the United States Supreme Court held that the collective knowledge concept applies to police departments in two different states where the two departments are not engaging in a joint investigation. In Hensley, a "wanted flyer" was issued in Ohio and the stop was made in Kentucky. The Court did not discuss the lack of communication between the two different police departments involved but concluded that the "flyer" itself constituted articulable suspicion justifying a stop. See Chapter 3, infra, on stop and frisk. See section 2-26, infra, on the applicability of the exclusionary rule where there is a mistake in the indexing of a warrant.

The following section contains a discussion of some cases which have considered the problems of determining when probable cause exists.

See Chapter 3, infra, on an articulable suspicion justifying a stop or stop and frisk. See section 3-12, infra, for stop or arrest for the violation of a statute later determined to be unconstitutional. See section 2-19, infra, on arrest warrants.

§ 2-12 Probable cause to arrest—Illustrative cases

The case of Brinegar v. United States has been widely cited and relied on in discussing what facts are needed to constitute probable cause to arrest. In Brinegar, a government agent had parked beside a highway about five miles from a state line. The defendant drove by. The agent recognized the defendant and the car. The vehicle was proceeding in a direction away from a state in which liquor could be purchased and in the direction of an area where there was a demand for liquor even though the state was dry. The agent had arrested the defendant five months earlier for transporting liquor, had seen him loading liquor in a vehicle in the adjoining state at least twice in the last six months and knew he had a reputation for hauling liquor. The car seemed to be heavily loaded. The defendant tried unsuccessfully to outrun the agent. When the agent approached the car, he called the defendant by name and asked him how much liquor he had this time. The defendant told him not much. There was a case on the front seat which was visible or was covered with a lap robe. The Court concluded that there was probable cause to arrest the defendant.

In Beck v. Ohio, police officers who had received unspecified "information" and "heard" about the defendant and who "knew what he looked like" and knew that he had a gambling record, stopped the defendant as he was driving an automobile. Without an arrest or search warrant, the officers placed him under arrest and searched his car, finding nothing of interest. They took him to a police station, where they found some clearinghouse slips on his person, for the possession of which he was subsequently tried. The Court held that no probable cause for petitioner's arrest had been shown, and therefore the arrest, searches, and seizure of the slips were invalid.

In Maryland v. Pringle, the Supreme Court found that officers had probable cause to arrest the front-seat passenger of a vehicle where $763 was found in the car's glove compartment and cocaine was found in the backseat of the auto. The Court determined that the officer's discovery of the money and cocaine in their respective locations gave rise to the reasonable inference that the passenger "had knowledge of, and exercised reasonable control over, the cocaine." In addition, the Court distinguished Ybarra v. Illinois on the grounds that passengers in a private automobile will often be involved in a common enterprise, unlike a patron in a public tavern.

In Draper v. United States, a "special employee" of the Bureau of Narcotics, proven to be reliable in the past, informed a federal agent that the defendant, who was engaged in selling narcotics, was returning to Denver on a certain train and would be wearing certain articles of clothing. The Supreme Court upheld the conviction of Draper, stating that probable cause for arrest exists where an officer receives and corroborates very detailed information from a regular and reliable informer.

In Smith v. State, the court held that "where an informant supplies the information to one officer who then relays it to a fellow officer," the question of whether this information may be used to establish probable cause revolves around the reliability of the informant. Where the informant is found to be reliable, probable cause exists for the second officer. "However, where the officer receiving the tip could not establish the credibility of the informant, probable cause [is] not demonstrated." (Emphasis by the court.) See section 4-8 et seq., infra, on informers.

In Wells v. State, the court held that a tip from a reliable informant when corroborated by the personal observation of an investigating officer is sufficient to establish probable cause.

In Taylor v. Alabama, all of the members of the United States Supreme Court agreed there was no probable cause to arrest Taylor. The facts are summarized as follows: "In 1978, a grocery store in Montgomery, Ala., was robbed. There had been a number of robberies in this area, and the police had initiated an intensive manhunt in an effort to apprehend the robbers. An individual who was at that time incarcerated on unrelated charges told a police officer that 'he had heard that . . . Omar Taylor was involved in the robbery. . . .' This individual had never before given similar information to this officer, did not tell the officer where he had heard this information, and did not provide any details of the crime. This tip was insufficient to give the police probable cause to obtain a warrant or to arrest. . . ." Two officers arrested Taylor without a warrant. He was given Miranda warnings and fingerprinted. It was determined that his fingerprints matched prints found in the grocery. Based on this information, a warrant was obtained while Taylor was being interrogated. Taylor confessed.

The Court pointed out that the fingerprint information was obtained as a result of Taylor's illegal arrest and the arrest warrant was not valid. Since the confession was obtained through custodial interrogation after an illegal arrest, it was held to be inadmissible.

In Hill v. California, officers had sufficient evidence to constitute probable cause to arrest Hill. They went to his apartment without a warrant of any kind. When the officers knocked on a door, a man named Miller went to the door and was arrested. He fit the description of Hill but denied that he was Hill. He presented identification showing that he was Miller and said he was waiting for Hill. He said he knew nothing about any stolen property or guns, but there was a pistol in plain view on a coffee table. The officers were unimpressed with his explanation (which later proved to be true) and the search which they conducted produced evidence which the prosecution later sought to use in Hill's prosecution. The Court held that the officers reasonably mistook Miller for Hill, so Miller's arrest and the resulting search were valid. However, in Commonwealth v. Collini, the Pennsylvania Superior Court pointed out that while a reasonable mistaken belief may give probable cause to arrest, an unreasonable mistaken belief will not provide probable cause for an arrest.

In Morris v. State, the court held "that the defendant's failure to accurately repeat . . . [his] birthday and . . . social security number was sufficient evidence of a false identity as to provide probable cause" to arrest the defendant for giving a false name to a law enforcement officer. See section 3-12, infra, on when a "stop" becomes an "arrest."

In Ledesma v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court held probable cause to arrest was justified where Georgia officers received a teletype message from Missouri police that a named person was wanted for a felony in that state and the Georgia officers reasonably believed an arrest warrant had been issued in Missouri.

In Alex v. State, the court held that where a defendant refused to voluntarily submit to a search, when validly stopped, officers were authorized to detain him for a reasonable time in which to obtain a search warrant. Also, where under these circumstances the defendant pushed past the agents and shoved an officer with his forearm, the officers had probable cause to arrest him for battery and obstruction of an officer and to search him pursuant to the valid arrest. See section 4-26, infra.

In Little v. State, the defendant became a suspect in connection with the crimes of kidnapping and auto theft. There was no probable cause to arrest the defendant in connection with these crimes. The investigative officer found an old arrest warrant for the defendant on an unpaid traffic fine and arrested the defendant on that warrant so that he could be questioned about the kidnapping and the theft. He was given Miranda warnings, questioned and placed in a lineup where he was identified. The Georgia Court of Appeals held the arrest was valid and the evidence obtained as a result of the arrest was admissible.

In Hamilton v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals, in considering probable cause to arrest, said "the officers were aware that a robbery had taken place less than an hour earlier. The manager-victim was able to identify a black sedan containing three passengers as transporting the probable robbers. A driver's license found at the scene established that Hamilton was probably one of the robbers or at least was present, and that Hamilton probably was driving a black 1967 or 1968 Plymouth Fury. At about 2:00 a.m., the officer saw a 1967 or 1968 black Plymouth Fury with three passengers less than an hour after the robbery about a mile from the scene of the robbery and the car gave indications of attempted evasion. Under such facts we have no hesitancy in concluding the officers had reasonable cause to stop the car and arrest its occupants."

However, in United States v. Roper, the Eleventh Circuit concluded that there was not probable cause to arrest the defendant for federal bail jumping at the time the defendant was stopped in an automobile. In this case, an Atlanta police officer saw a bail bondsman's flyer containing "a picture of Roper, his description, his driver's license number, a description of his automobile, and his auto tag number." The same day the officer saw a vehicle matching the description and the tag number described in the flyer. He confirmed through a radio check that the tag number was registered to Roper. However, the court concluded that the facts demonstrated an articulable suspicion justifying a stop. See section 3-7, infra, on articulable suspicion justifying a stop.

In Chambers v. Maroney, the United States Supreme Court summarized the facts of the case as follows:

"During the night . . . a . . . service station . . . was robbed by two men, each of whom carried and displayed a gun. The robbers took the currency from the cash register. . . . Two teenagers, who had earlier noticed a blue compact station wagon circling the block in the vicinity of the . . . station, then saw the station wagon speed away from a parking lot close to the . . . station. At the same time, they learned that the . . . station had been robbed. They reported to police, who arrived immediately, that four men were in the station wagon and one was wearing a green sweater. Kovacich told the police that one of the men who robbed him was wearing a green sweater. A trench coat and incriminating evidence was found in a search of the car. A description of the car and the two robbers was broadcast over the police radio. Within an hour, a light blue compact station wagon answering the description and carrying four men was stopped by the police about two miles from the . . . station. [The defendant] . . . was one of the men in the station wagon. He was wearing a green sweater and there was a trench coat in the car. The occupants were arrested [and incriminating evidence was found in a search of the car]." The Court concluded there was probable cause to arrest.

In Davis v. State, officers found an abandoned plane at a rural airport about 8:30 p.m. A wing of the plane had been damaged, and the door was open. The plane contained a number of bales of marijuana. About 7:00 a.m. the following morning, one of the officers discovered Davis walking on a highway about two-and-a-half miles from the airport. He wore nice clothes, but they seemed to be torn and ragged. The officer stopped Davis and found his clothes contained grass stains, were wet, and had a distinctive odor which smelled like the interior of the plane. The appellate court concluded there was probable cause to arrest Davis.

In State v. Williams, the court affirmed the trial court in finding there was no probable cause to arrest where the officer at the suppression hearing "testified that based on the following factors, he believed he had probable cause to transport Williams to the DEA office and procure a warrant to search him: (1) travel characteristics consistent with drug trafficking; (2) incorrect phone number given to Miami ticket agent; (3) manifestations of nervousness; (4) inconsistent answers regarding whom he was visiting in Miami; and (5) the roll of plastic wrap in his backpack." However, the appellate court concluded that "[w]hile these factors may give rise to a reasonable suspicion of illicit drug activity, they are insufficient even when combined to constitute probable cause to believe a suspect is transporting drugs."

Generally, an officer has no right to arrest a person merely because that person was present at the scene of the crime. However, in United States v. Ashcroft, the Fifth Circuit held that the agents had probable cause to arrest a man for conspiracy where he was present at two separate major cocaine transactions which were conducted in private.

In Corbitt v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals found there was probable cause to arrest where an officer received information about drug transactions in a certain park, went to the park, and from a concealed position saw the defendant "lighting a half-used portion of [a] cigarette . . . holding it pinched between two fingers and drawing on it . . . in a different manner than you would a regular cigarette." The officer believed the defendant was smoking marijuana. He approached the defendant who moved his hand behind him and when he brought his hand in front of him, there was nothing in it. "A search of the area immediately behind the bench on which . . . [the defendant had been] sitting revealed a portion of what . . . [the officer] believed to be a marijuana cigarette." The defendant was then arrested.

In Scott v. State, at about 10:00 p.m. an officer received a telephone tip that three people were standing in front of a house known for drug sales on a designated street known as an area of drug activity. Officers immediately drove to the area in an unmarked patrol car. The three men separated on seeing the patrol car. The defendant started walking across the street. He was stopped by an officer who conducted a pat-down search. The court concluded that there was probable cause to believe the defendant had possession of contraband or was a party to possession. Scott could have been decided on the basis of articulable suspicion and stop and frisk since there was a frisk and a hard object justifying a search.

In Copeland v. State, the court pointed out that "[f]light in connection with other circumstances may be sufficient probable cause to uphold a warrantless arrest. . . . " Copeland was in an area known for "a high level of illegal drug use, had been walking in a suspicious manner with a suspected drug dealer, had walked away . . . when the officer attempted to question him, had admitted he was on parole, had voiced despair and run when asked if he had a weapon, and had pulled objects from his pockets and discarded them." The foregoing established probable cause to believe the defendant was committing a crime. In Bigby v. State, the court affirmed the trial court in finding that a "trained officer's detection of the odor of marijuana, together with . . . [the defendant's] flight . . . provided probable cause for his arrest."

In Howie v. State, there was evidence that the defendant "matched the physical description of the suspect which had been broadcasted on the police radio," but the description of the clothing did not exactly match those worn by the defendant. The defendant was "spotted across the street from the scene of the crime within minutes after it occurred, and he began to run when he saw the police officers." The appellate court affirmed the trial judge's ruling that there was probable cause to arrest the defendant.

In Williams v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals concluded that there was probable cause to arrest. In this case, officers knew of a number of burglaries in which coins and jewelry were taken. In one burglary, Susan B. Anthony dollars and Kennedy half-dollars had been taken. All the burglaries were in Baldwin County between August and November inclusive. One morning in November, four brothers who frequently patronized a store apparently in Milledgeville purchased gasoline and beer with Kennedy half-dollars and Susan B. Anthony dollars. The clerk obtained the tag number of the vehicle and gave a description of the four occupants to the police.

Likewise, in Horton v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals in a five-to-four decision held that there was probable cause to arrest the defendant. After one Dodson attempted to cash a stolen check in an A & P, he fled the store and walked directly to and conversed with the defendant before leaving in opposite directions. The store manager observed both men and unequivocally identified the defendant as the apparent aider and abettor, thereby providing probable cause to arrest.

In Gober v. State, the court held that when a gun of the same type as the murder weapon was found in the defendant's bedroom and the officers knew the defendant had used the victim's cellular telephone after the victim's death, there was probable cause to arrest the defendant.

In Johnson v. State, the defendant's arrest for driving on a suspended license was supported by probable cause despite the fact that the officer was advised that the defendant had not been served with notice of the suspension of his license. The court reasoned that once the officer observed the defendant driving, pulled him over for a headlight violation and then learned of the defendant's suspension, he then had sufficient probable cause to arrest the defendant. The court rejected Johnson's contention that the suspension was not effective since he did not receive written notice and concluded that actual or constructive notice would be sufficient. Furthermore, the court held that the officer should not be rendered powerless simply because he lacked information as to whether the defendant had actual or constructive knowledge and therefore, that he had probable cause to proceed with the arrest.

See Sheldon J. Shapiro, Annotation, "What Constitutes Probable Cause for Arrest—Supreme Court Cases," 28 L.Ed.2d 978 (1972). See section 2-14, infra, on other cases illustrating probable cause. See section 3-2 et seq., infra, on facts justifying a stop.

§ 2-13 Arrest by officer—General

In considering the question of warrantless arrests there are two possible considerations. Historically, the first concern was the provisions of a Georgia statute authorizing warrantless arrests under certain circumstances. The second concern addresses the question of whether or not the circumstances establish probable cause which authorized an arrest under the federal Constitution.

Except in the case of extradition matters, Georgia, by statute, authorizes warrantless arrests, as defined by the common law and Georgia authorities. Warrantless arrests may only be made in five situations which are set out in O.C.G.A. § 17-4-20(a). This section provides as follows:

"(a) An arrest for a crime may be made by a law enforcement officer either under a warrant or without a warrant if the offense is committed in such officer's presence or within such officer's immediate knowledge; if the offender is endeavoring to escape; if the officer has probable cause to believe that an act of family violence, as defined in O.C.G.A. § 19-13-1, has been committed; if the officer has probable cause to believe that an offense involving physical abuse has been committed against a vulnerable adult, who shall be for the purposes of this subsection a person eighteen years old or older who is unable to protect himself or herself from physical or mental abuse because of a physical or mental impairment; or for other cause if there is likely to be failure of justice for want of a judicial officer to issue a warrant."

This statute has been construed to be a codification of the common law with perhaps a slight enlargement of the power of arrest. It has been applied to all officers authorized to arrest and applied to violations of municipal ordinances, to misdemeanors, and to felonies.

Both the Georgia courts and the federal courts have expressed a preference for arrests pursuant to a warrant.

However, the United States Supreme Court has been reluctant to make such a preference a general constitutional mandate when the arrest is in public and is based on probable cause. But see section 2-5, supra, on the place of arrest.

In 1981, in Vaughn v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court pointed out that the federal constitutional standard for a warrantless arrest is less "stringent" than the requirements of O.C.G.A. § 17-4-20. However, in the 1982 landmark case of Durden v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court concluded that "dual inquiries, one under federal law and one under state law, serve no useful purpose and result in complicating the law. . . . [W]e find the state rule to be the same as the federal rule. An arrest and search, legal under federal law, are legal under state law." (Emphasis added.) In short, the court held that if an officer has probable cause, he may arrest. In 1984, in Bodiford v. State, the Court of Appeals said that an arrest which is valid under the federal Constitution is valid in Georgia regardless of whether the statutory requirements have been met.

Georgia has a statute found in O.C.G.A. § 40-8-91 which requires the "marking" of motor vehicles used to make arrests for traffic violations. However, the statute has been held not to invalidate traffic arrests made in unmarked vehicles.

As discussed in section 2-11, supra, an officer has probable cause to arrest in the federal constitutional sense if at the time of the arrest the facts and circumstances, within the knowledge of the officer, and of which he had reasonably trustworthy information, were sufficient to warrant a prudent person in believing that the defendant had committed or was committing an offense, he has probable cause to arrest.

Lastly, it should be remembered that a violator of the law has no right to be promptly arrested. See section 2-4, supra.

See Kurtz, Criminal Offenses and Defenses in Georgia (4th ed.), p. 514. See section 2-5, supra, on place of arrest, and section 2-6, supra, on procedure for arrest.

§ 2-14 Arrest by officer—Offense committed in presence of officer

First, it should be kept in mind that an officer has no right to arrest, under both Georgia and federal law, unless there is probable cause. However, in federal constitutional terms, there may be a valid stop and frisk or "seizure" based on reasonable suspicion, grounded upon specific and articulable facts, judged against an objective standard. The federal "stop and frisk" is not an arrest.

Next we come to the question of what justifies a warrantless "arrest" in common law or traditional Georgia terms where the offense is committed in the presence of the officer. The Georgia statute authorizes a warrantless arrest if the offense is committed in the presence of the officer. However, the Georgia courts are no longer restricted by this statute. Generally, if there is probable cause for the arrest, an officer may arrest. If there is no probable cause, an officer may not arrest. See section 2-13, supra. However, in Carranza v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court held that where an offense is committed in a defendant's home in the presence of or in the immediate knowledge of an officer, there can be no arrest in that home unless there has been consent for the officer to enter or there are exigent circumstances. See section 2-5, supra, on place of arrest.

For example, in Rockholt v. State, probable cause to arrest was found where officers, while searching the premises of a drug supplier pursuant to a valid warrant, observed the defendant drive up and hurriedly attempt to leave when he saw the search in progress. The facts were sufficient to cause the officers to believe that the crime of possession of drugs was being committed in their presence. On the other hand, in Stanley v. State, the court concluded that there was not probable cause to arrest where police investigators had arranged to purchase four ounces of MDA and during the transaction undercover officers heard a horn sound continuously and saw the driver of the car motioning them over. Such actions were not sufficient for the officer to reasonably conclude that the defendant was in possession of MDA and thus committing a crime in the officer's presence.

See Kurtz, Criminal Offenses and Defenses in Georgia (4th ed.), p. 514. See section 2-11 et seq., supra, on probable cause to arrest.

§ 2-15 Arrest by officer—Offender is trying to escape

As noted in the previous section, an arrest may not be conducted in the absence of probable cause. However, a stop and frisk or "seizure," which does not rise to the level of an "arrest," may properly be conducted under the Constitution if it is based on reasonable suspicion, grounded upon specific and articulable facts, and judged against an objective standard.

With these important tenets in mind, we will explore what has justified a warrantless "arrest" in common law or traditional Georgia terms where the offender is attempting to escape.

The Georgia statute provides that an officer may arrest without a warrant if the offender is trying to escape or endeavoring to avoid arrest. It has been previously held that this exception does not apply where an offender simply fails to surrender to authorities. Based on this reasoning it was felt that the evidence must clearly show that the offender was attempting to escape immediately. Thus, it has been held that a policeman had no right to arrest a defendant simply because he walked away and refused to answer questions.

Probable cause has been recognized as playing an important part under the statute in Watson v. State. In this case, the court said that where the suspect was attempting to drive away in a car and officers had "sufficient facts and circumstances within their knowledge, based on reasonably trustworthy information, sufficient to warrant a prudent man in believing that the defendant had committed an offense [bank robbery]," an officer could validly stop the car.

Under the literal wording of Vaughn v. State and Bodiford v. State, the Georgia courts have brushed aside the statute on arrest and are now relying solely on the federal constitutional rule giving an officer the right to arrest whenever there is probable cause and not limiting this right by our statute. See section 2-13, supra.

See Kurtz, Criminal Offenses and Defenses in Georgia (4th ed.), p. 514.

§ 2-16 Arrest by officer—Act of family violence

In 1981, Georgia adopted a family violence act and in the process amended O.C.G.A. § 17-4-20. The amendment provides that an officer may arrest with or without a warrant if he has probable cause to believe that an act of family violence, as defined in O.C.G.A. § 19-13-1, has been committed. Presumably the words "probable cause" in the statute mean the same thing these words mean in the Fourth Amendment.

§ 2-17 Warrantless arrest by officer—Physical abuse against vulnerable adult

Effective January 1, 1998, O.C.G.A. § 17-4-20 authorizes an officer to arrest if the officer "has probable cause to believe that an offense involving physical abuse has been committed against a vulnerable adult," who is defined as a person 18 years of age or older and who is unable, either mentally or physically, to protect himself from physical or mental abuse.

§ 2-18 Warrantless arrest by officer—Failure of justice

It bears repeating that the right of arrest, in the federal constitutional sense, requires probable cause. However, the right to stop and frisk or "seize" requires something less: reasonable suspicion, grounded upon specific and articulable facts, judged against an objective standard.

Against this background, we will consider the question of what justifies a warrantless "arrest" in common law or traditional Georgia terms where, under the requirements of O.C.G.A. § 17-4-20, "for other cause there is likely to be failure of justice for want of a judicial officer to issue a warrant."

In 1966, in Croker v. State, the court referred to this "failure of justice" clause as being obscure. In the 1982 landmark case of Durden v. State, the court abandoned the Georgia arrest statute and held that any arrest valid under federal law is valid under Georgia law. In other words, if an officer has probable cause, he may arrest. If he does not have probable cause, he may not arrest. See section 2-13, supra. In Fortson v. State, the court pointed out "that if an officer acquires probable cause to arrest an accused outside his home, a failure of justice is likely to occur as a matter of law if the officer delays the arrest until a warrant is obtained."

See Kurtz, Criminal Offenses and Defenses in Georgia (4th ed.), p. 514.

§ 2-19 Arrest warrants

An arrest warrant has been said to consist of both an affidavit and a direction to an officer to arrest an offender and present him before a judicial officer. An affidavit and/or information must be presented to a magistrate before a valid warrant may be issued.

The verified facts presented to the magistrate need not all be set out in the affidavit, but such additional facts may be given in verified oral testimony or in another affidavit. However, the purpose of the verified facts submitted to a judicial officer is to present sufficient facts to enable the magistrate to make a judicial determination of whether or not there is probable cause to believe that a suspect is guilty of the offense charged.

O.C.G.A. § 17-4-41 requires that the affidavit contain the county in which the offense was committed, the time and date it was committed, the place of the offense, the party against whom the offense was committed, and a statement describing the offense. If the offense is theft, the affidavit must also describe the property alleged to have been stolen, the name of the owner, the value of such property, and the name of the person from whose possession the property was taken.

According to the statute, it "is the intent of these requirements that the accused person shall be informed of the specific charge against him and of all basic pertinent particulars pertaining thereto." While older cases have held that a general charge of "misdemeanor" is sufficient where a defendant is accused of committing a misdemeanor, it appears that such a "description" is no longer adequate under the statute.

The Fourth Amendment requires that a warrant "particularly describ[e] . . . the persons . . . to be seized." A warrant not naming the person to be arrested must describe him with some degree of certainty. A "John Doe" warrant without the name of the person to be arrested or such a description is not valid.

It has been held that an otherwise sufficient arrest warrant is not void because the affidavit fails to specify the time of day that the occurrence took place. However, a warrant which does not state the time other than the date, the place other than the county, or the party against whom the offense was committed, and does not describe the offense more specifically than as "passing a worthless check" is void. An affidavit which merely states the conclusion of a prosecutor, for example, that a defendant has exhibited a certain film which is obscene, is also insufficient. In Devier v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court held that the (verified) information supplied to the magistrate must be sufficient to establish probable cause, but the basis of the probable cause does not have to be established in the affidavit alone. It is sufficient if the affidavit and other verified information are sufficient to establish probable cause.

However, there is some relaxation of these requirements in extradition warrants. Thus, in 1975, the Georgia

Supreme Court held that an affidavit for an arrest warrant need not contain evidentiary facts. In Smith v. Stynchcombe, the Georgia Supreme Court stated that "the probable cause requirements of an affidavit on which a search warrant is issued" do not apply to arrest warrants. The court concluded that it should "require no more of a South Carolina arrest warrant affidavit than we do in Georgia." (Emphasis added.) The court, in support of its position, cited an earlier extradition case which held that an affidavit for arrest in an extradition situation need only comply with the provisions of the Uniform Criminal Extradition Act, a statute which requires less detailed information than the present Georgia law for arrest warrants. Generally, see section 2-23, infra, and also 31A Am. Jur. 2d, Extradition § 59 and 35 C. J. S. Extradition § 16.

In addition to relaxed warrant requirements, it should be pointed out that in an extradition matter, no warrant is necessary in order to have a valid arrest. See section 2-23, infra.

In the federal area, the United States Supreme Court has held that the Fourth Amendment requirement of probable cause applies to both arrest warrants and search warrants. The Supreme Court, in Whiteley v. Warden, stated that before a warrant for either an arrest or search can issue, there must be sufficient information presented to the judicial officer to enable him to make "an independent judgment that probable cause exists for the warrant." The Court noted that when an arrest warrant is issued, it must meet the same probable cause requirements as a search warrant. Generally, see 5 Am. Jur. 2d Arrest § 12 et seq.

A mere conclusory statement that an accused is engaged in criminal activity is not valid. According to the United States Supreme Court, an affidavit is insufficient where it does not affirmatively state "that the affiant spoke with personal knowledge of the matters contained therein; it does not indicate any sources for . . . [affiant's] belief; and it does not set forth any other sufficient basis upon which a finding of probable cause could be made."

As previously pointed out in this section, an affidavit or verified information is presented before a magistrate so that he may determine whether or not probable cause exists. However, Georgia provides by statute that in making this decision the magistrate may also consider the facts which he knows. If there is probable cause, the magistrate may ordinarily issue an arrest warrant.

However, if the arrest warrant is for the arrest of a peace officer for any offense alleged to have been committed while in the performance of his duties, such a warrant "may be issued only by a judge of a superior court, a judge of a state court, or a judge of a probate court."

A form for an arrest warrant is set out in the Code

In Watts v. Cannon, the court held that an arresting officer, who was acting on reliable information that there was an outstanding felony warrant against the defendant, could arrest the defendant even though the officer did not have the warrant. The court cited and relied on a number of United States Supreme Court cases in justifying its conclusion. However, it should be kept in mind that the United States Supreme Court held, in Whiteley v. Warden, that where an arrest is made on a warrant which the officer learned about in a radio bulletin, the arrest is illegal unless the warrant was supported by probable cause. See section 2-26, infra, on arrest where warrant is quash or invalid.

In State v. Stringer, the court said "[t]he primary purpose of the bench warrant is to secure the presence of the defendant in court. Once the defendant appears in court, the bench warrant . . . has no force and effect."

O.C.G.A. § 17-4-47 was enacted in 1998. It provides that a judge may conduct applications for the issuance of arrest warrants by video conference. The video conference arrest warrant applications shall be conducted in such a manner that the judge conducting the hearing has visual and audible contact with all affiants and witnesses giving testimony.

For affidavit for arrest and an arrest warrant, see Goger, Daniel's Georgia Criminal Trial Practice Forms (6th ed.), § 4-58. See section 2-6, supra, on procedure for arrests and section 2-5, supra, on place of arrest.

§ 2-20 Magistrates who may issue arrest warrants

While there does not seem to be a Georgia case on the precise point, apparently a valid arrest warrant may only be issued by a neutral, detached magistrate. A unanimous United States Supreme Court held that where justices of the peace received five dollars for each search warrant issued, but nothing if they denied the application, the justices of the peace were neither neutral nor detached. This matter is discussed further in section 4-6, infra.

O.C.G.A. § 17-4-40 provides in part as follows: "Any judge of a superior, city, state, or magistrate court, or any municipal officer clothed by law with the powers of a magistrate may issue a warrant for the arrest of any offender against the penal laws, based on probable cause either on the judge's or officer's own knowledge or on the information of others given to the judge or officer under oath. Any retired judge or judge emeritus of a state court may likewise issue arrest warrants if authorized in writing to do so by an active judge of the state court of the county wherein the warrants are to be issued. . . . Any warrant for the arrest of a peace officer, law enforcement officer, teacher, or school administrator for any offense alleged to have been committed while in the performance of his or her duties may be issued only by a judge of a superior court, a judge of a state court, or a judge of a probate court." See section 4-2, infra, on search and seizure of documentary evidence in an attorney's possession.

§ 2-21 Arrests by a private citizen

O.C.G.A. § 17-4-60 provides as follows:

"A private person may arrest an offender if the offense is committed in his presence or within his immediate knowledge. If the offense is a felony and the offender is escaping or attempting to escape, a private person may arrest him upon reasonable and probable grounds of suspicion."

The foregoing Code section has been said to be a codification of the preexisting law. However, some distinctions have been pointed out between the statute and the common law.

The words of the statute, "in his presence" and "within his immediate knowledge" have been held to be synonymous. It has been held that where a suspect admits his guilt of shoplifting to the manager of the store, this places the commission of the crime within the immediate knowledge of the manager.

A citizen's arrest cannot be made for a mere violation of a city ordinance committed in the citizen's presence. If a misdemeanor is committed in the presence of a private citizen, he has a right of arrest if he arrests the offender at that time. However, if he does not immediately arrest, "his power to do so at all is gone." The statute apparently authorizes a citizen's arrest for a felony committed in the citizen's presence. Moreover, as Professor Kurtz points out, a private citizen may arrest upon probable cause if the offense involved was a felony and the offender is escaping or attempting to escape. However, he concludes by saying, "It would appear that no other citizens' arrest where the offense was committed outside the citizen's presence is authorized by Georgia law." The arrest powers of a private citizen are not increased because he has an arrest warrant. Despite the authority of a private citizen to arrest, there is no "legal duty on a private citizen to restrain or constrain someone who is drunk or otherwise impaired."

The authority of a citizen's arrest is extended by Georgia statutes to different types of security guards. Under the Georgia Private Detective and Security Agencies Act enacted in 1981, licensees or registrants under the Act have the same authority to arrest as private citizens, which is the authority to arrest for any violation of a misdemeanor or felony which occurs in their presence or within their immediate knowledge. Moreover, if the offense is a felony and the offender is escaping or attempting to escape a licensee or registrant may arrest upon probable cause.

A police officer generally has no greater authority to arrest outside of the city which employs him than a private citizen. However, if a city officer is in pursuit of an offender and unable to arrest him until he has left the city limits, the arrest is valid. However, in Glazner v. State, a majority of the Court of Appeals held that a municipal officer may arrest for traffic violations outside the city, even when not in hot pursuit for an offense committed in the city. Also a county police officer may arrest for a felony in another county if he has probable cause.

If a private person arrests a person, he must "without any unnecessary delay, take the person arrested before a judicial officer . . . or deliver the person and all effects removed from him to a peace officer of this state." If such a suspect is turned over to a law enforcement officer, the officer may take custody of the person arrested even if the officer has no such personal knowledge of the offense as would enable him to arrest the person without a warrant.

See Kurtz, Criminal Offenses and Defenses in Georgia (4th ed.), p. 514. Generally, see section 2-8, supra, on persons who may exercise an officer's power to arrest. Also, generally, see 5 Am. Jur. 2d Arrest §§ 34-36, 6A C. J. S. Arrest §§ 12-15, and Criminal Arrest in Georgia, Institute of Government, University of Georgia (1979), page 28 et seq.

§ 2-22 Custody and disposition after arrest

There are special statutory limitations relating to custody where an arrest is made by some officers with limited authority to arrest, and these statutory provisions do not follow a consistent pattern.

Where there is such a limitation, usually it is the duty of the arresting person to turn the suspect over to an officer having a general power of arrest. The preceding section discussed the disposition of a suspect who is arrested by a private citizen.

When a person is taken into custody, he is to be "booked" at the detention facility. It is the responsibility of the person having supervision over the facility to see that the name, age, and address of all persons arrested is recorded on appropriate records which are generally open to public inspection. However, generally, booking is not regarded as a part of the arrest process and a delay in booking or its absence will not affect a prior valid arrest. In Franks v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court limited the "booking exceptions" to Miranda and the Fifth Amendment "to requests for basic biographical data, such as the suspect's name, age, address, educational background, marital status, and other information required to complete an arrest form." See section 5-13, infra, on booking questions.

As a part of an officer's duty of keeping a suspect safe after arrest, officers may adopt reasonable measures to provide for the identification and recapture of a person in custody. Thus, officers generally are regarded as having the right to photograph the suspect as well as to take his measurements, weigh him and fingerprint him. In Rivers v. State, the court held that it is not necessary to obtain a defendant's consent before his photograph is taken. General questions asked incident to arrest and booking are not regarded as the functional equivalent of questioning, as that term is used in Miranda. However, in Morris v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals stated that booking procedures are not per se exempt from the custodial interrogation requirements of Miranda. Thus, in Franks v. State, the court reversed the trial judge's admission of a statement made by defendant at booking in response to a question about how the defendant's arm was injured.

Also, there seems to be a general right to search a suspect at the detention facility, and, at least in serious cases, it seems that an officer has a right to have the prisoner remove his clothing. In the 1999 case of Taylor v.

State, the court held that it was reasonable that a female defendant could be ordered to remove her clothes by a female employee of a jail as part of the booking process if directed to do so by a police officer who had reason to believe the defendant had contraband hidden beneath her clothes. See section 5-13, infra, on interrogation.

In Illinois v. Lafayette, the United States Supreme Court held that officers may search the personal effects of a person under lawful arrest as part of the routine administrative procedure at a police stationhouse incident to booking and jailing the suspect. The court pointed out the "[p]olice conduct that would be impractical or unreasonable—or embarrassingly intrusive—on the street can more readily—and privately—be performed at the station . . . . [I]t is entirely proper for police to remove and list or inventory property found on the person or in the possession of an arrested person who is to be jailed . . . . A standardized procedure for making a list or inventory as soon as reasonable after reaching the stationhouse not only deters false claims but also inhibits theft or careless handling of articles taken from the arrested person. Arrested persons have also been known to injure themselves—or others—with belts, knives, drugs or other items on their person while being detained . . . . It is immaterial whether the police actually fear any particular package or container; the need to protect against such risk arises independently of a particular officer's subjective concerns." In this case, a shoulder bag was searched, and the Court concluded that, while the bag could have been sealed as a unit in a bag or box, the Constitution did not require such a less intrusive inventory. The same rule seems to apply to the search of a wallet at the police station. See section 4-26, infra, on the right to search a person incident to a lawful arrest.

In Sears v. State, the defendant was being booked into jail, and an officer conducting a routine inventory thumbed through a notebook, saw the word "killed," and seized the notebook. The defendant moved to suppress the notebook on the ground that private papers are not subject to seizure under O.C.G.A. § 17-5-21(a). The court affirmed the refusal of the trial judge to suppress. The court concluded that the term "private papers" is restricted to papers covered by privilege, such as attorney-client or doctor-patient.

In Carter v. State, the court held that where a defendant is arrested and in jail, the clothing worn by him at the time of arrest can be seized for evidence and searched without a warrant even if the clothing is no longer worn by the defendant and has been placed in the evidence room.

Georgia provides by statute that in all cases of arrest without a warrant, "the person arresting shall, without delay, convey the offender before the most convenient judicial officer authorized to receive an affidavit and issue a warrant . . . . No such imprisonment shall be legal beyond a reasonable time allowed for this purpose; and any person who is not brought before such judicial officer within 48 hours of arrest shall be released" "from imprisonment or custody until a warrant is obtained . . . ." However, the failure to have a commitment hearing within 48 hours does not render a conviction invalid nor does it automatically render a confession obtained during such unlawful detention inadmissible.

In the case of persons arrested pursuant to an arrest warrant, the officer "shall exercise reasonable diligence in bringing the person arrested before the judicial officer authorized to examine, commit, or receive bail and in any event to present the person arrested before a committing judicial officer within 72 hours after arrest. The accused shall be notified as to when and where the commitment hearing is to be held. An arrested person who is not notified before the hearing of the time and place of the commitment hearing shall be released." However, it should be noted that the statute does not actually require the holding of the commitment hearing within 72 hours but only requires that the suspect be brought before a magistrate during that time. Moreover, and perhaps in a more practical vein, the failure to have a timely commitment hearing is not generally a basis for dismissal of an indictment, and if an accused is indicted by a grand jury, without ever having had a preliminary hearing, this alone will not prevent a valid conviction at trial.

O.C.G.A. § 42-4-14 provides that Georgia jailers must make a reasonable effort to determine the nationality of the prisoners in their custody and the legality of their status. If the jailer finds that the prisoner is not in the country legally, he is to notify the United States Department of Homeland Security.

See sections 4-26 and 4-27, infra, on search of person and area incident to an arrest. See section 4-56, infra, on scope and intensity of searches. See section 2-25, infra, for cases holding that illegal arrest is no bar to prosecution.

§ 2-23 Extradition of fugitives—The Uniform Criminal Extradition Act

The basic provision for the interstate extradition of fugitives from justice is found in the Constitution of the United States, Article IV, Section 2, Paragraph 2: "A Person charged in any State with Treason, Felony, or other Crime, who shall flee from Justice, and be found in another State, shall on Demand of the executive Authority of the State from which he fled, be delivered up, to be removed to the State having Jurisdiction of the Crime." To implement this constitutional requirement, Georgia and most other states have enacted the Uniform Criminal Extradition Act, while the federal government has enacted a similar statute.

The Uniform Act places an affirmative constitutional duty on the governor of any state in which a fugitive is found to have him arrested and delivered up to the authorities of the state from which he fled. By law, a demand for extradition must be in writing and must allege (except in cases arising under O.C.G.A. § 17-13-25, discussed infra) that the accused was present in the demanding state at the time the alleged crime was committed, and that he subsequently fled the jurisdiction. The demand must be accompanied by a copy of an indictment against the accused, or by information supported by an affidavit in the state which has jurisdiction of the offense, or by a copy of an affidavit made before a magistrate of the demanding state, together with a copy of any warrant issued or by a copy of a judgment of conviction or of a sentence imposed in execution thereof, together with a statement by the governor of the demanding state that the accused has escaped from confinement or has broken the terms of his bail, probation, or parole. The indictment, affidavit or information must substantially charge the accused with having committed a crime under the law of the demanding state, and be authenticated by the governor of that state.

O.C.G.A. § 17-13-26 provides that when a demand for extradition is made upon the governor, he may call upon any state prosecuting officer, including the Attorney General, to investigate the demand and report whether or not the accused ought to be delivered to the demanding state.

O.C.G.A. § 17-13-24 provides that when a state wishes to have returned to that state a person charged with a crime in that state, but the accused is incarcerated in another state, the governor of the latter state may agree to extradite the prisoner, upon condition that, after he is tried in the demanding state, he be returned to the surrendering state to complete his sentence or to face pending criminal proceedings.

O.C.G.A. § 17-13-25 provides that this state may extradite, pursuant to the requirements of O.C.G.A. § 17-13-23, supra, any person who, although not present in the demanding state at the time the alleged crime was committed, nonetheless committed an act from outside the demanding state which intentionally resulted in a crime being committed within the demanding state.

In Jenkins v. Garrison, an Alabama application for extradition noted that Alabama did not contend that the petitioner was present within the state when the crimes were committed. However, the Georgia rendition warrant granting the extradition request stated that the petitioner committed the crimes in Alabama and was a "fugitive from justice." Although the warrant did not give the basis for its issuance, the warrant appeared to be issued pursuant to the mandatory terms of O.C.G.A. § 17-13-23 limiting extradition to a fugitive from justice found in another state, rather than pursuant to O.C.G.A. § 17-13-25 which does not hinge on whether the accused was present in the requesting state when the crimes were committed. Because of this discrepancy and because there was no evidence that gubernatorial discretion was exercised pursuant to O.C.G.A. § 17-13-25 when granting the rendition warrant, the court concluded that habeas corpus relief should have been granted.

When the governor of a state decides to extradite a fugitive to a demanding state, he must issue an arrest warrant, which must recite the facts necessary to the validity of its issuance. The warrant must authorize the peace officers to whom it is directed to arrest the fugitive and, subject to the provisions of O.C.G.A. §§ 17-13-20 et seq., discussed in this section, to deliver him up to the "duly authorized agent of the demanding state." The arresting officer is deemed to have the same authority to command assistance in arresting the fugitive as he has in any criminal process situation.

O.C.G.A. § 17-13-30 provides that before a fugitive is delivered up to the demanding state, he must first be brought before a judge of a court of record of the surrendering state. The judge must inform the accused of (1) "the demand made for his surrender," (2) the crime upon which the demand is based, and (3) his right to counsel.

Should the accused wish to contest the legality of the arrest, a reasonable time is allotted (by the judge of the surrendering state) to allow the accused to petition for habeas corpus relief. If a writ of habeas corpus is applied for, notice thereof shall be given to the prosecuting officer of the county where the arrest was made. The district attorney must answer and defend the habeas corpus unless the governor appoints the attorney general.

In Michigan v. Doran, the United States Supreme Court held that once the governor of a state has granted extradition, a court of that state, considering release on habeas corpus, can do no more than decide (1) whether the extradition documents on their face are in order, (2) whether the petitioner has been charged with a crime in the demanding state, (3) whether the petitioner is the person named in the demand for extradition, and (4) it may be necessary to determine whether the petitioner is a fugitive. In the 1998 case of St. Lawrence v. Bartley, the Georgia Supreme Court affirmed the granting of a petition for habeas corpus where the demand for extradition alleged that the petitioner was in the demanding state at the time of the alleged crime (see O.C.G.A. § 17-13-23). In this case, Bartley testified that she had not been in South Carolina since she was a toddler and was not a fugitive. Bartley also testified that her checks had been stolen from her and that the theft was reported to the police in Georgia. The court pointed out that although the warrant was prima facie evidence that Bartley had been in South Carolina, the state presented no other evidence that she was in South Carolina when the alleged crime was committed.

Once these requirements are met, any other defenses are to be decided in the demanding state. The guilt or innocence of the accused has no relevance in a habeas corpus proceeding to contest extradition, unless it involves identification of the petitioner as the one charged with the offense or one of the other three matters set out in Doran.

In Oliver v. Barrett, the Georgia Supreme Court held that "the mental competency of a fugitive is only relevant insofar as it concerns his ability to assist counsel in ascertaining and preparing for the limited issues to be decided in an extradition hearing."

Once the surrendering state makes an initial, prima facie showing that the extradition documents are in order, the burden of proof is on the defendant to show how his arrest and detention is unlawful. Thus, if the defendant contends he is not the person named in the governor's warrant, the burden is on him to show that he is not the person named. It has been said that the purpose of an extradition proceeding is merely to determine whether there is probable cause to transfer a criminal suspect from one jurisdiction to another to stand trial. However, it "is not appropriate for the habeas court to look behind the probable cause finding of the demanding state."

O.C.G.A. § 17-13-32 provides that the officers of both the surrendering state and the demanding state may use the jails of the surrendering state, when necessary, to confine the fugitive while en route, provided that the officers show proof to the keepers of the jails that the prisoner is in fact a fugitive subject to pending extradition proceedings.

O.C.G.A. § 17-13-33 provides that "any credible person" may initiate the extradition process by swearing out a warrant that a crime has been committed in another state and that the accused has been charged with that crime. The accused may then be arrested and brought before a magistrate to answer the complaint.

O.C.G.A. § 17-13-34 provides that a peace officer or a private citizen may arrest a person without a warrant upon reasonable information that the accused is charged in another state with a crime punishable by death or imprisonment for a term greater than one year. The accused must be brought before a magistrate with all practicable speed, where the arresting party must make a complaint under oath setting out the grounds of the arrest; and the accused must be given an opportunity to answer.

Where the magistrate finds that the person being held is the same person as the one who is charged with the alleged offense, and that he has fled from justice (except where O.C.G.A. § 17-13-25 is applicable), it is provided that the magistrate must, by warrant reciting the accusation, commit the accused to the county jail for up to 30 days, to permit an arrest of the accused under a warrant of the governor "on a requisition of the executive authority of the state" which has jurisdiction of the crime. The magistrate may also extend the incarceration for 60 additional days if the accused was not arrested under such a governor's warrant after the initial 30–day period expires, or the magistrate may discharge the accused.

O.C.G.A. § 17-13-36 provides that an accused fugitive may be admitted to bail unless the crime with which he is charged is punishable by death or life imprisonment in the demanding state.

O.C.G.A. § 17-13-39 provides that the governor, in his discretion, may surrender upon demand of the governor of another state any person found in this state, even though that person is incarcerated, on probation or parole, or is facing pending criminal charges in this state. The governor may condition the delivery of the prisoner upon such terms as he may stipulate, including the condition that the prisoner be returned to this state immediately after trial and before commencing the service of his sentence in the demanding state. No surrender of such a prisoner under this section is to be construed as a complete relinquishment of jurisdiction by the surrendering state over the prisoner. However, where the prisoner receives a sentence of death in the demanding state, that sentence may be carried out.

The governor may recall his warrant for the arrest of a fugitive or issue another warrant at any time.

A person brought into Georgia pursuant to the Uniform Criminal Extradition Act is immune from service of process in civil actions arising out of the same facts as the criminal proceedings for which he was extradited, until he has been convicted, or, if acquitted, until he has had a reasonable opportunity to return to the state from which he was extradited.

In Palmer v. Dugger, the Eleventh Circuit held that an indigent who remains in custody while awaiting extradition must get credit when he is sentenced for the time when he was in custody.

O.C.G.A. § 17-13-46 provides that a person arrested pursuant to the Uniform Criminal Extradition Act may waive procedural requirements of the extradition proceedings and may consent in writing to return to the demanding state. The accused must execute such a waiver in the presence of a judge of any court of record within the surrendering state. Before the execution of the waiver becomes valid, the judge must inform the accused of his right to be issued a warrant of extradition and to petition for habeas corpus relief as provided in O.C.G.A. § 17-13-30, discussed supra. Where a waiver has been duly executed, it is filed with the governor, and the accused is delivered to the agent of the demanding state. However, these provisions do not limit the rights of the accused to return to the demanding state voluntarily and without formality and therefore they are not exclusive.

O.C.G.A. § 17-13-47 provides that nothing in the Uniform Criminal Extradition Act is to be construed as limiting the powers of the surrendering state to try a fugitive (for crimes committed in the surrendering state) who has been demanded by another state. Thus, it seems that the surrendering state may retain the fugitive and delay extradition until the proceedings in the surrendering state have been terminated or regain custody of the accused in order to have a trial, sentencing or punishment for any offense committed in the surrendering state.

O.C.G.A. § 17-13-48 provides that after a fugitive has been extradited, he may be tried in the demanding state for other crimes which he allegedly committed in that state as well as those crimes specified in the warrant of extradition.

It has been held that there is no double jeopardy or collateral estoppel problem where a demand for extradition is rejected by the surrendering state, and a later demand based on the same criminal charge is accepted. It has also been held that the right to challenge the legality of extradition is deemed to have been waived by the fugitive by a failure to petition for habeas corpus relief; the matter cannot be raised after extradition at the trial in the demanding state upon the substantive crime charged.

Although an illegal arrest and extradition result in a civil rights violation actionable under 42 U. S. C. § 1983, it cannot be raised as a defense at the trial in the demanding state for the substantive crime charged.

Finally, it must be remembered that a person can only be extradited for a criminal offense and never for the purpose of enforcing the collection of a debt or any private purpose whatsoever, unless the failure to repay the debt also constitutes a crime in the demanding state. See section 14-66, infra, on Interstate Agreement on Detainers.

In Oliver v. Barrett, the court pointed out that while Georgia, by statute, "requires that extradition . . . be solely for the purpose of a criminal prosecution, it is not appropriate for the habeas court to look behind the probable cause finding of the demanding state."

Generally, see 35 C. J. S. Extradition § 2 et seq.; 31A Am. Jur. 2d Extradition § 22 et seq. See section 2-25, infra, on results of illegal arrests and kidnapping of a defendant and on the right of a court to try a defendant where he was illegally brought into the jurisdiction of the court. See Annotation, "Necessity That Demanding State Show Probable Cause to Arrest Fugitive in Extradition Proceedings," 90 A. L. R. 3rd 1085 (1979).

§ 2-24 The exclusionary rule—Background

The exclusionary rule, as that term is used in criminal procedure, refers in its broader aspects to the exclusion of some kind of evidence in a judicial proceeding. The term may be used in connection with the sustaining of a hearsay objection at trial, a ruling excluding evidence because of its irrelevancy, or any other valid reason for the non-admission of evidence.

In addition to the broader scope of the meaning of the "exclusionary rule," this term may be applied to a specific statute which provides that certain evidence is not to be admissible in one or more phases of a judicial proceeding. For example, certain confidential communications are excluded on the grounds of public policy. Also, a witness is not obligated to incriminate himself, and a defendant in a criminal case cannot be forced to give evidence for or against himself. By Georgia statute, a confession is not admissible unless it was "made voluntarily, without being induced by another by the slightest hope of benefit or remotest fear of injury." Also, by Georgia statute, any aggrieved defendant may move to suppress any evidence illegally seized in violation of O.C.G.A. §§ 17-5-1 et seq.

However, the term "exclusionary rule" is used most frequently in reference to the exclusion of evidence in some phase of a criminal proceeding as a result of a holding, independent of state law, of the United States Supreme Court. That decision held that evidence obtained by law enforcement officers in violation of the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, or that clause and some provision of the Bill of Rights of the federal Constitution, is not admissible in state trials. In Mowery v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals stated that "[t]he law does not favor exclusionary rules; they hinder the search for truth."

In the 1914 decision of Weeks v. United States, certain documents were taken from Weeks' room by a United States Marshal who had no authority to enter. The court held that private documents obtained as a result of an illegal search were not admissible as evidence against Weeks at his trial in federal court where he had demanded their return before trial. The court concluded that to admit into evidence such illegally seized evidence "would be to affirm by judicial decision a manifest neglect, if not an open defiance, of the prohibitions of the Constitution, intended for the protection of the people against such unauthorized action." In the 1920 decision of Silverthorne Lumber Co. v. United States, Justice Holmes stated that the Fourth Amendment would be reduced "to a form of words" without the use of the exclusionary rule to suppress evidence obtained by an unconstitutional search and seizure.

Nevertheless, the exclusionary rule in Fourth Amendment situations was not applied by the United States Supreme Court in state court proceedings until 1961. The landmark decision of Mapp v. Ohio was handed down during that year. Mapp involved the admission of evidence obtained in an illegal search and seizure. The majority held that the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment made the provisions of the Fourth Amendment applicable to the states; and, consequently, evidence obtained in violation of the Fourth Amendment could not be admitted in a state criminal proceeding. Thereafter, the exclusionary rule has been applied to the states.

In 1936, in Brown v. Mississippi, the United States Supreme Court, relying on the due process clause of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments, held that an involuntary confession was not admissible in a state criminal trial. In Escobedo v. Illinois, the confession which had been obtained was held inadmissible in a state criminal trial because the confession had been obtained in violation of the Sixth Amendment right to counsel, which was made applicable to the states by the Fourteenth Amendment. Two years later, in Miranda v. Arizona, the United States Supreme Court held that the Fifth Amendment was applicable to the states and that admissions and confessions not obtained in compliance with that opinion were not admissible in state or federal courts.

In the field of visual identification of a defendant, the United States Supreme Court in 1967 handed down a decision in Gilbert v. California. In that case, the Court held that a defendant in a state criminal trial had been denied his Sixth Amendment right to counsel, made applicable to the states through the Fourteenth Amendment, where he was identified at a lineup after indictment in the absence of his counsel. As a result, evidence of the pre-trial identification of the defendant was held to be inadmissible at his trial.

Lastly, it must be remembered that the federal constitutional exclusionary rule, as pronounced by the United States Supreme Court, represents the minimum constitutional protection due to a defendant in a criminal case. However, a state court may not interpret the federal Constitution to give a defendant any greater right or rights than that given by the interpretation of the federal Constitution by the United States Supreme Court. Nevertheless, a state court may interpret the constitution of the state to give a defendant broader protection than that provided by the federal Constitution as interpreted by the United States Supreme Court. This rule applies even when the wording of the state constitution is exactly like the wording of the federal Constitution on the particular matter. Also, Congress and the state legislatures may extend the exclusionary rule by legislation so as to give a defendant in a criminal case greater protection than he is entitled to under the federal Constitution.

See Wilkes, "A Most Deplorable Paradox: Admitting Illegally Obtained Evidence in Georgia—Past, Present and Future," 11 Ga. L. R. 105 (1976).

§ 2-25 The exclusionary rule—Present application at trial

The mere fact that an arrest or search is illegal does not prevent a criminal prosecution nor provide a defense to such a prosecution. In Thompson v. State, the court pointed out that "the illegality of an arrest neither bars prosecution or affects a conviction." In Frisbie v. Collins, the United States Supreme Court held that a court may try a defendant even where the defendant is forcibly abducted and brought within the jurisdiction of the court. In Lujan v. Gengler, the court held that where a defendant was kidnapped in a foreign country, not treated in a cruel or inhuman manner, and brought to this country, he was not entitled to be released because of the unconventional way in which he was brought to this county.

In United States v. Alvarez-Machain, the United States Supreme Court held that the kidnapping of a Mexican citizen in his home in that country and transporting him to Texas did not amount to a treaty violation nor prevent his trial.

However, primary evidence or evidence directly obtained from a defendant as a result of an arrest or a search and seizure invalid under the Fourth Amendment is not admissible against the defendant at his trial if he properly moves to suppress such evidence, except perhaps for purposes of impeachment. See section 3-12, infra, on fingerprinting when there is no probable cause to arrest.

It must be emphasized that the exclusionary rule which is applied to the United States Constitution applies only to governmental action. See section 4-59, infra.

The more difficult question is, what evidence derived from a violation of the Fourth Amendment must be suppressed where the evidence was not obtained directly or immediately from the defendant when the arrest or the search and seizure occurred?

In Wong Sun v. United States, the Court said:

"The exclusionary rule has traditionally barred from trial physical, tangible materials obtained either during or as a direct result of an unlawful invasion. It follows . . . that the Fourth Amendment may protect against the overhearing of verbal statements as well as against the more traditional seizure of 'papers and effects.' Similarly, testimony as to matters observed during an unlawful invasion has been excluded in order to enforce the basic constitutional policies . . . . Thus, verbal evidence which derives so immediately from an unlawful entry and an unauthorized arrest as the officers' action in the present case is no less the 'fruit' of official illegality than the more common tangible fruits of the unwarranted intrusion."

In Silverthorne Lumber Co. v. United States, Silverthorne had been held in contempt for refusal to obey a subpoena directing the production of certain documents. The government knew of the existence of the documents by reason of a prior illegal search and seizure. In reversing the conviction, the Court, in an opinion by Justice Holmes, said:

"The essence of a provision forbidding the acquisition of evidence in a certain way is that not merely evidence so acquired shall not be used before the court, but that it shall not be used at all. Of course this does not mean that the facts thus obtained become sacred and inaccessible. If knowledge of them is gained from an independent source they may be proved like any others, but the knowledge gained by the government's own wrong cannot be used by it . . . . (Emphasis added.)

Tainted evidence not obtained directly from the original invalid search and seizure or arrest has come to be known as derivative evidence or "fruit of the poisonous tree." This term was coined by Justice Frankfurter in Nardone v. United States. In that case, the Court noted a second exception to the rule that all derivative evidence must be excluded, by stating that such evidence could "become so attenuated as to dissipate the [original] taint."

The third exception to the rule that all evidence derived from unconstitutional action by officers was mentioned in a footnote of the case Brewer v. Williams.

The United States Supreme Court has never held that all derivative evidence is to be considered the "fruit of the poisonous tree" "simply because it would not have come to light but for the illegal actions of the police. Rather, the more apt question in such a case is 'whether granting establishment of the primary illegality, the evidence to which instant objection is made has been come at by exploitation of that illegality or instead by means sufficiently distinguishable to be purged of the primary taint.' " (Emphasis added.) However, there is no per se exclusion of in-court identification because of suggestive pre-trial identification procedures. See section 6-8, infra, on due process standard of identification.

As previously pointed out, the Supreme Court has at least given passing recognition to three exceptions to the broad language of Silverthorne indicating that evidence illegally obtained shall not be used to develop or find other evidence. These exceptions are stated in United States v. Brookins as follows: "[First] One form of insufficient connection between the fruit and the tree occurs if physical evidence, a witness' testimony, or the accused's statement has an attenuated link to the illegally secured evidence. . . . [Second] Another type of inadequate connection arises if the derivative evidence has an independent source from the illegally taken objects or statements. . . . A third category of insufficient connection obtains if the derivative evidence . . . would inevitably have been discovered during a police investigation without the aid of the illegally obtained evidence."

Initially the burden has been said to be on the defendant to show that the derivative evidence was obtained by the government as a result of the illegal search. Once this has been done, the government has the burden of establishing that the evidence is admissible under one of the three exceptions set out above.

The following three sections discuss when secondary or derivative evidence is admissible because of the good faith of the officer conducting a search pursuant to a warrant, an independent source, inevitable discovery, or attenuation.

See section 4-59, infra, on result of school searches.

§ 2-26 The exclusionary rule—Present application at trial—Good faith of officer conducting search pursuant to warrant

In the 1992 case of Gary v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court declined to follow the "good faith" exception found by the United States Supreme Court in United States v. Leon. The Georgia Court pointed out that a "[s]tate is free . . . to impose greater restrictions on police activity than those [the Supreme] Court holds to be necessary upon federal constitutional standards." The court then held that under the wording of O.C.G.A. § 17-5-30 the Georgia legislature said that "evidence seized by means of a warrant that is not supported by probable cause [must] be suppressed."

In Leon, the United States Supreme Court held that "the Fourth Amendment exclusionary rule . . . [does] not . . . bar the use in the prosecution's case-in-chief of evidence obtained by officers acting in reasonable reliance on a search warrant issued by a detached and neutral magistrate but ultimately found to be unsupported by probable cause."

In Arizona v. Evans, the United States Supreme Court extended the good faith exception to the exclusionary rule to cover errors by employees of the court. In this case, the defendant was arrested and contraband was recovered in a search incident to arrest. The arrest warrant for the defendant had been quashed, but, due to a clerical error by court employees, the computer did not indicate this. The court pointed out that the exclusionary rule was historically used to deter police misconduct and that because there was no police misconduct here, suppression was not necessary. In coming to this conclusion, the Court seemed impressed with the fact that this type of mistake occurred very infrequently and that the defendant made no showing that court employees are "inclined to ignore or subvert the Fourth Amendment." See section 4-20, infra, on execution of invalid warrant.

In Herring v. United States, the United States Supreme Court applied the reasoning of Leon and Evans to find that the exclusionary rule could not be used to suppress drugs and firearms found by officers in a search incident to arrest based on an arrest warrant later found to be defective. The Court held that the deterrent effect to police misconduct provided by the exclusionary rule was not served when the police mistakes were attenuated from the search and were no more than isolated negligence rather than "systemic error or reckless disregard of constitutional requirements."

In Cunningham v. State, the court affirmed a traffic stop where a patrolman checked with a dispatcher to determine whether a tag on a car belonged on another vehicle. The dispatcher gave erroneous information to the patrolman, who stopped the driver and then arrested him for driving under the influence. The court pointed out that there had been no bad faith and that it was just an "honest human mistake."

However, in State v. White, the Florida Supreme Court held that negligence of the sheriff's department in maintaining computer records "falls squarely within the class of governmental action that the exclusionary rule was designed to deter." During the stop of the defendant for a minor traffic violation, the deputy sheriff was informed of the existence of an outstanding warrant for the defendant. The defendant was arrested and contraband was discovered during a search of his car. Later it was discovered that the warrant was not outstanding but in fact had been served four days earlier by another deputy and the sheriff's office neglected to supply the computer with that information. The court also pointed out that the collective knowledge rule was also applicable here because other members of the sheriff's department knew that the warrant was no longer outstanding. See sections 2-11, supra, and 4-49, infra, on collective knowledge.

In Harvey v. State, the arresting officer ran the defendant's name through NCIC and it showed that there was a bench warrant for his arrest. Harvey was then placed under arrest and, in a search incident to that arrest, cocaine was discovered. At trial the defendant moved to suppress the cocaine because the bench warrant had been quashed a few days before the arrest. This information was not revealed in NCIC records when they were checked by the officer in the field. Nevertheless, the Georgia Supreme Court held that "in hindsight, [this Court] will not declare an arrest to be invalid when the arresting officer reasonably relied upon information which he had no reason to think was incorrect." Because the NCIC report was reliable enough to underlie the reasonable belief which is needed to establish probable cause, the court upheld the admission of the cocaine into evidence. Although the Leon "good faith" exception is not applicable in Georgia, the court in Harvey pointed out that it was not implicated here because "[t]he radio transmissions which confirmed the outstanding warrants established the necessary probable cause to arrest."

Also see section 4-22, infra, on good faith exclusionary exception as applied to a warrant not sufficiently particularizing items to be seized. See sections 3-2 and 4-45, infra, on invalidity of law authorizing a stop or search. See section 4-20, infra, on good faith mistaken belief of officer that area being searched was within scope of warrant.

§ 2-27 The exclusionary rule—Present application at trial—The independent source exception

"The essential aspect of the independent source rule is the existence of evidence which was not illegally seized and which in fact provided an independent basis for the discovery of the challenged evidence." Some courts have interpreted the independent source exception to require the government to show that the challenged evidence was acquired wholly apart from the original illegality. However, some other jurisdictions have interpreted this exception more broadly.

Two identification cases serve to illustrate the application of the independent source exception. In Bynum v. United States, the defendant had been illegally arrested and fingerprinted. However, the government sought to show that fingerprints which had previously been obtained by the FBI matched the fingerprints left at the scene of the crime. The court held that the older fingerprints were admissible in evidence along with the latent fingerprints taken from the scene.

In United States v. Crews, a victim was assaulted in a restroom on the grounds of the Washington Monument. She notified officers and gave a description of her assailant. Several days later, Crews was illegally arrested in the same area because he fit the description given. He was photographed and his picture identified by the victim in a photographic display. Crews was again taken into custody and identified at a lineup. The trial judge found that the victim's ability to identify Crews was based on her independent and untainted recollection of having seen him at the time of the crime and she was permitted to identify him at the trial. The Supreme Court concluded that the victim's presence in the courtroom at trial was not a result of police misconduct and Crews cannot claim immunity simply because his presence in court was precipitated by an unlawful arrest. Crews was not himself a suppressible fruit of an unlawful arrest. The "Fourth Amendment violation . . . yielded nothing of evidentiary value that the police did not already have in their grasp."

In Murray v. United States, the United States Supreme Court held that the exclusionary rule did not apply where officers illegally entered a warehouse and while there "observed in plain view numerous burlap-wrapped bales that were later found to contain marijuana . . ., [l]eft without disturbing the bales, kept the warehouse under surveillance, and did not reenter it until they had a search warrant" issued on the basis of information unrelated to the initial entry.

Generally, see 1 Ringel, Searches and Seizures, Arrests and Confessions, § 3.3(a) (Clark Boardman 1979).

§ 2-28 The exclusionary rule—Present application at trial—The inevitable discovery exception

The inevitable discovery exception permits the prosecution to justify the admission of evidence obtained as a result of an unlawful search by showing that the evidence would have been discovered later through legal means.

The Eleventh Circuit Court of Appeals refined the doctrine to also require that "the prosecution . . . demonstrate that the lawful means which made discovery inevitable were possessed by the police and were being actively pursued prior to the occurrence of the illegal conduct." In Taylor v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court concluded that as defined by the Eleventh Circuit, the inevitable discovery doctrine was consistent with prior application of the rule in Georgia and decided to expressly adopt it as the rule in this State.

A leading case on inevitable discovery is Wayne v. United States, in an opinion written by future Chief Justice Burger. In this case, the court, on the basis of Wong Sun v. United States, held a coroner's report concerning the cause of death to be admissible even though the body had been found as the result of an illegal search and seizure. The court pointed out that the body would have been found sooner or later and that the police would have been notified then. This case also demonstrates the close relationship which may exist between the inevitable discovery and independent source exceptions.

In Nix v. Williams, the United States Supreme Court considered Williams' second conviction. In the second Williams opinion, the Court approved the admissibility of evidence relating to the discovery and condition of the body of the victim since the prosecution had established by a preponderance of the evidence that the body would have been inevitably discovered in the same condition even if there had been no Sixth Amendment violation. The court noted that the prosecution is not required to prove the absence of bad faith on the part of the officers violating the defendant's constitutional rights.

In the 1987 Eleventh Circuit opinion in United States v. Hernandez-Cano, the court held that the inevitable discovery doctrine applied where an airline employee would have discovered cocaine even if an officer had not intervened and actually discovered the contraband.

Generally, see 1 Ringel, Searches and Seizures, Arrests and Confessions, § 3.3(b) (Clark Boardman 1979).

§ 2-29 The exclusionary rule—Present application at trial—Attenuation

The attenuation or purged taint exception to the rule that evidence derived from, or as a result of, an illegal arrest or search is inadmissible finds support in the fact that the United States Supreme Court has pointed out that it has never adopted a "but for" causation test. That is, the Court has not held that all evidence which would not have been discovered had it not been for the unconstitutional arrest or search and seizure must be excluded. The Supreme Court uses the term "attenuation" when referring to circumstances involving a tenuous connection between the violation of the defendant's constitutional rights and the discovery of the contested evidence. For example, in the case of a knock-and-announce violation that is the "but for" cause of the discovery of contested evidence, attenuation occurs when the causal connection is remote, or when "given a direct causal connection, the interest protected by the constitutional guarantee that has been violated would not be served by suppression of the evidence obtained."

In Wong Sun v. United States, federal narcotics agents entered without probable cause and chased Toy to his bedroom, where he was arrested. Toy made a statement implicating Yee. Narcotics were seized from Yee, who implicated Wong Sun. All defendants were arraigned and released. Within a few days, all three made statements to the Narcotics Bureau. The court agreed with Toy's contention that his statement and the drugs later seized from Yee were fruits of Toy's illegal arrest. However, the Court concluded that Wong Sun's statement which had been made to agents several days after arraignment was sufficiently attenuated to have dissipated the taint of his illegal arrest. The court pointed out that the taint of the illegal arrest was sufficiently purged by the independent act of the defendant in going to the office and making a statement after his arraignment. The fact that Wong Sun would not have gone to the office of the narcotics agents and made a statement had it not been for his illegal arrest did not prevent the admission of the statement.

In Burnham v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court held that "[t]he shorter the lapse in time between the illegal police activity and the defendant's statement, the more likely it is that the defendant's statement was the product of the illegal activity."

In Brown v. Illinois, the defendant was illegally arrested, given Miranda warnings, and within two hours of the time of his arrest he gave an inculpatory statement concerning a murder and later gave a second statement. The court concluded that the giving of Miranda warnings did not automatically break the causal chain so that the statement would be admissible, even if the statement had been made voluntarily under the Fifth Amendment. The court also reasoned that the second statement was the fruit of the first one and that it was not admissible. In the decision, the Court pointed out that each case must turn on its own facts. Of course, if a statement was not voluntarily made, it is not admissible for any purpose. In Brown, the Court enumerated some factors which may be considered in determining whether or not the illegal taint has been purged. Those factors are the following:

(1) Miranda warnings;

(2) Temporal proximity of the arrest and the confession;

(3) Presence of intervening circumstances;

(4) Purpose of the official misconduct; and

(5) Flagrancy of the official misconduct.

The burden of establishing the sufficiency of the attenuation from the illegality "rests squarely with the prosecution."

Wong Sun and Brown are based on Fourth Amendment violations. However, a different rule applies where there is a violation of the rules of Miranda. In Oregon v. Elstad, the United States Supreme Court considered a case in which the defendant was arrested, pursuant to a warrant, at his home in connection with a burglary. He was not given Miranda warnings, but he voluntarily made an incriminating statement in answer to some questions asked by the officer while sitting in the defendant's living room. One hour later, at police headquarters, he was administered Miranda warnings for the first time and he made a full confession, which was typed and signed. The defendant objected to the admissibility of the confession alleging that it was a result of the earlier incriminating statement. The defendant contended that a confession cannot be voluntary "once the cat is out of the bag." Writing for the majority, Justice O'Connor distinguished between "actual" coerced statements resulting from police misconduct and mere "technical" Miranda violations. Although the defendant was technically in custody while he was in his living room with the officer, there was no coercion. Because there was no coercion in the first interrogation, and the second confession came after the Miranda warnings were given, the second confession was admissible against the defendant. "The Fifth Amendment prohibits the prosecution in its case in chief only of compelled testimony. Failure to administer Miranda warnings creates a presumption of compulsion." However, "[a] subsequent administration of Miranda warnings to a suspect who has given a voluntary but unwarned statement ordinarily should suffice to remove the conditions that precluded admission of the earlier statement."

Elstad, however, does not afford police the opportunity to interrogate suspects without providing Miranda warnings with the intention of giving warnings after obtaining incriminating statements and then having the suspect repeat those statements. The United States Supreme Court rejected just such a practice in Missouri v. Seibert, where police attempted to circumvent Miranda by providing warnings mid-interrogation and post-confession. The opinion states that in determining whether "midstream Miranda warnings" could be effective, courts should consider: "the completeness and detail of the questions and answers to the first round of interrogation, overlapping contents of the two statements, the timing and setting of the first and second rounds, the continuity of police personnel, and the degree to which the interrogator's questions treated the second round as continuous with the first."

See section 2-31, note 7, infra, for an application of the Brown rule. Generally, see 1 Ringel, Searches and Seizures, Arrests and Confessions, § 3.3(c) (Clark Boardman 1979).

§ 2-30 The exclusionary rule—Present application at trial—Discovery of prosecution witness

In United States v. Ceccolini, the Court concluded that "the exclusionary rule should be invoked with much greater reluctance where the claim is based on a causal relationship between a constitutional violation and the discovery of a live witness than when a similar claim is advanced to support suppression of an inanimate object."

In arriving at this conclusion, the Court (1) rejected the contention of the government that the testimony of a live witness should never be excluded, and (2) reaffirmed the rule that verbal evidence may be the fruit of an unlawful arrest. However, the Court also said that the willingness of the witness to testify is material, since the witness might come forward and offer to testify on his own volition. The time, place and manner of the first questioning is of significance.

§ 2-31 The exclusionary rule—Present application at trial—Confessions obtained

See sections 5-13 and 5-26, infra, on admissibility under Georgia law of a confession made to a private person.

As previously pointed out in section 2-29, supra, an incriminating statement obtained from Toy in Wong Sun v. United States at the time of his illegal arrest was held to be a direct fruit of the unlawful arrest and therefore inadmissible. However, the statement of Wong Sun after his arraignment was admissible. Also as previously pointed out in section 2-29, supra, in Brown v. Illinois, the Court laid down some significant factors to be considered in determining the degree of attenuation which exists.

In Dunaway v. New York, the Court held that where a suspect is "picked up," taken to a police station, placed in an interrogation room, given Miranda warnings and makes incriminating statements, such statements are not admissible when the officers lacked probable cause to arrest. This is true even if Miranda warnings are given and the confession is "voluntary" for purposes of the Fifth Amendment. See section 11-1, infra, on a statement obtained after 48 hours following a warrantless arrest where there has been no probable cause hearing. The Supreme Court of Georgia cited and relied upon Dunaway in the 1986 case of State v. Harris.

In Taylor v. Alabama, the entire Court recognized that "a confession obtained through custodial interrogation after an illegal arrest should be excluded unless intervening events break the causal connection between the illegal arrest and the confession so that the confession is 'sufficiently an act of free will to purge the primary taint.' " In this case, the arrest had been without probable cause. In determining whether the primary taint has been purged, consideration should be given to the factors enumerated in Brown v. Illinois, which were discussed in section 2-29, supra. The Taylor majority concluded that the primary taint had not been purged. The dissenting justices disagreed. The following facts were discussed on the question of whether the taint had been purged:

(1) The conduct of the arresting officers had not been blatant.
(2) Taylor was told at the time of the arrest that he was being arrested for a robbery at a grocery.
(3) There was no police misconduct other than the arrest.
(4) Taylor was fingerprinted, placed in a lineup, and told that his fingerprints matched prints found in the store where the robbery had taken place.
(5) Taylor was given Miranda warnings on three occasions.
(6) Taylor was not represented by counsel.
(7) Taylor was in custody about six hours before he confessed.
(8) Taylor's girlfriend talked with him before he confessed. She was, however, emotionally upset at the time.
(9) Taylor was permitted to talk to a neighbor for a few minutes. Shortly after this conversation, he confessed.

However, in the 1980 case of Rawlings v. Kentucky, where Rawlings and some others were detained in a friend's home for about 45 minutes in a "congenial atmosphere" while a search warrant was obtained and Miranda warnings were given shortly before an incriminating statement was apparently volunteered, the statement was found to be admissible. The court emphasized the short duration of the detention and that there had been no flagrant misconduct by the officers.

Generally, if two confessions are made and the first is closely connected with the unlawful arrest, or search and seizure, the second confession is also regarded as not being admissible even if some time or intervening circumstances have occurred. In a sense, the second confession is regarded as being the fruit of the first. However, as in Oregon v. Elstad, this is not as likely to be true where the first confession was voluntary but is not admissible simply because of a technical Miranda violation.

Where a suspect is confronted with illegally seized items and he confesses to the crime involved, it seems that normally the confession would not be admissible.

In Green v. State, the arrest warrant contained no facts justifying that the defendant committed a murder. Since a statement was obtained from the defendant pursuant to the defective warrant, and was admitted at trial, the conviction was reversed. The dissenting opinion emphasized the good faith of the officers and cited United States v. Williams. The United States Supreme Court denied certiorari.

However, in Thompson v. State, in which Justice Smith dissented and Justice Weltner did not participate, the court held that a confession was admissible despite the fact that it was obtained as a result of an illegal arrest. Here the warrantless arrest was a violation of the Fourth Amendment since the defendant was in his home at the time of the arrest, there were no exigent circumstances; and the defendant did not consent to the arrest. The court emphasized the fact that the officers had probable cause to arrest, honestly thought they did not need an arrest warrant, and did not engage in any purposeful or flagrant misconduct.

Nevertheless, in United States v. Johnson, the United States Supreme Court held that the Payton rule, requiring an arrest warrant before a defendant may be arrested in his home in the absence of exigent circumstances, is to be applied retroactively to all cases in which the conviction was not final on the date of the Payton decision. Payton was decided in 1980. In Johnson, the Court held that it was error not to grant the motion to suppress the oral statement which Johnson made shortly after his warrantless arrest at home. The Ninth Circuit concluded in Johnson that the agents had probable cause to arrest. In fact, warrants had been obtained for the arrest of Johnson and another person known to have participated in the offense with him. At one point in Johnson, the Court stated, "The Government does not seriously suggest that the retroactivity of a given Fourth Amendment ruling should turn solely on the subjective state of a particular arresting officer's mind. Instead, it offers an 'objective' test: that law enforcement officers 'may properly be charged with knowledge' of all 'settled' Fourth Amendment law." This "objective test" was rejected, however, by the Court. It was reasoned that "if, as the Government argues, all rulings resolving unsettled Fourth Amendment questions should be nonretroactive, then, in close cases, law enforcement officials would have little incentive to err on the side of constitutional behavior."

In the 1990 case of New York v. Harris, the United States Supreme Court held that if a warrantless, non-consensual, routine felony arrest in a suspect's home is supported by probable cause, it does not require the suppression of a statement made by the suspect after he was removed from his home. Similarly, in Carranza v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court, in a six to one decision, reached the same conclusion.

§ 2-32 The exclusionary rule—Present application at trial—Impeachment

In Walder v. United States, the defendant had been tried and convicted of purchasing and possessing heroin. On direct examination Walder testified that he never handled any narcotics. Over objection, on cross-examination the government asked Walder about the heroin unlawfully seized from his home earlier. He denied that narcotics had been taken from his home. The government then put on the stand one of the officers who participated in the unlawful search and seizure as well as the chemist who analyzed the seized heroin. The testimony was allowed and the conviction was affirmed because the defendant "opened the door" for cross-examination regarding his possession of the drugs.

In Harris v. New York, the defendant made statements to officers which were not admissible in the government's case in chief under Miranda. After Harris testified at trial, prior inconsistent statements he made were held to have been properly admitted for purposes of impeachment. Likewise, in Michigan v. Harvey, the Court held that "the prosecution may use a statement taken in violation of the [Michigan v.] Jackson prophylactic rule to impeach a defendant's false or inconsistent testimony." (Jackson is discussed in section 5-20, infra.)

However, the foregoing situation is to be distinguished from that which exists when a statement or confession was not voluntarily given. Thus, in Mincey v. Arizona, a statement obtained by officers from Mincey, while he was in the intensive care unit of a hospital in critical condition, as a result of questioning for four hours while he was in severe pain, was held not to have been voluntarily given. The court then concluded that a confession obtained in this manner could not be used for purposes of impeachment.

Also, the situations in Walder and Harris are to be distinguished from a case in which a prosecutor seeks to impeach the credibility of a defense witness by the use of illegally obtained evidence. James v. Illinois is such a case. In James, the Court concluded that to permit the impeachment of a defense witness with illegally obtained evidence would lead a defendant not to call the witness and "would not further . . . truthseeking . . . but would appreciably undermine the deterrent effect of the exclusionary rule. . . ." Hence, it is error to admit illegally obtained evidence for the purpose of impeaching a defense witness.

In United States v. Havens, the Court considered the admission into evidence of an illegally seized undershirt. On direct examination, Havens testified that he had had no activity with his co-defendant on his visit to Peru. On cross-examination, Havens testified that he had not participated in making a closed pocket on a tee-shirt which the customs officer found the co-defendant wearing. In rebuttal, an agent was permitted to testify to finding a tee-shirt in Havens' bag from which pieces had been cut which matched the pieces sewn to McLeroth's tee-shirt to form pockets which contained the cocaine. Also, the undershirt was admitted into evidence. The Court, in effect, affirmed the trial court and declined to restrict Walder to impeachment of direct testimony. The court concluded rather that the cross-examination grew reasonably out of Havens' direct testimony and was not a violation of his constitutional rights.

See Annotation, "Propriety of Using Otherwise Inadmissible Statement, Taken in Violation of Miranda Rule, to Impeach Criminal Defendant's Credibility—State Cases," 14 A. L. R. 4th 676 (1982).

§ 2-33 Real evidence discovered as a result of Miranda violation

Physical evidence discovered as a result of a Miranda violation need not be suppressed unless the interrogation involved actual coercion. The fruits from the unwarned statements of criminal suspects may thus be used as evidence against them in subsequent proceedings provided the statements made to the police were given voluntarily. Accordingly, in Taylor v. State, a murder weapon discovered through the Miranda tainted statement of the defendant was properly admitted at trial because the defendant's statement was voluntary albeit made without counsel, after a proper request for an attorney had been made by the defendant. However, in Vergara v. State, the court found that the fruits doctrine applied where there was a direct nexus between the interrogation and the discovery of the cocaine evidence after the defendant had requested counsel and ruled that the evidence should have been suppressed.

§ 2-34 The exclusionary rule—Present application—Non-trial proceedings

"When an attempt is made to apply the [exclusionary] rule in contexts other than the initial stages of a criminal prosecution, courts will balance the deterrent effect of the rule's use in the situation at hand against the cost to the government and society of losing the use of probative evidence."

It has been held in Georgia that evidence obtained from a search in violation of the Fourth Amendment may not be used to obtain a search warrant.

In the context of the Fifth Amendment, at least three decisions have concluded that evidence obtained in violation of Miranda may not be used to establish probable cause for a search and seizure. However, these cases are open to serious question after Commonwealth v. White, a 1977 United States Supreme Court decision where an equally divided court (Justice Powell did not participate) affirmed per curiam the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court's exclusion of evidence obtained in violation of Miranda.

In the area of grand jury investigations, the United States Supreme Court has held that a witness summoned to appear and testify before the grand jury may not refuse to answer questions on the ground that the questions were based on evidence obtained in an unlawful search and seizure. Also, it seems that it is not necessary to give Miranda warnings to a grand jury witness "who is called to testify about criminal activities in which he may have been personally involved."

In the case of parole or probation revocations, some courts have held that the exclusionary rule does not apply. However, in Georgia, at least in the case of probation proceedings, the exclusionary rule is applied.

Likewise, some courts have held that the exclusionary rule does not apply to sentencing proceedings, while other courts have applied the exclusionary rule.

See section 4-7, infra, on illegally obtained evidence being considered to establish probable cause, and section 2-25, supra. See section 5-26, infra, on admissibility of the fruits of an illegally obtained confession.

See sections 3-2 and 4-45, infra, on the application of the exclusionary rule where an officer relied on an invalid law. See section 30-7, infra, on admissibility of evidence obtained in violation of Fourth Amendment in a parole hearing.

§ 2-35 The exclusionary rule—Present application—Civil proceedings

In the case of a forfeiture or condemnation of an automobile, the United States Supreme Court referred to the proceedings as being quasi-criminal and held that the exclusionary rule applied.

However, in United States v. Janis, police officers, pursuant to an invalid warrant, conducted a search for evidence of bookmaking. Agents of the Internal Revenue Service were informed of Janis' arrest, resulting in an assessment against Janis for wagering taxes. The court held that the exclusionary rule should not be extended to forbid the use, in a civil proceeding by the federal government, of evidence illegally seized by a criminal law enforcement agent of a state because the likelihood of deterring law enforcement's conduct is not sufficient to outweigh societal costs imposed by the exclusion. Likewise, in Immigration and Naturalization Service v. Lopez-Mendoza, the Court held that the Fourth Amendment rule did not apply to a civil deportation proceeding.

In Middleton v. Middleton, the court held inadmissible a tape recorded conversation concerning a wife's extramarital affair made for use in a divorce case and made in violation of O.C.G.A. § 16-11-62, the anti-wiretapping statute.

Chapter 3

Stop–And–Frisk

§ 3-1 General considerations
§ 3-2 Facts justifying the stop—General
§ 3-3 —Appearance
§ 3-4 —Airport drug courier profile
§ 3-5 —Ships and boats
§ 3-6 —Conduct
§ 3-7 —Report of a crime
§ 3-8 —Environment
§ 3-9 Roadblocks
§ 3-10 The Terry frisk
§ 3-11 Extensions of the Terry frisk
§ 3-12 When does a "stop" become an "arrest"?
§ 3-13 Brief retention of inanimate objects without probable cause

KeyCite®: Cases and other legal materials listed in KeyCite Scope can be researched through the KeyCite service on Westlaw®. Use KeyCite to check citations for form, parallel references, prior and later history, and comprehensive citator information, including citations to other decisions and secondary materials.

§ 3-1 General considerations

The police have long felt the need to stop and question and search or frisk suspicious persons. Prior to Mapp v. Ohio and the exclusionary rule, the legality of such encounters was not considered to be of great importance and there were few reported cases which addressed the constitutionality of such stops and searches or frisks. However, after the Mapp decision in 1961 held that evidence obtained in violation of the Fourth Amendment was inadmissible in a state criminal prosecution, the validity of these searches or frisks began to receive much more attention. Also, the trend toward invalidating vagrancy, loitering, and disorderly conduct statutes further limited the right of officers to search or frisk suspicious persons.

In law enforcement parlance, a "stop" means "a temporary investigative detention of an individual short of an arrest." A "frisk" means the pat-down of an individual's outer clothing to determine whether he is carrying a weapon; a procedure not amounting to a full search. Thus, a stop and frisk represents two distinct occurrences. Even though the facts justify a stop, this does not mean that they justify a frisk. A frisk is more limited than a search incident to a valid arrest. Because both a stop and a frisk are less intrusive than a search incident to a valid arrest, they may be based on something less than probable cause.

The United States Supreme Court, in Terry v. Ohio, first considered the stop-and-frisk situation. The court concluded as follows: (1) In order to justify a stop and follow it with a frisk, the officer had to be able to point to specific and articulable facts which, taken together with reasonable inferences, judged against an objective standard, would justify a reasonable person in believing that the frisk was appropriate. This action may not be justified solely by a hunch, guess, or suspicion. (2) When an officer reasonably concludes that a suspicious person he is investigating at close range is armed and potentially dangerous to the officer or others, it would be unreasonable to prevent the officer from determining if he is armed and if so, to prevent him from disarming the person. (3) The sole justification for a frisk is to discover weapons so as to protect the officer and others. The court also pointed out that (4) a frisk is not justified by a need to seize evidence; (5) the frisk, like other searches, must be strictly tied to and justified by the circumstances which initially rendered it permissible; (6) the frisk must be limited to that which is necessary for the discovery of weapons which might be used to harm the officer or others nearby; (7) a stop-and-frisk is not outside the protection of the Fourth Amendment; (8) when a person is restrained so he cannot walk away, he has been seized; (9) a frisk is a serious intrusion on the person frisked; and (10) it is not necessary to have probable cause for an arrest in order to justify a stop-and-frisk.

The scope of the stop-and-frisk area was further delineated in Sibron v. New York. In this case, the officer did not have probable cause to arrest. The court concluded that he was looking for narcotics and had no reason to think Sibron was armed. However, the Court pointed out that even if there was probable cause for a limited search or pat-down of his outer clothing for weapons, there was no right to go into his pocket unless a weapon was found in the pat-down.

In Terry, the Court emphasized that the stop was solely to obtain weapons, but in United States v. Hensley, the United States Supreme Court pointed out that the stop could be based on an articulable suspicion that the person stopped was wanted for a completed felony. See section 3-7, infra.

In Michigan v. Chesternut, the United States Supreme Court held that an "investigatory pursuit" does not violate the Fourth Amendment unless a person has been "seized." Officers "can be said to have seized an individual 'only if, in view of all of the circumstances surrounding the incident, a reasonable person would have believed that he was not free to leave.' "

In Pennsylvania v. Mimms, two officers saw the defendant driving an automobile with an expired license plate. The defendant was stopped for the purpose of being issued a traffic summons. He was ordered to get out of the car. When he did, the officer noticed a large bulge under his jacket. The defendant was then frisked and a.38 revolver was found in his waistband. Later he was indicted for carrying a concealed weapon. The court first found that the order to get out of the car after the driver had been detained, was reasonable and therefore permissible under the Fourth Amendment. The court then ruled that the frisk was proper because the officer reasonably concluded that the person whom he legitimately stopped might be armed and presently dangerous. Mimms holds that when an officer observes a traffic violation and subsequently issues a citation, the officer may have the driver step out of the car. A number of cases have considered whether the right to have the driver exit the car automatically extends the right of an officer to have passengers in the stopped vehicle step out of the vehicle. This question was answered affirmatively in the 1997 opinion of Maryland v. Wilson, which held that "an officer making a traffic stop may order passengers to get out of the car pending completion of the stop." In addition, where the officer has reason to suspect in the context of a traffic stop that a passenger is armed and dangerous, the passenger may be frisked.

In 1979, the Court decided Ybarra v. Illinois. In this case, the defendant, Ybarra, was a bar patron at the time of the execution of a search warrant authorizing the search of the bar and one named employee for narcotics and related items. Ybarra was also searched and heroin was found. The court held that it was error to overrule the defendant's motion to suppress. The court found that the officer had no articulable suspicion justifying a weapon frisk, that the Fourth Amendment does not permit a pat down of a person for weapons unless the officer has a reasonable belief that the person is armed and dangerous, and that Terry does not permit a search for anything other than weapons. The court later pointed out that the search "was invalid because the police had no reason to believe . . . [Ybarra] had any special connection with the premises, and the police had no other basis for suspecting that he was armed or in possession of contraband." The 1998 Georgia Court of Appeals case of Clark v. State is very much like Ybarra in its facts and results.

However, in Michigan v. Summers, the Court considered an incident involving the execution of a warrant to search a house for narcotics. As the officers approached the house they met the defendant, who was leaving. They requested his assistance in gaining entrance to the house and detained him until they had searched the premises. After learning that the defendant owned the house and after discovering narcotics in the house, the defendant was arrested and searched. Heroin was discovered in his coat pocket. The court said that if there is probable cause to search a citizen's residence for contraband, "it is constitutionally reasonable to require that citizen to remain while officers of the law execute a valid warrant to search his home."

"An investigating officer need not have [an] 'articulable suspicion' before he can approach a stopped vehicle and talk with the driver." But see section 3-9, infra, on roadblocks.

In Dunaway v. New York, the defendant was implicated in a murder. The officers did not have "enough information to get a warrant" for the defendant's arrest, but he was "picked up" and brought in. Although the defendant was told he was not under arrest, he would have been physically restrained if he attempted to leave. He was placed in an interrogation room where he waived counsel, made statements and drew sketches that incriminated him. The court held that the defendant's statements and sketches should have been suppressed since the officers did not have probable cause to arrest the defendant and since the acts of taking the defendant into custody and transporting him to the police station could not be regarded as a mere stop approved in Terry.

In a plurality opinion, the Court in United States v. Mendenhall expanded the scope of frisks under Terry. In Mendenhall, Drug Enforcement Agency officers approached the defendant as she exited the plane. The officers identified themselves and asked to see her identification and plane ticket. They returned both the identification and ticket to the defendant and only then did they ask her to come with them to a nearby airport office. She consented to go to the office and once there, she further consented to a search of her person. The search revealed heroin. The court established that a person is "seized" only if, in view of all the circumstances, "a reasonable person would have believed that he was not free to leave." On these facts, the Court held that there was no objective reason for the defendant to believe that she was not free to walk away.

The Eleventh Circuit in United States v. Rodriguez–Franco held that a stop to obtain identification was not a seizure involving the Fourth Amendment.

In Immigration and Naturalization Service v. Delgado, the Court considered "factory surveys" conducted pursuant to a warrant in search of illegal aliens. Each "survey" lasted one to two hours. Agents were posted at factory exits while others asked employees one to three questions relating to citizenship. Four employees were questioned and their union filed an action challenging the constitutionality of the surveys and seeking injunctive relief. The court concluded that the "survey" did not result in the seizure of the entire work force, and the individuals were not seized when they were questioned while at work. In Florida v. Bostick, the United States Supreme Court considered a case which it found to be indistinguishable from Delgado. In Bostick, the question was whether officers without an articulable suspicion could board a bus at a scheduled stop and ask passengers for permission to search their baggage. The court held that the officers' practice of "working busses" is not per se unconstitutional. To determine if such an encounter constitutes a seizure, the Court modified Mendenhall in holding that "a court must consider all the circumstances . . . to determine whether the police conduct would have communicated to a reasonable person that the person was not free to decline the officers' requests or otherwise terminate the encounter. That rule applies to encounters that take place on a city street or in an airport lobby, and it applies equally to encounters on a bus."

The Supreme Court reversed the 11th Circuit Court of Appeals in United States v. Drayton, holding that the Fourth Amendment did not require police officers to advise bus passengers that they did not have to answer questions put to them as part of a routine drug interdiction effort. In the absence of any coercive police conduct, the court found that the cooperation of passengers was voluntary and consensual.

This reasoning was directly applied to traffic stops in Brendlin v. California. There, the United States Supreme Court addressed the question of whether a vehicle's passengers are seized for Fourth Amendment purposes and, thus, may challenge the stop's constitutionality. The Court held that, though a passenger, Brendlin was seized from the moment the car came to a halt because a reasonable person in his position would not feel "free to 'terminate the encounter' between the police and himself." However, the court expressly noted that "the relationship between driver and passenger is not the same in a common carrier as it is in a private vehicle, and the expectations of police officers and passengers differ accordingly." In Solano-Rodriquez v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals applying the standard set out in Florida v. Bostick held that the proper test for determining when a seizure occurs on a bus is whether the passenger feels free to decline to answer an officer's questions rather than whether the passenger feels free to leave the bus since the passenger most likely has no desire to leave the bus.

See 6A C. J. S. Arrest § 38 et seq. See also Annotation, "Law Enforcement Officer's Authority Under Federal Constitution's Fourth Amendment, to Stop and Briefly Detain, and to Conduct Limited Protective Search Of or 'Frisk,' for Investigative Purposes, Person Suspected of Criminal Activity—Supreme Court Cases," 104 L.Ed.2d 1046 (1991).

§ 3-2 Facts justifying the stop—General

In Terry v. Ohio, the Court observed that "whenever a police officer accosts an individual and restrains his freedom to walk away he has 'seized' that person," but the Court did not discuss the exact point at which Terry was seized. The court said, however, in footnote number 16 on page 19 of the opinion, that all communications between an officer and a citizen do not involve a "seizure." "Only when the officer, by means of physical force or show of authority, has in some way restrained the liberty of a citizen may we conclude that a 'seizure' has occurred." Thus, in Edwards v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court held that there is "no seizure . . . when an individual voluntarily accompanies police in a spirit of cooperation."

It appears, therefore, that under some circumstances an officer may approach a person and ask him some questions even if the officer has no articulable suspicion. As Justice Harlan observed in his concurring opinion in Terry, a police officer has "the liberty (again, possessed by every citizen) to address questions to other persons, for ordinarily the person addressed has an equal right to ignore his interrogator and walk away." Justice White, also concurring in Terry, said there "is nothing in the Constitution which prevents a policeman from addressing questions to anyone on the streets." It has been held that an officer does not seize a passenger deplaning when the officer displays his credentials and asks permission of the passenger to talk with him.

In Clark v. State, the court pointed out that "merely refusing to identify oneself to a police officer is not a crime"; however, "one may commit obstruction when knowingly and willfully hindering an officer in investigating an offense committed by another." Thus, refusal to provide identification can be an obstruction.

In State v. Dukes, the court found that, although the defendant's sudden flight arguably gave officers articulable suspicion to detain him, such circumstances only gave the right to conduct a brief investigative stop, not to arrest for obstruction.

In Georgia it has been recognized that there are, "at least theoretically, three tiers of police-citizen encounters: (1) communication between police and citizens involving no coercion or detention and therefore without the compass of the Fourth Amendment, (2) brief 'seizures' that must be supported by reasonable suspicion, and (3) full-scale arrests that must be supported by probable cause." See section 2-2, supra, and section 4-26, infra, on arrests. See section 3-12, infra, on when a stop becomes an arrest.

In Stokes v. State, the court pointed out that it has "recognized a distinction between an officer's 'appropriately deferential' request for cooperation and a demand rising to the level of a stop. . . . [A]n officer's approach to a stopped vehicle and inquiry into the situation is not a 'stop' or 'seizure' but rather 'clearly falls within the realm of the first type of police-citizen encounter.' " Thus, police officers may "approach a citizen, ask for identification, ask him to roll down a window or step out of a car, and freely question him without any articulable suspicion, as long as the officers do not detain the citizen or create the impression that the citizen may not leave." Other examples of a first tier police-citizen encounter would include good faith intervention by police in what they believe to constitute emergency medical situations. In this context, police observation or inquiries which lead to the discovery of evidence of criminal activity may not be subject to suppression.

In In the Interest of S. B., the court quoted with approval from the United States Supreme Court in Florida v. Bostick that "[m]erely approaching an individual and requesting that he give his consent for a search does not constitute a seizure and need not be supported by an articulable suspicion. [E]ven when officers have no basis for suspecting a particular individual, they may generally ask questions of that individual . . . and request consent to search . . . as long as the police do not convey a message that compliance with their requests is required." In State v. Willis, the court pointed out that "[e]ven when officers have no basis for suspecting a . . . [person], they may generally ask questions . . . to examine the individual's identification . . . and request consent to search. . . ." See section 3-9, infra, on consent during a roadblock and general considerations.

In the 1991 case of California v. Hodari D., the United States Supreme Court considered a case in which officers drove up to a group of four or five persons in a high crime area and the group panicked and fled. One of the officers followed the defendant. When the officer had almost reached the defendant, "he tossed away what appeared to be a small rock. A moment later" the officer tackled the defendant. The rock turned out to be cocaine, and a motion to suppress was filed. The court said the only issue presented was whether the defendant had been "seized" within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment at the time the defendant dropped the drugs. Writing for the majority, Justice Scalia concluded that there was no seizure until the defendant was tackled; until he was physically stopped by the officer, the defendant had not yielded to the officer's show of authority. Therefore, the cocaine was not abandoned as a result of a seizure, and the motion to suppress was properly denied. See section 2-2, supra, on what constitutes an arrest.

A citizen who is walking away from an officer, however, may not be "detained" by the officer, and such a citizen is not obligated to answer questions, unless the officer has a specific reasonable articulable suspicion that the citizen is involved in criminal conduct. If the citizen answers the officer's questions, it generally does not seem to make any difference whether the officer had an articulable reasonable suspicion. But if the officer is to be justified in restraining the person who is approached, he must have such a reasonable articulable suspicion. The standard that is used must be an objective standard, but an officer may evaluate suspicious circumstances in the light of his own experience.

Not only may an officer approach a suspicious person and attempt to talk with him, but in the absence of coercion the officer may ask the person to accompany him to a nearby location to be searched. If the person agrees to do so and freely and voluntarily accompanies the officer, this generally amounts to a waiver or a consent and none of the person's Fourth Amendment rights have been violated. After reaching such place, and after being fully informed that he has a right to refuse to permit a search, if the suspected person intelligently and voluntarily consents to a search of his person and bag (if he has one) and contraband is discovered in the search, it is admissible against him if he is tried for a possessory offense. However, in United States v. Place, the United States Supreme Court said that an officer has authority "to make a forcible stop of a person when the officer has reasonable, articulable suspicion that the person has been, is, or is about to be engaged in criminal activity."

In United States v. Cortez, the United States Supreme Court expressly recognized the right to make an investigatory stop where there are sufficient objective manifestations "that the person stopped is, or is about to be, engaged in criminal activity." The court said:

"Based upon [the] whole picture the detaining officers must have a particularized and objective basis for suspecting the particular person stopped of criminal activity. . . . The idea that an assessment of the whole picture must yield a particularized suspicion contains two elements, each of which must be present before a stop is permissible. First, the assessment must be based upon all of the circumstances. The analysis proceeds with various objective observations, information from police reports, if such are available, and consideration of the modes or patterns of operation of certain kinds of lawbreakers. From these data, a trained officer draws inferences and makes deductions—inferences and deductions that might well elude an untrained person. . . .

"The second element contained in the idea that an assessment of the whole picture must yield a particularized suspicion is the concept that the process just described must raise a suspicion that the particular individual being stopped is engaged in wrongdoing."

In Cortez, the Court also said: "An investigatory stop must be justified by some objective manifestation that the person stopped is, or is about to be, engaged in criminal activity." The emphasis here is on the right of an officer to stop if he has an objective basis for suspecting the person stopped of criminal activity. In Terry, the emphasis seems to be that when an officer has an articulable suspicion "that criminal activity may be afoot and that the person with whom he is dealing may be armed and presently dangerous" there may be a valid "stop." Cortez indicates that the "armed and dangerous" element is not now essential.

While Cortez emphasizes the right of officers to stop where there is articulable suspicion that the suspect "is engaged in wrongdoing," in United States v. Hensley the Court pointed out that officers may stop if they have articulable suspicion that the suspect is wanted for a completed felony. See section 3-7, infra.

In Herrington v. State, the court pointed out that a specific, articulable suspicion justifying an investigatory stop of a vehicle "must be based on the totality of the circumstances, including objective observations, known information about the individual, patterns of certain kinds of lawbreakers, and inferences drawn and deductions made by trained law enforcement personnel."

In Beck v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals pointed out that "[t]here is no requirement that the officer making the stop have all the information the original officer had about a suspect and the informant." In State v. Pennyman the court pointed out that "[t]he 'collective knowledge' rule provides that reasonable suspicion may exist based on the collective knowledge of the police when there is reliable communication between the officer supplying the information and the officer acting on that information instead of the arresting officer's knowledge alone. . . . [I]nformation provided by other officers as communicated in a 'be-on-the-lookout' dispatch provides the basis for reasonable and articulable suspicion to justify a stop." See section 3-7, infra. The method of establishing an articulable suspicion seems to be the same as that used in determining probable cause. See sections 4-7 and 4-49, infra. However, in Kazeem v. State, the Court of Appeals held that "[w]ithout the testimony of the officers who stopped and detained [the defendants], we do not know what information those officers had before making the stop and whether they had an objective and particularized basis for stopping the men. Therefore, the state has not met its burden of showing that the stop was justified," and the evidence should have been suppressed.

In order to justify further detention and questioning of a motorist once a routine traffic stop has ended, the officer must have a reasonable suspicion of criminal conduct. In the absence of reasonable suspicion, an officer's continued questioning and detention of the motorist becomes unlawful. As the Eleventh Circuit Court of Appeals observed in United States v. Purcell, "only unrelated questions which unreasonably prolong the detention are unlawful; detention, not questioning, is the evil at which Terry's prohibition is aimed. Questions which do not extend the duration of the initial seizure do not exceed the scope of an otherwise constitutional traffic stop."

In Michigan v. Summers, the United States Supreme Court said: "Although no special danger to the police is suggested by the evidence in this record, the execution of a warrant to search for narcotics is the kind of transaction that may give rise to sudden violence or frantic efforts to conceal or destroy evidence. The risk of harm to both the police and the occupants is minimized if the officers routinely exercise unquestioned command of the situation." Thus, in Summers the Court seems to be saying that there is a right to "stop" if the "transaction . . . may give rise to sudden violence or frantic efforts to conceal or destroy evidence." If this is true, an officer may "stop" to prevent destruction of evidence—this is an idea which is completely contrary to Terry.

In Brown v. State, the court said, "Investigative stops of vehicles are analogous to Terry-stops . . . and are invalid if based upon only unparticularized suspicion or hunch." Any stop of a moving vehicle has been treated as a detention, and, as pointed out in Delaware v. Prouse, an officer generally has no authority to make a stop of a vehicle unless he at least has a reasonable articulable suspicion that a traffic violation has occurred or that an occupant is otherwise subject to seizure, and such a stop constitutes a seizure of its occupants. See text discussing Delaware v. Prouse et seq., section 3-9, infra, on roadblocks. See section 3-7, infra, on stop based on a telephone tip. In the case of a parked automobile it has been held that officers have no authority to approach the car to order occupants to remain in the vehicle in the absence of a reasonable suspicion.

In Montoya v. State, the court held that "[e]ven the existence of an improper motivation on the part of an officer does not render a stop unreasonable. The validity of the stop depends not on the officer's actual state of mind but on an objective assessment of his actions in light of all the facts and circumstances confronting him at the time."

In State v. Smith, the defendant and a co-defendant were seated in a car on a public street during the afternoon in February. An officer stopped his patrol car, approached the defendant's car, and told the defendant to let the window down or open the door. The defendant opened the door. The officer then smelled marijuana, and observed a cigarette burning in the ashtray. The car was searched and marijuana found. The court said that the officer had no articulable suspicion at the time he approached the car and by "instructing the defendant to either roll down his window or open the door, the police officer 'seized' the defendant within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment." In Tomlin v. State, the appellate court affirmed the denial of a motion to suppress where an officer was driving behind a vehicle driven by the defendant. The officer "saw a passenger . . . smoking and then blowing smoke that smelled like marijuana out [of] the truck window." The officer notified another officer who stopped the vehicle and found marijuana. The court concluded that "smelling marijuana . . . was a specific articulable fact that gave rise to a reasonable suspicion that there was marijuana" in the defendant's vehicle.

In Stanford v. State, the Court of Appeals set out the standard of review for an order on a motion to suppress as follows:

> First, when a motion to suppress is heard by the trial judge, that judge sits as the trier of facts. The trial judge hears the evidence, and his findings based upon conflicting evidence are analogous to the verdict of a jury and should not be disturbed by a reviewing court if there is any evidence to support it. Second, the trial court's decision with regard to the questions of fact and credibility must be accepted unless clearly erroneous. Third, the reviewing court must construe the evidence most favorably to the upholding of the trial court's finding and judgment. (Cites omitted.)

Applying this standard in State v. Jones, the court affirmed the trial court's order granting a motion to suppress where the defendant was stopped by a police officer investigating the defendant's 30 day drive-out tag. After reviewing documents supplied by defendant, which demonstrated that the tag was in order, the officer detained the defendant with further questions while retaining the defendant's license. The officer requested permission to search the defendant's vehicle, which was given. Suppressing the cocaine found during the search, the trial court determined that the officer's continued detention and questioning of the defendant after having been provided adequate proof regarding the defendant's tag was unreasonable.

In Brooks v. State, the court said, "Brooks and a woman companion, driving along a U. S. highway in a pickup truck at about 2:30 a.m. were observed by a sheriff and his deputy to turn onto a side road leading into a woods. They followed the car for some distance, then flashed their top light and brought it to a stop. The sheriff and the defendant got out of their respective vehicles and in the illumination of the headlights the defendant was observed to have a plastic bag sticking out of his shirt pocket. . . ." The court held that there was no articulable suspicion justifying the stop and reversed the denial of the motion to suppress.

However, in State v. Roberson, a car was stopped at a roadblock. An officer recognized Roberson, a passenger, as being either a person who had escaped from jail or his brother. The officer asked what his name was. Roberson gave a false name. The court held that the officer had an articulable suspicion justifying the asking of the question. See section 3-9, infra, on roadblocks.

The stop must be a "brief stop." It has been said, if not sustained, that "indeed, it is the transitory nature of the stop that justifies the elimination of the probable cause requirement." In applying this standard, the Georgia Court of Appeals has said "it tortures the English language to say" a 40–minute stop is a brief stop or momentary detention. In Schmidt v. State, the court held that a 30–minute detention constituted an arrest. On the other hand, in Sprauve v. State, the same court held that a 30–minute stop until officers could get a drug dog was not excessive. In United States v. Sharpe, the United States Supreme Court said that in "assessing whether a detention is too long in duration to be justified as an investigative stop, we consider it appropriate to examine whether the police diligently pursued a means of investigation that was likely to confirm or dispel their suspicions quickly, during which time it was necessary to detain the defendant . . . . A court making this assessment should take care to consider whether the police are acting in a swiftly developing situation, and in such cases the court should not indulge in unrealistic second-guessing . . . . The question is not simply whether some other alternative was available, but whether the police acted unreasonably in failing to recognize or pursue it." In United States v. Roper, the Eleventh Circuit said, "The distinction between an arrest and an investigatory stop depends upon the nature and degree of the intrusion under all the facts of the particular encounter." See section 3-12, infra.

In Terry, the officer thought Terry and his companions were preparing for an armed robbery and the Court discussed a balancing of the interest of a suspected person and the public. However, in Dunaway v. New York, the Supreme Court rejected the concept of such a sliding scale where a person was held without probable cause for purposes of investigating an armed robbery and murder.

What situations justify an officer in stopping an individual? As it would be expected, this question may arise in an infinite variety of situations. Also, it must be kept in mind that the existence of one or two suspicious circumstances may not justify a stop, but the existence of several suspicious circumstances may justify a stop. Some of the more common circumstances that have been considered by the courts in determining the validity of a stop are discussed in the following sections of this chapter.

In Brown v. State, the court held, "[I]n determining when an investigative stop is unreasonably pretextual, the proper inquiry . . . is not whether the officer could validly have made the stop but whether under the same circumstances a reasonable officer would have made the stop in the absence of the invalid purpose. . . ." (Emphasis in original.) In Guerrero v. State, the court pointed out that even if there is articulable suspicion, an investigatory stop is pretextual unless a reasonable officer would have made the stop in the absence of the invalid purpose.

However, in Brantley v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals followed the United States Supreme Court in Whren v. United States, in holding that from a federal constitutional standpoint, "when an officer sees a traffic offense occur, a resulting traffic stop does not violate the Fourth Amendment even if the officer has ulterior motives in initiating the stop, and even if a reasonable officer would not have made the stop under the same circumstances." In Hines v. State, the court pointed out that it is inconsequential whether or not a driver is ultimately cited for a traffic violation. See sections 3-3 and 4-26, infra.

In Forsman v. State, the court pointed out that the stop of a vehicle is authorized if the officer observes a traffic offense. The "failure to issue a citation or even an acquittal on an underlying traffic offense is of no consequence in determining the officer's [articulable suspicion necessary] to stop the vehicle. . . ."

In Michigan v. DeFillippo, the United States Supreme Court upheld a stop where an officer stopped a person, in good faith, pursuant to a city ordinance authorizing such a stop if the officer had reasonable cause to believe the suspect's behavior warrants further investigation. After the stop, but before a ruling on a motion to suppress, the ordinance had been held unconstitutional. See Illinois v. Krull, discussed in section 4-45, infra.

§ 3-3 Facts justifying the stop—Appearance

It has been held that an officer seeing a man with a bulge under his shirt near the scene of a homicide may stop him. The observance of a defendant, apparently with a weapon in his hand, standing behind a car in a parking lot (apparently at night) was found to justify a stop. In another case, however, where police obtained information about 1:30 a.m. that two persons in a restaurant were talking loud and might cause a disturbance and that one of them might be intoxicated, officers were held to have no right to stop two young, "hippy-looking" men who were simply walking down a sidewalk some five blocks from the restaurant.

In State v. Williams, the appellate court affirmed the granting of a motion to suppress where a patrolling officer observed four men during the morning standing on a curb near a housing project. No illegal or suspicious activity was seen. The officer testified his attention was drawn to them "as curb areas are popular locations for drug sales and the area around the housing project was known for drug activity." However, in State v. Banks, the court held that a stop was not justified by the "fact that a black man is standing [alone] next to an apartment building with his hand in his pocket at a reasonable hour. . . ."

In State v. Kwiatkowski, the appellate court affirmed the trial court in granting a motion to suppress evidence of marijuana found in a car. The case turned on the question of the validity of the "stop." Officers saw a car in a Department of Transportation parking lot in a "high drug area" with an out-of-state tag. The driver had a driver's license from still another state, one of the occupants seemed nervous, and they denied a request to search.

In Brooks v. State, however, the court held that an officer had no right to stop the driver of a pickup and his companion, where the pickup was being properly driven along a highway and the driver turned into a side road leading into the woods.

In State v. Dubose, officers were at a bus stop looking for a suspect in a murder which had occurred 24 hours earlier at the same bus stop. The men appeared to be gambling and drinking beer and wine. The court held that the officers had a right to approach the group, ask for identification and frisk the men for weapons. The men appeared to be engaged in criminal behavior and the officers conducted the pat-down search for their own protection.

An officer was held to be entitled to stop a van that was being driven slowly at 1:30 a.m. through the parking lot of a school when he knew that a nearby school had been burglarized numerous times. A lookout for a described car with a specified tag number justifies a stop of such car, even a number of miles away. See section 3-7, infra, on identification of auto used in the commission of a crime.

Although later overruled, the court in Watson v. State, the court held that an investigative stop was justified where the defendant was in a car having a "drive-out tag rather than a metal license tag" in view of the officer's "knowledge that many cars with drive-out tags turned out to have been stolen."

"[M]erely observing a can of beer in the hand of one who is otherwise driving a car or operating a boat in a safe manner does, in and of itself, constitute an articulable suspicion that a violation of . . . [the law] may be occurring so as to authorize a brief investigatory stop." Moreover, in Darby v. State, the trial court was affirmed in ruling that an officer's stop was not pretextual when he pulled the vehicle over to determine whether the crack in the "windshield . . . [had] a starburst or webbing effect" (made unlawful pursuant to O.C.G.A. § 40–8–73(e)).

In State v. Burns, the court affirmed the trial court in granting a motion to suppress. The officer had a "be on the lookout" alert for an older, yellow Monte Carlo occupied by two men, one believed to be a white man that had been involved in a purse snatching at a Lowe's store three days earlier. The officer testified that he saw an older yellow or tan Monte Carlo about two miles from the store. There appeared to be two occupants, although the windows were tinted. The court concluded the officer did not have a reasonable suspicion for the stop.

In Whren v. United States, the United States Supreme Court held that when an officer has probable cause to believe a driver has committed a traffic offense, the officer may stop the driver even if a reasonable officer would not have stopped the motorist absent some additional law enforcement objective. In Maxwell v. State, the court affirmed the denial of a motion to suppress where an officer followed a vehicle with the intention of finding "a violation and stop[ping] the vehicle." See section 4-26, infra, on pretextual arrests.

In State v. Hammang, an officer stopped a driver for driving without having her headlights on. The officer testified it was almost dark and all other cars he could see had their lights on. The driver was arrested for DUI and filed a motion to suppress based on the fact that the stop was at approximately 9:00 p.m., that sunset that day was at 8:34 p.m. and that she was not required to have her lights on until 9:04 pm. The grant of the motion to suppress was reversed by the appellate court. The court pointed out that "[i]f the officer acting in good faith believes an unlawful act has been committed, his actions are not rendered improper by a later legal determination that the defendant's actions were not a crime according to a technical legal definition or distinction determined to exist in the penal statute." See § 2-26, supra.

§ 3-4 Facts justifying the stop—Airport drug courier profile

The concept of the drug courier profile does not fit precisely into this general material on stop and frisk, but it seems to be more appropriate to discuss it here than elsewhere. General airport searches are discussed in section 4-34, infra. Searches of spectators to recreational events to find contraband are discussed in section 4-36, infra. Inasmuch as the airport drug courier profile stops are somewhat different from other stops discussed in this chapter, this section attempts to discuss not only when such a stop may be made or attempted, but it also discusses what action may be taken by officers after such a stop or attempted stop.

As background information, it should be pointed out that there are "three tiers of police-citizen encounters: [1] communication between police and citizen involving no coercion or detention and therefore without the compass of the Fourth Amendment, [2] brief 'seizures' that must be supported by reasonable suspicion, and [3] full-scale arrests that must be supported by probable cause."

Most cases have held that there is no right to stop a person at an airport simply because he fits the drug courier profile. In United States v. Ballard, the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit defined the airport drug courier profile as "a compilation of factors considered . . . to be indicative of drug activity. Included among those characteristics listed are: (a) unusual nervousness; (b) no luggage or very limited luggage; (c) possession of an unusually large amount of cash, especially when in bills of small denominations; (d) unusual itinerary, taking circuitous routes from cities known to be source cities for narcotics, such as flying to New Orleans from Los Angeles by way of St. Louis; (e) arriving from a known narcotics source city; (f) paying for an airline ticket in currency of small denominations; (g) purchasing a one-way ticket; (h) use of an alias; (i) use of a false telephone number on an airline reservation; (j) placing a telephone call immediately upon arrival at the airport; and (k) travel by a known narcotics trafficker." The same case pointed out that the elements of the profile that were said to exist in that case did not "in any significant way operate to distinguish Ballard from the general public."

In United States v. Mendenhall, the United States Supreme Court was presented with the opportunity to clarify the legality of reliance on the drug courier profile. The question remains unsettled, however, due to lack of agreement on the basis of the decision among the justices forming the majority. While the officers' conduct in stopping and questioning the defendant was found to be lawful, two justices reached this conclusion on the basis that the stop did not constitute a seizure, and three concurring justices assumed that a seizure had occurred but found it justified by a reasonable and articulable suspicion, arising in part from factors included in the profile. The concurring justices noted that reliance on the profile would not necessarily establish a reasonable suspicion, noting that each case must be decided on its own facts. The four dissenting justices found that no reasonable and articulable suspicion of criminal activity had been shown and characterized the stop in question as one based on a mere hunch.

A later decision of the United States Supreme Court, in Reid v. Georgia, vacated a decision of the Georgia

Court of Appeals holding that there was a reasonable articulable suspicion justifying a stop since the suspect fell within the drug courier profile. The Supreme Court, in a brief per curiam decision with three dissents, did not discuss the "drug courier profile" generally, but the Court concluded that as a matter of law the stop was not justified where "(1) the petitioner had arrived from Fort Lauderdale, which the agent testified is a principal place of origin of cocaine sold elsewhere in the country, (2) the petitioner arrived in the early morning, when law enforcement activity is diminished, (3) he and his companion appeared to the agent to be trying to conceal the fact that they were traveling together, and (4) they apparently had no luggage other than their shoulder bags." The court pointed out that these circumstances "describe a very large category of presumably innocent travelers."

On remand, the Georgia Court of Appeals vacated its earlier decision and affirmed the trial judge's granting of the defendant's motion to suppress. The Georgia Supreme Court then granted certiorari and concluded that the United States Supreme Court found "that the evidence did not as a matter of law show a basis for an articulable or reasonable suspicion sufficient to justify any seizure of Reid, even a 'Terry stop.' " The Georgia Supreme Court concluded that it must be first determined whether Reid was seized when he was first stopped. If he was seized at this point, the suppression of the trial judge must be sustained. However, the Georgia Supreme Court determined that there was no seizure in the initial encounter between the agent and Reid when it was suggested that Reid return to the terminal and he was requested to consent to a search. There was nothing to suggest that a reasonable person would have felt he was not free to go. Therefore, the initial approach was not a seizure. Hence, it was error for the trial judge to find that Reid was under arrest when the agent suggested that he go back to the terminal. The case was then remanded for further proceedings consistent with the opinion. Reid again applied to the United States Supreme Court for writ of certiorari, but the petition was denied.

In the Eleventh Circuit's en banc decision of United States v. Berry, the Court found no definitive guidance in the opinions of the United States Supreme Court to determine when an airport stop constitutes a seizure under the Fourth Amendment. The court stated that it would turn, therefore, to its own (Fifth Circuit's) opinions, which "though establishing a clearer line of precedent . . . form a confusing thicket. . . ." The Berry court concluded "that airport stops of individuals by police, if of extremely restricted scope and conducted in a completely non-coercive manner, do not invoke the Fourth Amendment." Of course, a seizure has occurred if " 'in view of all the circumstances surrounding the incident, a reasonable person would have believed that he was not free to leave.' "Whether or not a stop amounts to a seizure may turn on the tone of voice of the officer, the blocking of a person's path or "otherwise intercepting him to prevent his progress . . . , retaining an individual's ticket for more than a minimal amount of time or by taking a ticket over to a ticket counter," whether the officers made statements that an investigation had focused on the individual, informing an individual that an innocent person would cooperate with officers, and whether the passenger is informed that he is free not to consent to a search and is free to call a lawyer.

The Berry court pointed out that a match between the defendant and the drug courier profile characteristics does not, of itself, necessarily provide reasonable suspicion: "The profile is nothing more than an administrative tool of the police. The presence or absence of a particular characteristic on any particular profile is of no legal significance in the determination of reasonable suspicion." In United States v. Robinson, the court held that the Fourth Amendment aspects of Berry apply retroactively, at least to all convictions not final at the time the decision was rendered.

The Georgia Court of Appeals, in 1982, in Berry v. State, a case completely distinct from United States v. Berry, concluded that the "drug courier profile provides sufficient articulable and reasonable suspicion to authorize a 'Terry-type' stop." Despite the fact that the Eleventh Circuit Berry case stated that "[t]he presence or absence of a particular characteristic on any particular profile is of no legal significance in the determination of reasonable suspicion," in the four to three decision of Bothwell v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court said that the profile characteristics are important in determining "whether there is a basis for a specific and articulable suspicion." In Pullano v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals said that the drug courier profile plus information that the defendant "would be returning to Florida in a few hours, his apparent nervousness, the fact that he deplaned at least three or four minutes after the last passenger left" was sufficient to justify an investigatory stop. In Murphy v. State, the court pointed out that although the factors satisfying the drug courier profile are sufficient to justify a stop and frisk, they are still insufficient to establish probable cause for an arrest or search.

In Rebeiro v. State, the court said the drug courier profile plus the giving of a false name or obviously incorrect information may constitute probable cause for arrest. But in Rebeiro the court also said that where information given is not obviously false, probable cause does not exist.

In the 1989 case of United States v. Sokolow, the United States Supreme Court stated that in determining the validity of a stop, "[W]e must consider 'the totality of the circumstances—the whole picture.' "In approval of the denial of the motion to suppress, the Court pointed out that while no one of the factors testified to by officers was sufficient to justify the stop, "we think taken together they amount to reasonable suspicion. . . . A court sitting to determine the existence of reasonable suspicion must require the agent to articulate the factors leading to that conclusion, but the fact that these factors may be set forth in a 'profile' does not somehow detract from their evidentiary significance as seen by a trained agent." (Emphasis added.) However, in Gordon v. State, the court pointed out that when a tipster provides "detailed information including [the defendant's] name, his physical description, a description of his clothing . . . , and information regarding his flight itinerary . . . [which were] independently verified . . . [it is sufficient] to justify an investigative stop."

The Fifth Circuit has held that where an individual consents to a pat-down of his outer garments and the officer pats him down in search of weapons or contraband and the officer feels a soft object in an inner pocket which he believes to be contraband, the officer may reach inside the jacket and remove the substance. The court concluded that this amounts only to a reasonable narcotics pat-down.

In Florida v. Rodriguez, the United States Supreme Court held that where plainclothes police officers approached citizens in an airport, identified themselves as police officers and asked if the citizens would step aside and talk, it was merely a "consensual encounter" and raised none of the citizens' Fourth Amendment rights. The court expressly did not decide whether continuing a discussion, which leads to a search, amounts to a "stop" requiring an articulable suspicion. However, the First Circuit has held that prolonged questioning may amount to a seizure.

In 1983, the United States Supreme Court decided Florida v. Royer, which is very much like the Georgia case of Bothwell v. State. Bothwell is discussed in section 3-13, infra. Royer purchased a one-way airline ticket to New York from Miami under an assumed name. He checked his two suitcases and went to the concourse leading to the boarding area. Two detectives approached Royer since they believed that he fit the drug courier profile. Upon request, Royer produced his ticket and driver's license which contained his correct name. When questioned, Royer explained that a friend had made the reservation for him under an assumed name. They informed Royer that they were narcotics officers and had reason to suspect him of transporting drugs. They retained Royer's ticket and driver's license and asked him to accompany them to a small room adjacent to the concourse. Without Royer's consent, one of the officers obtained his luggage and brought it to the room. Royer did not verbally respond to the detective's request that he consent to a search of his luggage, but he produced a key and unlocked one suitcase in which marijuana was found. Royer said that he did not know the combination to the lock on the other suitcase but that he did not object to its being opened. The officers pried the second suitcase open and found additional marijuana. Royer was then told he was under arrest. The trial court denied a motion to suppress. The Florida District Court of Appeal reversed, holding that Royer had been involuntarily confined within the small room without probable cause at the time of his consent to search, that the restraint exceeded that permitted by Terry v. Ohio and that his consent was tainted by the unlawful confinement. The Supreme Court affirmed. The plurality opinion of Justices White, Marshall, Powell and Stevens substantially agreed with the Florida District Court. Justice Brennan concurred in the result but complained that the plurality reached issues which did not have to be reached in order to affirm.

The syllabus of the Court states that "[w]hen the detectives identified themselves as narcotics agents, told . . . [the defendant] he was suspected of transporting narcotics, and asked him to accompany them to the police room, while retaining his airline ticket and driver's license and without indicating in any way that he was free to depart, [the defendant] was effectively seized for purposes of the Fourth Amendment. At the time [the defendant] produced the key to his suitcase, the detention to which he was then subjected was a more serious intrusion on his personal liberty than is allowable on mere suspicion of criminal activity. What had begun as a consensual inquiry in a public place escalated into an investigatory procedure in a police interrogation room, and [the defendant], as a practical matter, was under arrest at that time. Moreover, the detectives' conduct was more intrusive than necessary to effectuate an investigative detention otherwise authorized by the Terry line of cases." Also there was no probable cause to arrest the defendant at the time he consented to the search of his luggage.

In United States v. Waksal, the Eleventh Circuit held that where a suspect matching the "drug courier profile" is stopped at an airport, the stop amounts to a seizure where his ticket is obtained and retained, he is not told that he is free to leave and he is asked to accompany the officers to an office. On these facts, the defendant "could not reasonably have felt that he was free to leave."

See section 4-31, infra, on waiver and consent to a search. See section 3-13, infra, on retention of inanimate objects without probable cause. Also see section 4-34, infra, on airport searches connected with aircraft hijackings; section 4-35, infra, on searches on entering courthouses; and section 4-36, infra, on searches of persons entering places of entertainment and recreation. See Annotation, "Propriety of stop and search by law enforcement officers based solely on drug courier profile," 37 A. L. R. 5th 1 (1996) and Annotation, "Admissibility of drug courier profile testimony in criminal prosecution," 69 A. L. R. 5th 425 (1999).

§ 3-5 Facts justifying the stop—Ships and boats

In the 1983 United States Supreme Court case of United States v. Villamonte–Marquez, the Court reasoned that ships are not like automobiles in terms of the Fourth Amendment. The first Congress authorized the boarding of vessels even in the absence of suspicion. "[P]ermanent checkpoints [are not] practical on waters such as these where vessels can move in any direction at any time and need not follow established 'avenues' as automobiles must do. . . . [Also the] documentation requirements with respect to vessels are significantly different than the system of vehicle licensing. . . ." The government relied on 19 U. S. C. § 1581(a), which provided in part as follows: "Any officer of the customs may at any time go on board of any vessel . . . at any place in the United States . . . and examine the manifest and other documents and papers . . . and to this end may hail and stop such vessel . . . and use all necessary force to compel compliance." The court defined the issue as follows: "We are asked to decide whether the Fourth Amendment is offended when Customs officials, acting pursuant to this statute and without any suspicion of wrongdoing, board for inspection of documents a vessel that is located in waters providing ready access to the open sea." (Emphasis added.) The court concluded that there had not been any Fourth Amendment violation.

In United States v. Gollwitzer, the Eleventh Circuit held that a vessel capable of ocean travel could be stopped without reasonable suspicion where the ship was traveling in the Intracoastal Waterway. A few questions may be asked by customs officials and a visual inspection from the customs ship may be made. If what the officers see and the answers they receive provide a reasonable suspicion, the vessel may be boarded. The court suggested that this rule would not apply to smaller crafts which are incapable of ocean travel. In United States v. Kubiak, the Eleventh Circuit held that a Coast Guard has authority to stop a 31–foot Chris Craft vessel five or six miles from the coastline "in complete absence of suspicion of criminal activity." The court pointed out that the vessel was in "custom waters" and was subject to 14 U. S. C. § 89(a). In United States v. Hidalgo-Gato, the same circuit, while pointing out that the territorial waters of the United States extend out three miles from the coast, concluded that there is a contiguous 12–mile zone outside the territorial waters in which a vessel may be stopped, boarded, and searched by customs officials without probable cause or suspicion so long as the search is reasonable. This zone is regarded as the functional equivalent to the border.

In United States v. One (1) 1982 28%2C International Vessel, the Eleventh Circuit upheld the search of the lower deck of a ship stopped at a blockade for a routine check. Activity on the ship had been carried on to deceive observers into believing the ship was shrimping. Then the officer discovered that he had stopped the vessel under similar circumstances the previous month. The investigation had revealed "a deck sealed by screws . . . and a space beneath the deck that could not be accounted for."

However, in Palmer v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals held that customs officials may make an investigative stop of a vessel on inland waters "if they are aware of articulable facts which justify a reasonable suspicion of illegal activity." Actually, the shrimp boat involved in Palmer was apparently in the ocean headed toward the open sea when it was stopped.

In Jackson v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals held that O.C.G.A. § 52–7–25(b)(4) clearly authorized an enforcement officer of the Georgia Department of Natural Resources to stop a boat on Lake Lanier. The court declined to consider the stop under Terry standards and pointed out that the officer need not suspect wrongdoing. Such an officer is authorized "to make investigatory stops of watercraft for the sole purpose of verifying that the operator has the proper documentation and safety equipment. . . . [T]he boating public does not necessarily have the same expectation of privacy on regulated waterways as does the motoring public." In Peruzzi v. State, the Supreme Court turned back a constitutional challenge to the statute noting that Georgia now "joins a growing list of states that recognize the legitimacy of suspicionless boat safety inspections and their minimal impact on the privacy of boaters."

See section 3-7, infra, on report of a crime and section 3-8, infra, on a protective sweep.

§ 3-6 Facts justifying the stop—Conduct

An officer on routine patrol in a rural area where several burglaries had occurred was held entitled to stop a car from another county that was being driven slowly on a dirt road, where the passenger looked back and thereafter both the passenger and the driver started doing something in the back seat that caused the officer to think they were hiding something. An officer, however, does not have a reasonable and articulable suspicion to stop a man who went to his car, got in and drove off, after the officer saw him looking in the window of another car parked in a shopping center as though he were going to try to get in the car, when the officer knew that no damage had been done to the parked car. However, in Darracott v. State, the court upheld a stop where an officer saw several young people standing in a shopping center parking lot about midnight and there were beer cans and other litter scattered about and the defendant jumped in a vehicle and drove off as the officer approached. Also, the same result was reached in Stanley v. State, where the defendant saw a roadblock and backed up his vehicle in an "evasive action."

In State v. Canidate, an officer was responding to a call when he noticed a brown Nissan Maxima in the driveway of a house which he knew had previously been raided for drugs. When the officer was returning, he saw a brown Maxima coming toward him. Thinking the driver may have been buying drugs at the house, he pulled around behind the car. The officer said the car appeared to accelerate as he turned around behind it. The officer further testified that he was behind the car for 10 to 15 seconds when the car quickly pulled over into the parking lot of a real estate business. When asked why he was attempting to avoid the police, the driver explained he was trying to get to the real estate agent to see about buying a house. The trial judge found that the initial stop had been based on a hunch, not a particularized articulable suspicion. The appellate court affirmed the verdict and pointed out that the officer admitted that he did not have any basis for stopping the driver when he pulled in behind him. The court further noted that the act of pulling into the parking lot did not create an articulable suspicion.

In Strawser v. State, the appellate court reversed the trial court's denial of a defendant's motion to suppress where "a police officer . . . [had been] dispatched to pick up a . . . [wife] and daughter who were out walking in Warner Robins just before midnight." The wife of the defendant was crying and told the officer she had left the defendant's mother's home after arguing with the defendant. No physical altercation or violence was involved. The officer drove the defendant's wife to her mother-in-law's residence to get her belongings. While standing in front of the house, the defendant drove past the house to the end of the street, turned around and passed the house again. The officer thought it "odd" that the defendant did not stop at his mother's house, and followed the defendant "to get his side of the story." He asked the defendant why he did not stop and the defendant replied that he did not want to be arrested for driving under the influence. The appellate court concluded the conduct of the defendant was not sufficient to support a suspicion that the defendant was committing or was about to commit a crime.

In Edgell v. State, the Court of Appeals reversed the denial of a motion to suppress filed by the defendant passenger in a vehicle which was properly stopped by the arresting officer because of an expired tag. After ticketing the driver and impounding the vehicle, the officer instructed the defendant to exit the vehicle. Because the defendant acted nervously and pursuant to the officer's "routine" of patting down everyone whom he directs to exit a vehicle, he patted down the defendant over his protests. The officer arrested both the defendant and the driver when he felt a hard object in the defendant's pocket. Following the arrest, he placed his hand into the defendant's pockets and discovered a crack pipe and a small amount of marijuana. Concluding that the officer lacked any articulable suspicion that the defendant was engaged in any criminal activity, the court found that both the detention and the pat down were improper. The Court's observation is worth noting: "An individual's rights under the Fourth Amendment are not automatically waived . . . simply because he or she is asked to step out of a vehicle. The safety of officers is of extreme importance to this court. Nonetheless, our Constitution requires an officer to provide evidence to show that an act alleged to be performed for his safety was actually performed for that purpose in conformance with the requisite standards of Terry."

In McDaniel v. State, the Court of Appeals upheld an officer's investigative stop of a vehicle where the occupants had been seen peering into a parked car and upon seeing the police car, the driver "slammed on his brakes, turned off his headlights, and immediately put his vehicle in reverse. [The] [d]efendant raced away, unsuccessfully trying to enter a secure complex before abruptly speeding off again." In affirming, the court concluded that "[t]hese odd and evasive circumstances created a reasonable suspicion of criminal activity to permit a limited investigative stop. . . ."

In State v. Billoups, the court reversed the granting of a motion to suppress. Here two men broke and ran when they saw an officer about 2:30 a.m. in a high drug area. The court concluded there was probable cause to arrest but the incident seems to fit in better with stop and frisk cases. It is important to note that the court based its reversal on the totality of the circumstances surrounding the transaction. Flight in connection with other circumstances may be sufficient probable cause to uphold a warrantless arrest or search, the surrounding circumstances in this case being the time of night and the area and "certainly these circumstances [give] rise to an articulable suspicion . . . as to authorize a brief investigatory stop."

In State v. Taylor, the defendant approached an officer and said, "I believe you are looking for me." The confused officer said, "Is that right?" and seized the defendant. The appellate court affirmed the trial judge's conclusion that the comment did not provide the requisite articulable suspicion to justify the immediate seizure of defendant. "Nor did the fact that [defendant] was bicycling through a 'known drug area' give rise to articulable suspicion."

In In the Interest of J. L. G., an anonymous call to police reported the presence of a person (whose clothing was described) with a hand gun. The officers arrived within minutes. The defendant was dressed as described and when he "saw the police car, he stuck his hand in his pocket, [and] turned away from the officers." When the officers started exiting their car, the defendant ran and refused to stop on command. The court affirmed the denial of a motion to suppress pointing out that there was an articulable suspicion justifying a stop and probable cause to arrest. In Davis v. State, the court pointed out that "[f]light may be evidence of a consciousness of guilt and may give rise to an articulable suspicion that a person is engaged in criminal activity . . . ."

In Kingree v. State, the court affirmed the denial of a motion to suppress where the officer stopped the defendant's car in an area known for drug arrests after witnessing two "lookouts" signaling to the driver, the passenger fleeing, and the driver backing the car away from the officer. These facts supported the officer's suspicion that he had interrupted a drug sale. However, in Barnes v. State, it was held that "mere presence in an area known to police for drug activity, without more, is insufficient to support a reasonable suspicion that one is engaged in or about to engage in criminal activity. 'An investigatory stop must be justified by some objective manifestation that the person stopped is, or is about to be, engaged in criminal activity.' " (Emphasis in original.) See section 3-8, infra, on environment issues relative to a stop.

In Duke v. State, the denial of the defendant's motion to suppress was reversed where "officers were watching an apartment for suspected drug sales" but "the only facts known by . . . officers were that . . . [the defendant] stopped his van in the apartment complex parking lot, he went down the stairs, he came back up the stairs and he left in van." This did not give the officers an objective basis for suspecting the defendant of criminal activities and justify the stop of his van.

"[A]s a general matter, the decision to stop an automobile is reasonable where the police have probable cause to believe that a traffic violation has occurred." An officer may stop a driver who is speeding or who has committed any other violation of the law. However, driving 49 miles per hour in a location where the speed limit is 70 miles per hour does not per se create a reasonable suspicion for stopping a car. See section 3-7, infra.

In State v. Whitfield, the court held that when an officer observes a motorist "weaving" this is sufficient to justify the officer in stopping the driver for a possible DUI violation, even if the weaving was in a single lane.

In State v. Armstrong, the court held that an officer is not required to know with certainty each element of a particular crime that could be established in order to make a valid stop. "If the officer acting in good faith believes that an unlawful act has been committed, his actions are not rendered improper by a later legal determination that the defendant's actions were not a crime according to a technical legal definition. . . ."

In State v. Blair, the court affirmed the trial court's granting of a motion to suppress. An officer stopped the car in which the defendant was riding in the back seat because the car was being driven with a dealer's drive-out tag. The officer said he was suspicious because no one produced any proof of ownership of the car. The occupants provided conflicting explanations of the purpose of their journey. All occupants appeared very nervous and the defendant was clutching a bag. The officer thought "something was going on," asked for permission to search and received a negative answer. As another officer drove up, the defendant fled with his bag, which was found to contain marijuana when he was arrested. Here, the officer stopped the car because of the tag. The stop was valid, but the evidence supports the trial judge's finding that the officer abandoned that investigation and held the occupants to conduct a search for drugs.

In Berry v. State, the Court of Appeals held that "the critical issue to the validity of a traffic stop is whether the officer had 'a particularized and objective basis for suspecting the particular person stopped of criminal activity.' " Applying this standard to a stop based upon the officer's suspicion that an auto might be stolen solely on the basis that it was being operated with a drive-out tag, the court concluded the stop was not authorized. Likewise, the court found in Bius v. State, that a stop was not warranted based upon an officer's suspicion that a vehicle might not be in compliance with motor vehicle registration laws solely because it was being driven with a drive-out tag.

In Dorsey v. State, an officer recognized Dorsey, who was driving a car. The officer had arrested him the year before on a bench warrant on a charge of being an habitual violator. The officer stopped Dorsey "because he knew that he might not have a driver's license." The court concluded that the officer had "specific and articulable facts" that warranted the stop for investigation.

Brisbane v. State is illustrative of a number of cases involving robberies at service stations in the very early morning hours. An armed robbery by three men occurred at one service station. Later, at about 3:45 a.m., while on routine patrol, an officer stopped at another station that had been the scene of a number of robberies. The officer noticed an automobile containing three occupants driving slowly by the station. Then the same vehicle approached the station again and slowed down again. The court held that the officer, who stopped the car, had a specific, articulable suspicion justifying the stop.

In Bailey v. State, an officer observed the defendant's car with a door open at a well-lit but closed service station about 2:00 a.m. The car was parked near a restroom and some vending machines. The station had been the scene of previous robberies and burglaries and the vending machine had been broken into on many occasions. As the officer approached the defendant, a co-defendant dropped or threw something from the car and the car left at a high rate of speed. The court concluded that the stop was authorized pursuant to Terry. However, in the Louisiana case of State v. Blanton, the court held that an investigatory stop was not justified merely because the defendant met some people at the airport who were under surveillance for drug violations, and drove them home.

In Oboh v. State, the court reversed the denial of a motion to suppress. The case turned on the validity of the defendant's stop. "The deputy simply saw a stranger drive a van (with bumper stickers with the insignia of a rental car agency) into a bank parking lot, observed bank tellers scrutinize the stranger as he was preparing to leave the bank's parking lot and was informed by one of the tellers that this stranger 'was acting very suspicious.' "

In Edwards v. State, the court held that an investigatory stop was authorized where the defendant sat in his truck during traffic signal cycle while pouring out what appeared to be beer. In State v. Adams, the court affirmed a stop of the driver of a vehicle where the officer saw the defendant changing lanes without giving a signal, even though the officer did not charge the defendant with improper lane change, but charged the defendant with driving under the influence based largely on information obtained at the time of the stop for illegal lane change. However, in State v. Goodman, the court held there were no articulable facts justifying a stop of the driver where the driver made a turn without signaling despite the presence of traffic behind him, since the statute contemplates instances in which a turn on a roadway can be made with reasonable safety without use of a turn signal, i.e., where a signal is not necessary to alert other drivers of a motorist's intention to turn.

In addition to the right to stop because of an articulable suspicion of a crime, the case of Dickson v. State holds that officers have a right to stop a person in an automobile who creates "a safety and traffic hazard."

In Streicher v. State, the court reversed the trial judge's denial of a motion to suppress where the officer saw the driver and passenger exchange places in an automobile, at about 8:30 a.m., when the car stopped at a stop sign. The officer did not suspect at the time that the occupants were engaged in criminal conduct, but in his experience every time something like this happened, he had found that there was intoxication or that someone did not have a driver's license. However, in State v. Templeman, the court affirmed the trial judge in finding that there was no articulable suspicion where the defendant stopped in the roadway 25 to 50 feet from an intersection for 45 to 60 seconds while facing a green traffic light in order to pick up a friend.

Two decisions worth comparing are Crowley v. State and State v. Newton. In Crowley, an officer stopped the defendant without "a particularized and objective basis for suspecting him of criminal activity," and then subsequently stopped him again after the individual fled. The Court of Appeals held that the defendant's flight provided sufficient reasonable suspicion to uphold the second detention. In contrast, the Court of Appeals in Newton concluded that an initial stop where officers exceeded the scope of Terry tainted the discovery of evidence found during a subsequent stop after the defendant fled. However, these two cases may be harmonized by the fact that the Newton Court did not directly address whether or not flight may provide an articulable suspicion to justify a consecutive stop of a suspect.

See section 4-21, infra, on frisk connected with execution of a search warrant.

§ 3-7 Facts justifying the stop—Report of a crime

In Adams v. Williams, the United States Supreme Court held that an officer was justified in approaching a man in a car in a high crime area during the early morning hours and in questioning him, where the officer had been told by a known informant that the suspect would be found there and that he was armed and carrying narcotics.

In United States v. White, an anonymous telephone tipster's information given to an officer plus the verification of some of the innocent details were said to add up to an articulable suspicion justifying a stop of the occupants of a car.

Conversely, "an unverified tip from an informant may not supply probable cause for a search or a warrant, [however,] if the information carries enough indicia of reliability, it will authorize a forcible stop of a suspect to maintain the status quo momentarily while obtaining more information."

In Alabama v. White, an officer received an anonymous phone call stating that "Vanessa White would be leaving 235–C Lynwood Terrace Apartments at a particular time in a brown Plymouth station wagon with the right taillight lens broken, that she would be going to Dobey's Motel, and that she would be in possession of about an ounce of cocaine inside a brown attache case." The officer drove to the Lynwood Terrace Apartments and saw a brown Plymouth station wagon with a broken right taillight in the parking lot in front of the 235 building. The officer saw the defendant leave the 235 building with nothing in her hands and enter the station wagon. The officer followed the Plymouth as it was driven in the most direct route to Dobey's Motel. The officer stopped the vehicle just before it reached Dobey's Motel. The officer informed the defendant she was stopped because she was suspected of carrying cocaine in the vehicle. He asked for and received permission to search the car. In the search he found an attache case which contained marijuana and in the defendant's pocket book he found cocaine. In upholding the stop, the court declined to say that an "anonymous caller could never provide the reasonable suspicion necessary for a Terry stop" but it concluded that "when the officers stopped . . . [the defendant], the anonymous tip had been sufficiently corroborated to furnish reasonable suspicion that . . . [the defendant] was engaged in criminal activity and that the investigative stop therefore did not violate the Fourth Amendment." In State v. Williams, the court quoted from White "that 'articulable suspicion' may not be grounded in an anonymous tip alone." See the excellent opinion of Judge Beasley in State v. Ball, which follows White.

In Florida v. J. L., the United States Supreme Court pointed out that reasonable suspicion existed in White, but that case was "borderline." Florida v. J. L. then held that "[a]n anonymous tip that a person is carrying a gun is not, without more, sufficient to justify a police officer's stop and frisk. . . ." However, the court also pointed out that in Florida v. J. L., "[a]ll the police had to go on . . . was the bare report of an unknown, unaccountable informant who neither explained how he knew about the gun nor supplied any basis for believing he had inside information about J. L." Furthermore, the court refused to grant an exception for cases involving firearms.

In McKinley v. State, the court reversed the trial judge's denial of a motion to suppress where police "received an anonymous telephone tip that four black males in a white Chevrolet Lumina van with Hillsborough County, Florida, license plates were attempting to sell cocaine on Butler Street in Camilla, Georgia." An officer in an unmarked car followed a white van occupied by two men to a parking lot in front of a convenience store and activated his blue light on his dash. As both the driver and the passenger were getting out of the van, the officer approached the driver and asked to see his driver's license and proof of insurance. The officer told the passenger to get back in the van and close the door. The driver produced his license and rental agreement for the van which did not list him as the renter or as an additional driver. Another officer arrived and told the passenger to get out of the van. Consent to search the van was given, but the appellate court held that the occupants of the van had been seized before the consent was given and that the consent was not freely given.

In Johnson v. State, the court held that a stop was not justified by "an anonymous telephone tip that two black men in a black truck were selling drugs on Lewis Street."

In Tedford v. State, the court affirmed the validity of a stop and frisk where officers received a call from the cook of a designated fast food restaurant who stated that "a customer approached him and said that he had been talking to a white male driving a blue vehicle with Georgia license tag number BX 307 outside the restaurant and that the man told the customer to leave the area because he was going to rob the restaurant. The officer who responded . . . testified that when he arrived he parked directly behind the vehicle matching the description . . . and that he immediately observed [the] defendant opening his door and exiting his vehicle."

In the Georgia case of State v. Holton, the court cited and relied on Alabama v. White. It emphasized that in that case and in the Holton case, the anonymous tipster predicted future behavior which was corroborated by observations of the police. The Georgia Court of Appeals said that such a prediction of future conduct and corroboration was necessary to authorize an investigative stop from an anonymous caller. However, in the Eleventh Circuit case of United States v. Gibson, the court held that an anonymous tip that a potentially armed person is in a public establishment justifies an investigative stop, without including information as to future conduct, in view of an overriding concern for the safety of the police and the public.

In United States v. Kent, the Eleventh Circuit acknowledged that a tip from an informant of unknown reliability will not ordinarily create a reasonable suspicion of criminality, but information from a known informant of unknown reliability has more indicia of reliability than an anonymous telephone tip. Also, corroboration of innocent details may change an otherwise insubstantial tip into a reasonable suspicion of criminal activity. Thus, where a known but unproved informant notified a Customs Patrol Officer that a white yacht-type, 50–foot vessel with three persons on board would be coming into the area of the Coral Gables Waterway within an hour carrying a load of marijuana, and a Customs vessel observed such a vessel about 45 minutes later and it was the only vessel observed in the area at that time, a stop and boarding was justified. See section 3-5, supra, on ships and boats.

In Bentley v. State, the court held that information provided by a known but untested confidential informant had more indicia of reliability than an anonymous tip.

In Archer v. State, the court held that the stop of the defendant was justified when "the details of that tip, including the predicted timing and route of a particular vehicle driven by a particular individual, were confirmed by the personal observations of the investigating officers."

Likewise, the Georgia Court of Appeals has upheld the action of an officer in stopping an individual where the officer had received a call from a known "civic" informer who stated that "an unknown black male, driving a 1978 gold Pontiac LeMans, was selling marijuana in 'nickel' bags at a specified location. The officer receiving the call . . . immediately departed for the location . . . and arrived within fifteen to twenty-five minutes." When the officer arrived he saw the defendant, who fit the description and was carrying a shopping bag, entering the only 1978 gold LeMans in the area. The court held that the officer had an articulable suspicion warranting the stop of the defendant as he tried to drive away.

In Graves v. State, an officer was executing a search warrant. Graves was present and the officer had been informed by a reliable informant that Graves always carried a weapon. The Georgia Court of Appeals held that a stop, and a later frisk, were justified.

In Vansant v. State, an officer stopped a white van. The officer had followed the vehicle for a half mile observing no traffic violation other than that the vehicle did not stop promptly when the flashing blue light was turned on. The only reason the van was stopped was because a white van had been involved in a hit and run accident about a mile away. The court concluded the facts did not justify an articulable suspicion. "[H]owever, . . . when an officer sees a traffic offense occur, a resulting traffic stop does not violate the Fourth Amendment even if the officer had ulterior motives in initiating the stop . . . " and even if the officer did not charge the defendant with the traffic offense observed. In State v. Hall, the court held there may be a Terry stop of an automobile if there is an initial minor traffic violation which an officer witnessed. However, the officer must have some other basis (i.e., the officer must have a reasonable suspicion of criminal conduct) for conducting additional questioning and searching a vehicle once a normal traffic stop has ended and the officer has told the motorist he is free to go. "Although this suspicion need not meet the standard of probable cause, it must be more than mere caprice or a hunch or an inclination." See section 4-26, infra.

In contrast to Vansant, the court in State v. Harden upheld a stop where police received a tip that an inebriated driver was about to leave a bank parking lot, and an officer shortly thereafter observed a vehicle leaving that location. The Court distinguished Vansant on the basis that in that case, the defendant's van was stopped a mile away from where the tipster observed the vehicle. Hence, it appears that police may stop a vehicle based on a tip that the driver is inebriated without corroboration of that tip as long as the officer can be reasonably certain that they are stopping the car described by the tipster.

In Shorter v. State, the court, citing Vansant, held that a general tip to be on the lookout for a white van may not create sufficient articulable suspicion. The court pointed out that "a more particularized description of a suspect vehicle" was needed to justify a Terry stop.

However, in McSwain v. State, the court held that "an officer's decision to broadcast a lookout" for a described car alone does not "create reasonable suspicion for another officer to stop the vehicle." Here there was no evidence of collective knowledge of officers which would give rise to reasonable suspicion that would justify a Terry stop.

In Overand v. State, the court concluded that "[a] dispatcher who reports a crime at a specified location gives police an articulable suspicion to investigate and detain individuals at the scene, particularly where police observations on arriving at the scene corroborate the dispatcher's report," and the officer is "not required to question dispatchers about the source of the information."

In McGhee v. State, the court stated "that when the police received a call to be on the lookout for a car . . . and the car in question roughly fit the description given for the lookout, this provided the basis for an articulable suspicion justifying the stop." See section 3-3, supra, on identification by tag number.

In Smith v. State, there had been an armed robbery about 2:30 a.m. The radio bulletin described "the perpetrators . . . [as] two black males armed with sawed-off shotguns and dressed in dark clothing, one of whom was wearing a gray colored toboggan hat." No vehicle description was given. About 3:05 a.m., a few miles away, an officer saw an automobile with a passenger wearing a gray toboggan hat; however, there were three men in the car. The court concluded that a stop of the vehicle was proper.

In Dillard v. State, an officer driving a police car saw the defendant drive into the driveway of a house which had been recently burglarized three times. When the defendant saw the officer, he stopped the car "and his passenger appeared to hide his head." The officer turned around to go back and the car had disappeared. The car was then located by officers in another subdivision. The court held that the stop which followed was justified.

In Duffy v. State, an officer learned at about 1:30 a.m. of an armed robbery and an assault which occurred around midnight. The officer was given the names of some possible suspects and a description of the car in which they left. The officer located a car with the description given and stopped the car. When the defendant got out, he had blood on his pants and the name of one of the suspects previously given. The court concluded that there was evidence supporting the stop and after the stop there was probable cause to arrest.

The Georgia Court of Appeals again found sufficient circumstances to justify a stop in Butts v. State, where, at about 3:00 a.m., an officer heard a broadcast stating that a black male had just committed an armed robbery in the immediate area in which he was patrolling. Ten or fifteen minutes after the robbery, he saw a black man running and stopped him. The court found that the officer had a reasonable articulable suspicion that justified the stop. The court did not discuss the very general description of the robber that had been given over the radio.

In United States v. Hensley, the United States Supreme Court held that officers in Kentucky were justified in stopping a person in an automobile pursuant to a police "flyer or bulletin [if it had] been issued on . . . articulable facts supporting a reasonable suspicion that the wanted person" had committed a felony in Ohio, and an objective reading of the flyer shows that the stopping officer had information which would warrant a man of reasonable caution to believe that the stop was proper.

In Postell v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court held that officers did not have an articulable suspicion justifying the stop of the defendant who was driving his car within 100 yards of the site of a purported drug delivery even though the defendant had been stopped several times before based on informant's tip that the defendant was a drug courier, but had never been found to be in possession of drugs. The officers had earlier received information from a known informant that a delivery was to be made to a certain address, and that one of several named persons might be serving as courier, but the defendant's name was not included.

In State v. Mallory, while an officer was arresting a person for a felony pursuant to a warrant, he saw the defendant approaching with his hands in his pockets. "When the officer took his badge out and started to approach the defendant, the defendant turned and walked away, whereupon the officer ordered the defendant to stop." The Georgia Court of Appeals held that the stop was justified in view of the circumstances and the fact that the officer had seen the arrestee with the defendant shortly before executing the warrant; the stop occurred at night in a poorly lighted area, and the officer wanted to be sure the defendant was not armed.

In Williams v. State, a druggist in an all-night drug store received a threat stating that a bomb was planted in the store and would be detonated remotely by the caller if the druggist did not deliver certain drugs to a designated point. There were a total of four calls between 2:00 and 4:00 a.m., and a police captain listened to the last call, which was at about 3:30 a.m. At about 4:00 a.m., while waiting for another call, "the druggist and captain were standing at the door of the pharmacy looking out upon a deserted shopping center parking lot." A car drove "from the area of an adjoining highway slowly across the parking lot. At the front door of the drug store, the car more or less stopped and the driver looked through the door and seemingly saw the druggist and presumably the police officer. The car then proceeded on out of the parking lot away from the area." The court concluded that the circumstances were sufficient to present an articulable suspicion justifying a stop of the car.

In Clinkscale v. State, there had been a theft of a truck from a business. The owner of the business gave the defendant's name as a suspect since he had formerly been an employee and had been in trouble before. While the officers were on the scene an employee told them that the suspect was riding toward the place of business on a bicycle. When the defendant apparently saw the officers he turned around and started back in the direction from which he had come. The court held that the officers had an articulable suspicion justifying a stop for questioning.

In Evans v. State, the officer was informed by the victim of a burglary that as he approached his home he saw "a truck leaving or coming up the highway from the area of his driveway" and the defendant was driving. Two or three hours later the officer saw the defendant driving a pickup. The driver did not stop immediately as directed, but he was pulled over by the officer. As the officer approached, he saw in the truck a number of items which had been taken in the burglary. The officer said he stopped the defendant to ask where he had been at the time of the burglary. The court concluded that the stop was justified and that after seeing the stolen items, he had probable cause to arrest the defendant and conduct a search incident to the arrest.

In Starr v. State, an armed robbery occurred about 3:35 p.m. The robber apparently left on foot. A radio lookout was posted for a "white male . . . , around 25 to 30 years of age, approximately six feet, medium build, mustache, possibly a beard, wearing some type of yellow cap, long white coat down below the knees, yellow gloves." An officer radioed that he had seen a man of medium build wearing "a yellow type hat and a long light-colored coat" running to the Colonial Motel. Another officer went to the motel and asked the clerk if he had rented a room to such a person who had not arrived in a car. Officers learned that a hitchhiker had just checked in. The clerk did not remember how he was dressed but remembered that he was fairly young and thought he had a mustache. The officers went to the room of the hitchhiker about 15 or 20 minutes after the robbery. The defendant answered the knock of the door. The court concluded that the "stop" was justified. When the door was opened, the officer saw a pair of yellow gloves and the defendant fit the description of the robber. The court said that at this point the officers had probable cause to arrest the defendant and they properly searched the room.

In Tarwid v. State, the court held illegal the stop of a vehicle on an interstate highway for traveling slightly under the maximum speed allowed. The court concluded that this conduct was not indicative that the driver was intoxicated and a radio transmission from a state trooper stating that he had given the driver a warning ticket in another county for speeding and that the vehicle "had shown signs of trafficking" in drugs did not justify the stop. However, in Taylor v. State, the appellate court affirmed the trial judge in finding that the officer was justified in stopping the defendant for driving 45 miles per hour in the center lane of I–20 because the driver was creating a traffic hazard. The court pointed out that driving "at such a slow speed as to impede the normal and reasonable movement of traffic" was a violation of O.C.G.A. § 40–6–184(a)(1).

See section 2-12, supra, on probable cause to arrest. See section 4-21, infra, on the right to stop and frisk incident to execution of a search warrant. See section 3-6, supra, on traffic violations.

§ 3-8 Facts justifying the stop—Environment

As previously indicated, the time and place of a stop often supply an important part in determining whether or not an officer has an articulable suspicion to justify a stop. A number of cases have emphasized the fact that the stop was made in a "high crime area." In Bobo v. State, the defendant was stopped because he was driving his truck at 2:00 a.m. in a residential area in which vandalism had been reported. However, the court concluded that the facts did not justify the stop. In Attaway v. State, the appellate court reversed the trial court's denial of a motion to suppress the evidence obtained from the investigative stop of a car. The officer, aware of past incidents of vandalism in the area, received information from the police dispatcher to be on the lookout for a small red vehicle that had reportedly circled around a named subdivision several times. The court held that the police might have been justified in closely observing the defendant's actions, but that the officer was not justified in making an investigative stop. In Howden v. State, the court reversed the trial court's denial of a motion to suppress where the officer "stopped defendant because it was late at night and defendant's warehouse is located in an area known for criminal activity." The defendant's van was backed up to the door of a closed warehouse. The defendant's van pulled out of the area a couple of minutes after the patrol car arrived. The appellate court held the stop which followed was not based on any particular fact that the defendant was engaged in or was about to engage in criminal activity. In State v. Winnie, the defendant, after entering a parking lot at 4:00 a.m., pulled away from an approaching officer. Although there was no indication that the officer's decision to stop the defendant was influenced by the defendant's decision to pull away, the court held that "there was no articulable suspicion for the stop."

In Raulerson v. State, the appellate court reversed the finding of the trial judge that there was an articulable suspicion justifying the stopping of an automobile where the defendant was driving at 1:20 a.m. between 25 and 30 m.p.h. in a 55 m.p.h. zone, turned onto a dirt road, and returned to the highway. However, in Jones v. State, the court affirmed the trial court's denial of a suppression motion where a car was stopped at 9:30 p.m. as it was leaving a new unoccupied subdivision in which some vandalism had occurred. The only unusual conduct referred to was that the vehicle did not have its lights turned on until the driver saw the officer's car. Likewise, in Watson v. State, the court affirmed a finding that the stop of an automobile was justified where an officer had seen the defendant and his two companions in a "high drug area" several times during the day and each time the occupants looked in the opposite direction.

In Evans v. State, the court affirmed the denial of a motion to suppress. The officer was patrolling in a high crime area at 12:45 a.m. when he noticed a motion detector had been set off at a convenience store. The officer had checked the store about 10 minutes earlier and found everything in order. Upon receipt of the alarm, the officer pulled out of a gasoline station and saw two persons in a 1969 Plymouth coming up the hill toward the officer about 1,000 yards from the convenience store. No other car or person was in sight. The officer went to the convenience store and noticed the glass in front had been knocked out and cartons of cigarettes were in the parking lot. The officer immediately left the store and followed the 1969 Plymouth. He stopped the car and observed a cigarette carton protruding from a garbage bag under the defendant's leg. The defendant was arrested. The yellow Plymouth was nearly identical to a "lookout" the officer had received earlier regarding other break-ins.

In State v. Turntime, the court reversed the granting of a motion to suppress where a defendant was stopped as he was walking in an apartment complex in which he did not live, looking in parked cars, at about 10:30 p.m. There had been a number of automobile break-ins in the area.

In State v. Barnes, the court found that a stop was legal where the defendant had stopped to pick up a known prostitute and drug user in the parking lot of a car wash at 12:56 a.m., the neighborhood residents had complained of drug use and prostitution at that particular car wash, and the defendant attempted to drive away rapidly when he realized he had been observed picking up his passenger. The court held that under the totality of the circumstances, the officer had the necessary "founded suspicion" that criminal activity was about to occur to justify a brief stop.

In United States v. Magda, the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals found the officers had a sufficient, reasonable and articulable suspicion to stop a man they had seen exchange an object with another man. The exchange took place in an area in which there was a high incidence of narcotic transactions. In Shaw v. State, the court affirmed the conclusion of the trial judge holding that a stop was justified where the defendant was seen walking late at night in the vicinity of a burglarized apartment, carrying a dark object over his arm. In Bozeman v. State, the opinion affirmed the denial of a motion to suppress and held that a stop was justified where the defendant was in a high crime area and an officer saw him and a companion sitting for no apparent reason in a parked car in a remote part of a motel parking lot at 4:45 a.m. Furthermore, in Illinois v. Wardlow, the United States Supreme Court held that when, in an area known for drug trafficking, an officer sees a defendant look toward a police car and flee, those circumstances may give rise to a reasonable suspicion that the defendant is involved in criminal conduct. The court refused to hold that unprovoked flight from officers is always sufficient to justify a stop and reiterated that reasonable suspicion is to be determined by a totality of the circumstances. In Brown v. Texas, however, the Supreme Court found that there was no right to stop a suspicious-looking person seen in an alley during the day in a high crime area. Likewise, where officers staked out a ranch while awaiting a search warrant, it was held that they had no Fourth Amendment right to stop a car entering the ranch and frisk the occupants because they feared that the occupants might have had something to do with marijuana activities at that location.

In Hughes v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court concluded that "there is no objective manifestation that a person is, or is about to be, engaged in criminal activity merely because the person is a white man in a black neighborhood late at night, who picks up a black man at a location police consider a high-crime area, and who then drives slowly in a circular fashion through the neighborhood."

§ 3-9 Roadblocks

In Delaware v. Prouse, the defendant had been stopped at random by a patrolman. The patrolman had not observed any traffic violation or suspicious activity on the part of the defendant, and made the stop only to check the driver's license and the registration. The officer was not acting pursuant to any procedure pertaining to spot checks. During the stop, the patrolman saw marijuana in plain view on the floor of the car. In holding that the marijuana had been properly suppressed, the Court ruled that there must be at least an articulable and reasonable suspicion that a motorist is unlicensed, or that a car is not registered, or that an occupant is otherwise subject to seizure for violation of the law before a driver may be stopped.

In Brower v. Inyo County, the Court held that stopping a single motorist with a roadblock amounts to a "seizure" in Fourth Amendment terms. However, this rule does not apply to a roadblock where all vehicles are stopped for a license check.

Based upon its review of the United States Supreme Court's decision in City of Indianapolis v. Edmond, and the Georgia Supreme Court's decision in LaFontaine v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals in Baker v. State, declared that the constitutional validity of a roadblock is dependent upon the presence of the following features: "(1) the record reflects that the decision to implement the checkpoint in question was made by supervisory officers and not officers in the field and that the supervision had a legitimate primary purpose. The phrase 'decision to implement' includes deciding to have this roadblock and where and when to have it . . . (2) all vehicles were stopped as opposed to random stops . . . (3) the delay to motorists was minimal . . . (4) the roadblock identification was well identified as a police checkpoint . . . (5) the screening officer's training and experience were sufficient to qualify him to make an initial determination as to which motorists would be given field tests for intoxication." The court expressly rejected the implication in prior decisions that these criteria were simply guidelines to be applied in weighing the "totality of the circumstances." Each of these factors is now a necessary prerequisite of constitutional proportion for a valid roadblock. As a result, in Baker, evidence obtained at the roadblock was ruled inadmissible because the state was unable to demonstrate at trial that the decision to implement the checkpoint had in fact been made by supervisory police personnel and not the field officers and there there was a legitimate primary purpose for the roadblock. Since Baker, the issue of whether a roadblock was duly authorized by supervising personnel often dictates the outcome of a contest to the admissibility of evidence seized at a roadblock. The state can expect to lose such contests if it fails to produce the responsible supervisory personnel at the hearing and has no other admissible evidence to establish the basis for the roadblock.

Roadblocks which have as a primary purpose the detection of general criminal wrongdoing will not survive scrutiny under the Fourth Amendment. In Illinois v. Lidster, the United States Supreme Court considered whether due process was offended by a police roadblock which was designed to question motorists about a crime which had been committed a week earlier at the roadblock location and at the approximate time the roadblock was being conducted. The court concluded that the roadblock was proper since its purpose was not a generalized criminal investigation of motorists and the passengers in their cars, but rather a request for help in connection with a criminal investigation. Approved legitimate purposes for roadblock checkpoints include: the interception of illegal aliens; sobriety; verification of driver licenses and vehicle registration; and emergency checkpoints to prevent an imminent terrorist attack or to catch a dangerous criminal thought to be in a particular area.

As noted by the Court in Loney v. State, features of a valid roadblock are not "absolute criteria which must be satisfied before a roadblock is legitimate. Rather, this Court looks to the totality of the circumstances surrounding the roadblock to determine whether the factors were satisfied."

In O'Kelley v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals held that there is no "advanced publicity requirement in Georgia" for a roadblock. "Georgia law requires only that the roadblock be identified as a police checkpoint." In Burns v. State, the court held that the requirement that supervisory personnel designate the place for the roadblock was sufficiently met where the nightshift supervisor on that night authorized the roadblock even though another officer was the supervisor of the entire shift. In Hardin v. State, the court concluded that an auxiliary roadblock assigned to stop drivers attempting to avoid the central roadblock was within the requirements for a proper roadblock, even though its location was not explicitly authorized by supervisory personnel. The court's holding was premised on its finding that the general decision to implement the roadblock had been made by supervisory personnel.

In Michigan Department of State Police v. Sitz, the United States Supreme Court held that the Fourth Amendment was not violated where all motorists were stopped to check for signs of intoxication which were to be determined according to guidelines. In LaFontaine v. State, the court required that a "screening" officer at a roadblock checking for persons driving under the influence must have "training and experience . . . sufficient to qualify him to make an initial determination as to which motorists should be given field tests for intoxication."

In United States v. Prichard, the court held that a roadblock was constitutional on an interstate highway where officers started by stopping all cars but as soon as 10 cars were backed up, the officers would waive all stopped cars on through. The stops were held valid even though officers admitted that if they saw any evidence of crime while checking licenses and registrations, they planned to enforce the law.

In Ledford v. State, the trial judge was affirmed in finding a roadblock valid where "[e]very noncommercial vehicle was stopped at the roadblock, with the exception of noncommercial vehicles which had been checked at the roadblock in one direction and soon came through again in the other direction." But in State v. Stearns, the court found a roadblock arbitrary when the "trial court found that there were more than enough officers to stop vehicles traveling in both directions" but police had set up a roadblock north of a cluster of bars and only stopped vehicles being driven north.

In Gamble v. State, the court held valid a roadblock which officers set up primarily to check for licenses, insurance and registration; authorized by supervisory personnel; manned by qualified personnel; and identified as a police checkpoint. Motorists were delayed only briefly unless they were unable to produce requisite information. Officers only allowed cars to pass through unchecked when conditions on the road backed up traffic and created a potential safety hazard. However, in State v. Manos the appellate court affirmed the trial court in granting a motion to suppress material seized as a result of a roadblock. The court concluded that the problem with the roadblock was that all cars were stopped unless the officers got too backed up. In that event, officers let every car go until there were no more vehicles in sight before they started stopping cars again. The roadblock "was impermissibly based on an unfettered discretion granted to the field officer."

In Gamble v. State, the court held that when a car is validly stopped at a roadblock and the driver could not find proof of insurance, an officer was authorized to make a brief inquiry regarding the driver's and passenger's destination and to request consent to search the vehicle. Where an initial detention or seizure at a roadblock is valid, a secondary detention or seizure does not require additional proof of reasonable and articulable suspicion. In McCray v. State, the Court of Appeals upheld the detention of the defendant at a "secondary position" while an officer sought verification of the defendant's driver's license. At the initial roadblock stop the defendant produced a "tattered" license and was unable to furnish a vehicle registration. The court also upheld a subsequent search of the defendant's vehicle after a drug dog alerted officers to the presence of drugs in the defendant's car at that secondary stop. This court was satisfied that the roadblock was set up for a proper purpose, the defendant's detention was appropriate and allowing the dog to walk around the car did not unduly prolong the detention. Independent of the bona fides of a roadblock, evasive measures to avoid a roadblock may give rise to a reasonable suspicion of criminal activity on the part of police authorities. Thus, in Taylor v. State, the Court of Appeals affirmed the denial of the defendant's motion to suppress blood alcohol evidence obtained after the evasive and erratic effort of the defendant to avoid a roadblock.

See Annotation, "Validity of Police Roadblocks or Checkpoints for Purpose of Discovery of Alcoholic Intoxication—Post Sitz Cases," 74 A.L.R. 5th 319 (1999).

§ 3-10 The Terry frisk

In Peters v. State, the court pointed to United States Supreme Court holdings stating that there are > at least theoretically, three tiers of police-citizen encounters: (1) communication between police and citizens involving no coercion or detention and therefore without the compass of the Fourth Amendment, (2) brief seizures that must be supported by reasonable suspicion, and (3) full-scale arrests that must be supported by probable cause. . . . In the first [tier] police officers may approach citizens, ask for identification, and freely question the citizen without any basis or belief that the citizen is involved in criminal activity, as long as the officers do not detain the citizen or create the impression that the citizen may not leave. The second tier occurs when the officer actually conducts a brief investigative Terry stop of the citizen. In this level, a police officer, even in the absence of probable cause, may stop persons and detain them briefly, when the officer has a particularized and objective basis for suspecting the persons are involved in criminal activity.

If there is a sufficient, articulable suspicion to stop a suspect, or if a suspect permits an officer to talk with him, the encounter must not go further than brief questioning of the suspect by the officer unless, after questioning, the officer has probable cause to believe the suspect has contraband or if the officer has a justified belief that the person stopped may be armed and dangerous. Likewise, an officer may check "for outstanding warrants or criminal histories on the occupants of a vehicle at a valid traffic stop," provided the officer has a justifiable safety concern during the stop.

If the officer at the end of the "stop phase" has probable cause to believe the suspect has contraband, he may arrest the suspect and then conduct a full-fledged search incident to the arrest. If the officer reasonably believes the suspect is armed and dangerous, he may frisk the suspect for weapons. The frisk, however, may not be justified by the desire to discover or prevent the destruction of evidence in the absence of probable cause and a valid stop alone does not justify a frisk.

Under the rule adopted in Terry v. Ohio, a "frisk" is a search within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment. The court in Terry also said, however, that unlike a search conducted incident to a lawful arrest, the scope of the frisk must be limited to an intrusion reasonably necessary to discover weapons on or about the person detained.

If a frisk is justified, an officer must ordinarily follow a two-step process. "The officer must pat down first, and then intrude beneath the surface only if he comes upon something which feels like a weapon." A number of courts have emphasized that an officer is not justified in concluding that a search may be conducted if the object felt is soft, but if the object is hard and of substantial size then the officer may remove the item. If an object is felt which the officer believes to be a weapon, the officer may only take such action as is necessary to examine the weapon, or, as McFadden did in Terry, remove the object. If the object obtained by the officer turns out to be an illegally concealed weapon or contraband, the officer may at that point arrest the suspect and then conduct a full-blown search.

In the 1993 case of Minnesota v. Dickerson, the United States Supreme Court held that "[i]f, while conducting a legitimate Terry search . . . the officer should . . . discover contraband other than weapons, he clearly cannot be required to ignore the contraband, and the Fourth Amendment does not require its suppression. . . ." If, however, the police lack a reasonable belief that an object felt is contraband or a weapon, the officer has no authority to squeeze, slide, or otherwise manipulate the contents of the defendant's pocket, after the officer knows the pocket does not contain a weapon, in order to determine if the object is contraband. In Commonwealth v. Johnson, the court concluded that there was probable cause to arrest where an officer during a Terry frisk felt a "crunchy, granular substance" in the defendant's crotch, since it was "immediately apparent" that the defendant possessed contraband. In Seaman v. State, Georgia recognized the "plain feel" doctrine and affirmed the denial of a motion to suppress where an experienced narcotics officer in the course of a Terry patdown felt what he believed to be a clear plastic baggie containing contraband. There was no evidence the officer "manipulated the object in [the defendant's] pocket in any way before identifying it." Further, in the Georgia case of Buffington v. State, the court also applied the "plain feel" test as to a crack pipe in the defendant's pocket because the police officer immediately recognized the pipe as a drug-related object. However, in State v. Williams, the court affirmed the suppression where the officer testified he searched the defendant's "pocket because he was concerned that the unidentified object which felt like a bag could be a weapon and because it could 'possibly' be contraband." In Corley v. State, after a stop, the officer frisked the defendant and felt and saw a bulge in the defendant's watch pocket. There was no evidence that led the officer to believe that the defendant had a weapon in his watch pocket. The defendant emptied his watch pocket when the officer told him to do so and an object which looked like marijuana was removed. The appellate court reversed the denial of the defendant's motion to suppress. See Annotation, "Application of 'Plain–Feel' Exception to Warrant Requirements—State Cases," 50 A.L.R. 5th 581 (1997).

Generally, in the absence of a pretextual stop, if the frisk does not produce a weapon or contraband, the encounter must be terminated at that point unless the officer has obtained probable cause for an arrest. See section 4-26, infra, on pretextual stops. However, in McGugan v. State, the officer felt a rather large hard object inside the defendant's inside jacket pocket. The officer asked the defendant to identify the object and the defendant did not respond. The deputy reached inside the defendant's pocket and removed a plastic bag containing a substance later identified as cocaine. The deputy testified he removed the object because the defendant failed to respond to the deputy's request to identify the object. The court concluded that the defendant's refusal to identify the object, coupled with his earlier reluctance to cooperate with the deputy, "created a reasonable suspicion that the defendant was armed" and justified the deputy in placing his hand in the defendant's pocket and removing the object. In Redd v. State, the court noted that "an individual's conduct in response to questioning or attempted questioning may rise to the level of probable cause to conduct an arrest or search." The court then held that when an officer has articulable suspicion authorizing a stop and frisk and the defendant "did not respond to the officer's questions, never allowed the officer to get close enough to question him or complete a limited patdown for weapons, ignored several requests to stop, and then fled into the woods," a nonconsensual investigation pursuant to Terry was authorized.

In cases where there is an illegal stop and search, which leads to the discovery of evidence of criminal conduct, the evidence may be admissible if the defendant was the subject of a valid outstanding warrant, despite the manner in which it was obtained if the defendant is arrested under the warrant. In State v. Cooper, the defendant was the passenger in a vehicle which was stopped and searched. The defendant sought to suppress the marijuana found in the car. At the time the vehicle was stopped the officer determined that the defendant was the subject of outstanding warrants and arrested him on the basis of these charges. The court concluded that once the warrants were discovered any taint to the evidence found during the search was "cleansed" and the search became justified as one incident to the arrest.

When the suspect is in a car and the articulable suspicion relates to any serious offense, the officer probably may have him get out of the car. Once the suspect is out of the car and on foot, it seems that he is like a pedestrian who has been stopped. In Maryland v. Wilson, the United States Supreme Court held that where the driver of a car is stopped for speeding, the "officer making a traffic stop may [also] order passengers to get out of the car pending completion of the stop." In Rogers v. State, the court held that "[a]n officer conducting a routine traffic stop may request and examine a driver's license and vehicle registration[,] and run a computer check on the documents." See section 4-26, infra, on search incident to a traffic arrest. In State v. Blair, the court pointed out that an investigatory traffic stop is "a brief stop, limited in time to that minimally necessary to investigate the allegation invoking suspicion, and limited in scope to identification and limited questioning reasonably related to the circumstances that justified the initiation of the momentary stop."

Evidence obtained from a pat down of a passenger in a motor vehicle conducted by an officer, who admitted that he was not concerned for his safety and administered the search as part of a routine followed in all cases where he directs someone to exit a vehicle, is subject to suppression.

§ 3-11 Extensions of the Terry frisk

The material in the foregoing section represents the traditional stereotyped approach to a Terry frisk. However, there seems to be an indication in United States Supreme Court opinions and decisions of a number of other courts indicating a departure from the traditional approach. For example, in Michigan v. Summers, the Court said that the right to "stop" is not limited to "momentary, on-the-street detention." In footnote 12 the Court said, "[T]he key principle of the Fourth Amendment is reasonableness—the balancing of competing interests. . . . If the purpose underlying a Terry stop—investigating possible criminal activity—is to be served, the police must under certain circumstances be able to detain the individual for longer than the brief time period involved in Terry and Adams." In a like approach the Georgia Court of Appeals said that "[o]nce a 'Terry stop' has been made, the legality of its scope 'is determined in each case by balancing the extent of the intrusion against the immediacy and importance of the interest in crime prevention or law enforcement which is sought to be advanced.' "

In Hodges v. State, the court affirmed the frisk where in addition to the standard Terry pat-down, the officer put his fingers under the defendant's "beltline [in the back], on the exterior of the shirt, to feel if there was a weapon secured under the clothing by the belt." This was deemed to be a reasonable search for weapons under the facts of the case which included the fact that the officer himself carried "his weapon in his back when he was off duty." The court also noted, among other things, that the event took place in the early morning hours while it was dark, that the officer went to that area following an emergency 911 call, and that the area was well known for the presence of guns and drugs.

In Thomas v. State, the court affirmed the conviction where a defendant exited an automobile and officers informed him that they had received information that he was carrying drugs. He kept placing his hand in his jacket pocket. After the defendant refused to obey an order to remove his hand from his pocket, the officer, fearing for his own safety, forcibly removed the defendant's hand from the pocket and reached in and found a bag containing the suspected heroin. At that point, the officer arrested the defendant and searched him and the automobile.

In United States v. Sokolow, the United States Supreme Court stated that officers are not obligated to use the "least intrusive means available to verify or dispel their suspicions."

As one commentator observed, "It is clear that there are several investigative techniques which may be utilized effectively in the course of a Terry-type stop. The most common is interrogation, which may include both a request for identification and inquiry concerning the suspicious conduct of the person detained. Sometimes the officer will communicate with others, either police or private citizens, in an effort to verify the explanation tendered or to confirm the identification or determine whether a person of that identity is otherwise wanted. Or, the suspect may be detained while it is determined if in fact an offense has occurred in the area, a process which might involve checking certain premises, locating and examining objects abandoned by the suspect, or talking with other people. If it is known that an offense has occurred in the area, the suspect may be viewed by witnesses to the crime. There is no reason to conclude that any investigative methods of the type just listed are inherently objectionable; they might cast doubt upon the reasonableness of the detention, however, if their use makes the period of detention unduly long or involves moving the suspect to another locale." 3 LaFave, Search and Seizure, § 9.2, pp. 36–37 (West 1978). See section 3-7, supra, on facts justifying a stop where there has been a crime reported.

However, in the 1995 opinion Smith v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals does not speak in terms of exclusion of evidence discovered as a result of unjustified questioning during a stop. The court held that the "scope of the detention must be carefully tailored to its underlying justification." Thus, when a person is stopped for a possible DUI violation, the officer is justified to ask a driver "for his license to establish his identity, and to ask questions reasonably related to whether or not [the driver] was driving under the influence." Once an explanation has been given, the officer may "administer a statutorily authorized field sobriety test, or take any other reasonable steps to determine whether [the driver] was, as he originally suspected, driving under the influence." Questions pertaining to the possession of contraband are "beyond the permissible scope of the investigation." The court in Migliore v. State relied on Smith in holding that "[a]t the point the officer initiated the probe for drugs, he went beyond the permissible scope of the investigation and his further detention of the defendant went beyond that permitted by Terry and its progeny."

In United States v. Purcell, the 11th Circuit Court of Appeals held that a stop "may not last 'any longer than necessary to process the traffic violation' unless there is articulable suspicion of other illegal activity." In United States v. Boyce, the 11th Circuit gave the holding in Purcell some added definition by observing that there are only three situations in which a traffic stop may be prolonged: to investigate the driver's license and vehicle registration; to wait for the results of a criminal history check that is part of a routine traffic investigation; and, if there exists an "articulable suspicion of other illegal activity." Thus, when an officer's questioning and detention of the driver and the occupants of a motor vehicle exceeds the scope of reasonable permissible investigation, any evidence obtained as a result may be tainted and subject to suppression at trial.

In Daniel v. State, the Supreme Court of Georgia held that evidence obtained as a result of continued questioning and detention after the underlying basis for the initial traffic stop has concluded is not automatically subject to a constitutional challenge. "[W]e hold that a law enforcement officer's continued questioning of a vehicle's driver and passengers outside the scope of a valid traffic stop passes muster under the Fourth Amendment either when the officer has a reasonable articulable suspicion of other illegal activity or when the valid traffic stop has de-escalated into a consensual encounter." In Daniel, the police had no reason to suspect criminal activity which would warrant detaining the defendant beyond the scope of the initial stop. Nonetheless, the court concluded that under the totality of the circumstances surrounding the post traffic stop detention, the questioning was consensual in nature and hence the evidence obtained as a result thereof was the product of a lawful investigation and properly admitted at trial.

Following Daniel, however, the United States Supreme Court, in Muehler v. Mena, held that unless police questioning prolongs detention, the questioning does not amount to an additional seizure, "and, therefore, no additional Fourth Amendment justification" is required. Accordingly, in Salmeron v. State, the Supreme Court of Georgia abrogated the totality of the circumstances standard of Daniel and substituted the standard announced by the United States Supreme Court in Muehler.

As the Georgia Court of Appeals observed in State v. Davis following Salmeron, "even if police have no basis for suspecting that a person detained at a traffic stop is engaged in criminal activity unrelated to the stop, police may lawfully ask questions during the course of the stop about such unrelated activity, so long as the questioning does not prolong the stop beyond the time reasonably required to complete the purpose of the traffic stop." The court also noted in Hayes v. State that asking "the driver to step out of the vehicle does not unduly prolong the detention. Further, as a matter of Georgia law, it does not matter whether the request to search comes during the traffic stop or immediately thereafter."

The standard for whether or not an officer has reasonable suspicion to stop a vehicle centers on the totality of the circumstances surrounding a particular stop and whether the police questioning unduly prolongs an otherwise proper detention. The United States Supreme Court has expressly recognized that this standard includes analyzing both "innocent factors" and apparently "suspicious factors"

In Simmons v. State, the defendant was validly stopped for a traffic violation. The court pointed out that the appropriate legal standard for determining whether further questioning and a walk around the car with a narcotics dog were justified "is whether the officers had a reasonable suspicion [rather than probable cause] that [the defendant] was transporting illegal drugs." The appellate court held that the following did not establish such a reasonable suspicion: (1) the defendant and his passenger appeared nervous; (2) the defendant told officers that the vehicle rental agreement was in his wife's name, and his wife was not present; and (3) the defendant told officers he was nervous because the passenger was his girlfriend. After warning him for the traffic violation, the officer should not have detained the defendant further to ask him whether he was transporting narcotics and to walk a drug dog around his car. See section 3-12, infra, on when a stop becomes an arrest.

In State v. Bibbins, the Court of Appeals held that police questioning of a motorist during the course of a traffic stop, without more, does not rise to the level of a Fourth Amendment issue. The Court concluded that the 'scope' of a traffic detention has never been limited to the isolated traffic offense that led to the pullover but is broad enough to encompass identified, legitimate law enforcement goals relating to highway public safety, as long as the pursuit of those goals does not unreasonably prolong the duration of a valid, ongoing stop.

Adams v. Williams represents the exception to the general rule that an officer, at the time of the stop, is to talk with the suspect before determining whether or not to conduct a frisk. In this case, the officer approached Williams, reached to the spot where a gun was thought to be hidden and removed the gun. The court concluded that this conduct was reasonable. After obtaining the pistol, Williams was then arrested for the illegal possession of the weapon and searched as an incident to the arrest. In the Georgia case Pace v. State, officers in a high crime area saw the defendant standing in a parking lot. He stood there about eight minutes before the officers approached in a marked police car. The officers were suspicious that the defendant was there to sell drugs. When the defendant saw the police car, he turned and started walking away. The officers called him and he began acting very nervous and continued to walk away. When the officers approached him "he reached toward his right pocket and attempted several times to reach into it. They stopped him from going into the pocket because they were concerned for their safety . . . . They asked [the defendant] to put his hands on the police car, and the officer reached into the pocket and found [a] razor blade and drugs." There was no earlier pat-down. In affirming the admission of the evidence obtained from the pocket, the court pointed out that "[t]he law permits . . . officers to protect themselves from harm even when conducting a non-coercive lawful stop . . . . The usual police response will be to conduct a frisk, patting the individual's clothing in search of a weapon . . . . [However, a] pat down is not a prerequisite."

In Davis v. State, the court affirmed the trial judge in permitting an officer to testify that when he felt a hard object, he asked the defendant to remove it. The defendant pulled out a cigarette box. The trooper, concerned that the box might contain a razor blade or other small weapon, opened the box and found two marijuana cigarettes. The court said there was ample reason to believe the defendant was carrying a weapon.

In Morris v. State, the trial judge was affirmed in denying a defendant's motion to suppress contents found in a match box in the defendant's shirt pocket. The officer noticed a bulge in that area and asked the defendant what it was. The defendant told him it was matches. The officer then asked if the defendant would mind his examining the matches. The defendant said, "No, go ahead" and handed the box to the officer, who found "three plastic bags containing a white powdery substance."

In United States v. Baker, the Fourth Circuit held that "the reasonableness of a protective search depends on the factual circumstances of each case. . . . Thus, a pat down frisk is but one example of how a reasonable protective search may be conducted. . . . Balancing the officer's interest in self-protection against the resulting intrusion upon Baker's personal security, we hold that [the officer's] direction was reasonable under the circumstances." The officer instructed Baker to lift his shirt far enough to uncover a bulge near his waist so as to reveal the bulge. Baker had been stopped for a traffic violation. The bulge was caused by a gun.

In State v. Williams, the Nebraska Supreme Court found that the facts justified the forceful opening of a clenched fist as a part of a frisk where officers had received reports that people present were armed with knives and the defendant made a furtive gesture with her hand near the waistband of her pants. The officer was concerned about his safety and thought the defendant might be concealing a weapon.

Based on Terry, in 1983, the United States Supreme Court in Michigan v. Long approved a frisk or search of the passenger compartment of an automobile limited to areas in which a weapon might have been placed. The court said, "[t]he police searched the passenger compartment because they had reason to believe that the vehicle contained weapons. We hold that the protective search of the passenger compartment was reasonable under the principles articulated in Terry and other decisions of this Court." In another portion of the opinion the Court said "that the search of the passenger compartment of an automobile, limited to those areas in which a weapon may be placed or hidden, is permissible if the police officer possesses a reasonable belief based on 'specific and articulable facts which, taken together with the rational inferences from those facts, reasonably warrant' the officers in believing that the suspect is dangerous and the suspect may gain immediate control of weapons. . . . '[T]he issue is whether a reasonably prudent man in the circumstances would be warranted in the belief that his safety or that of others was in danger.' "

In Holsey v. State, the court held that "a law enforcement officer who detains a person for purposes of investigation should 'not be denied the opportunity to protect himself from attack by a hostile suspect' and may lawfully detain the person in a manner 'reasonably necessary to protect [his] personal safety and to maintain the status quo.' Other courts have held that, in sufficiently dangerous circumstances, law enforcement officers may effect and maintain investigatory detentions by drawing weapons and forcing defendants to lie face down with arms and legs spread. Such methods must be reserved for cases where plausible danger exists to the detaining officer's personal safety, but '[t]o require an officer to risk his life in order to make an investigatory stop would run contrary to the intent of Terry v. Ohio . . . .' [Footnotes omitted.]" In United States v. Holt, the court held that an officer making a traffic stop may ask the driver if there was a loaded gun in the car.

In Jackson v. State, the court held that, in the frisk stage, the officer was justified in handcuffing the defendant where he was regarded as being extremely violent.

In United States v. Kent, the Eleventh Circuit held that where Customs officials validly stop a vessel, they have a right to conduct a protective sweep after boarding the vessel.

In Lansdown v. Commonwealth, the court held that a frisk of a passenger of a vehicle was valid where the van had been stopped for being driven in a grossly reckless manner. The driver had tried to outrun the officers and the officers reasonably concluded that occupants might be armed.

In Pitts v. State, the court affirmed the action of an officer in conducting a "free air search" of the outside of a van by a German Shepherd dog after the officer obtained conflicting versions from the two occupants of the vehicle about their travel itinerary.

In the Delaware case of Bromwell v. State, the court upheld a "safety search" of a partially open cardboard box which did not appear to contain personal effects, as a part of the frisk of the man. However, in State v. Noble, the court stated that when a stop "has been made, the legality of its scope 'is determined in each case by balancing the extent of the intrusion against the immediacy and importance of the interest in crime prevention or law enforcement which is sought to be advanced.' "

In State v. Key, there were sufficient circumstances to "stop" an automobile. The two occupants said they were waiting for a girl to come home. It was about 2:40 a.m. The officer had the occupants get out and produce identification which they did. The officer saw an object "in the back seat . . . he suspected to be a person hiding under a blanket." He "again approached the car and 'reached in and checked' to see if his suspicion was correct. It was not." The object was a sleeping bag. The officer then apparently looked in "an ice chest sitting in the floor board." He found nothing but a can of beer inside. He also saw another beer can on the floor board on the driver's side. The officer then walked to the driver's side and "looked in through the window" with the aid of a flashlight; he "observed a clear plastic bag with a green, leafy substance . . . in the floorboard in front of the driver's seat." After seizing the suspected marijuana, he searched the passenger compartment, and, after finding a quantity of suspected marijuana, then searched the trunk and found additional suspected marijuana. The court concluded that the only difficulty with the search and seizure was the search of the cooler. The search of the cooler was not valid. However, the majority concluded that the intrusion into the cooler did not so taint the search procedure as to require the exclusion of the contraband later found in "plain view." In a dissenting opinion, Judge Sognier said the majority was in effect grafting "a healthy limb onto a 'poisonous tree.' "

In Williams v. State, the court affirmed the trial court's sanctioning of the opening of an automobile's unlocked trunk without probable cause when the officer thought someone was in the trunk who might pose a threat to his safety.

Some note should be taken of O.C.G.A. § 40-8-76.1(f) which prohibits an officer who stops a motorist because of a seat belt violation from bootstrapping that incident as probable cause for other criminal activity. However, as the court observed in Blitch v. State, O.C.G.A. § 40-8-76.1(f) does not preclude an officer from conducting a vehicle search with the drivers consent obtained during a lawful traffic stop for failure to wear a seatbelt.

§ 3-12 When does a "stop" become an "arrest"?

In United States v. Roper, the Eleventh Circuit acknowledged that "[t]he distinction between an arrest and an investigatory stop depends upon the nature and degree of the intrusion under all the facts of the particular encounter." However, the court concluded that the stop of an automobile was not converted into an arrest simply because the officer approached the stopped vehicle with a drawn gun. In Hughes v. State, a driver of an automobile was informed that he was not free to leave. The Georgia Supreme Court concluded that the evidence supported the conclusion of the trial judge that the defendant was under arrest. However, the "subjective intention of . . . [an] officer to detain the defendant had he attempted to leave is irrelevant except insofar as that intention may have been conveyed to the defendant."

In Sultenfuss v. State, the court found that (1) a stop "was not transformed into an arrest merely because one of the officers, who had physically struggled with appellant during a prior incident, drew his weapon on this occasion"; (2) requiring a defendant to step from an automobile did not transform a stop into an arrest; and (3) the detention of the defendant by blocking his car did not convert the confrontation into an arrest. In Walton v. State, the court concluded that a stop was not transformed into an "arrest merely because of the number of police cars used to effect the stop and the manner in which the police blocked his automobile." However, in State v. Burks, the court pointed out that after an "initial attempt to stop, '[f]light in connection with other circumstances may be sufficient probable cause to uphold a warrantless arrest or search.' "

In People v. Vena, the court concluded that a stop did not become an arrest even though officers transported suspects to the stationhouse in view of blizzard-type weather conditions. The court concluded that this was not more intrusive than detaining them in a field where they were captured or in a squad car.

However, in Hayes v. Florida, the United States Supreme Court held that where "there was no probable cause to arrest," officers have no right to take a suspect to the police station for the purpose of being fingerprinted. However, the Court pointed out that it was saying nothing which implied "that a brief detention in the field for the purpose of fingerprinting, where there is only reasonable suspicion . . . is necessarily impermissible under the Fourth Amendment." In United States v. Guevara-Martinez, the court held that when a defendant is illegally detained, his fingerprints, which were not taken as a part of the ordinary booking procedures, were not admissible.

In People v. Hicks, the New York Court of Appeals held that where there is a valid Terry stop the stop did not become an arrest and was valid even though the defendant was held about 10 minutes and transported to the crime scene for identification.

In the interesting Seventh Circuit case of United States v. Chaidez, the Court recognized that there were degrees of intrusion between what is required for a stop and what is required for an arrest. It said that a sliding scale should be applied. The probability requirement should be increased as the intuitiveness increases. There is no reason to "abandon the search for reasonableness when the intrusion falls between arrest and stop."

In Kolender v. Lawson, the United States Supreme Court considered the validity of a California statute which required "that an individual provide 'credible and reliable' identification when requested by a police officer who has reasonable suspicion of criminal activity to justify a Terry detention." The court held that the statute was unconstitutionally vague on its face and that it vests virtually complete discretion in the police to determine whether the suspect has satisfied the requirements of the statute. This California statute reminds one of the Georgia statute on loitering or prowling which is found in O.C.G.A. § 16–11–36, which is set out in part in the footnotes. This Georgia statute has been regarded as a separate and independent justification for a stop and interrogation. However, if a stop or an arrest is made pursuant to this Georgia statute, such a detention and an accompanying frisk or search which is otherwise valid would not seem to be invalid because of the unconstitutionality of the statute even if it is unconstitutional. Moreover, in Bell v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court held the Georgia loitering and prowling statute constitutional. In Johnson v. State, the appellate court reversed the trial court and found the defendant to have been seized where the defendant was asked for identification and what he was doing in the neighborhood. The defendant responded "Do I have to tell you?" and the officer responded affirmatively.

The Georgia Court of Appeals has observed: "[t]he United States Supreme Court has adopted a dual inquiry for evaluating the reasonableness of a lengthy investigative stop. First, we consider whether the officer's action was justified at its inception and second, whether it was reasonably related in scope to the circumstances which justified the interference in the first place. In assessing whether a detention is too long in duration to be justified as an investigative stop, we consider it appropriate to examine whether the police diligently pursued a means of investigation that was likely to confirm or dispel their suspicions quickly, during which time it was necessary to detain the defendant." (citations and punctuation omitted.) Reversing the suppression of evidence obtained following a consensual search initiated seventeen minutes after the initial traffic stop, the Eleventh Circuit stated in dicta: "Where at its inception a traffic stop is a valid one for a violation of the law, we doubt that a resultant seizure of no more than seventeen minutes can ever be unconstitutional on account of its duration: the detention is too short."

See section 2-12, supra, on probable cause which justifies an arrest. See section 2-2, supra, on seizures and arrests. See sections 4-26 and 4-27, infra, on searches incident to lawful arrest. See section 4-48 et seq., infra, on automobile searches. See section 3-11, supra, on duty of officer to release a suspect after completion of purpose of frisk.

§ 3-13 Brief retention of inanimate objects without probable cause

In United States v. Van Leeuwen, two 12–pound packages were deposited at a post office in Washington near the Canadian border. Both were mailed "air mail/registered." The mailer represented the packages as containing coins. One package was to be sent to California, the other to Tennessee. The postal clerk was suspicious and it was noticed that the return address given was that of a vacant housing area. The license plates on the mailer's car were from British Columbia. A policeman called on the California address and learned that the addressee was under investigation for dealing in illegal coins. The packages were held overnight until information could be obtained about the addressee in Tennessee. It was learned that the addressee there was under investigation for the same offense. A search warrant for the packages was issued and about 29 hours after the packages had been left with the post office, the warrant was executed. The packages were resealed and sent on their way. The mailer was convicted of illegally importing gold coins. The Supreme Court recognized that the Fourth Amendment applied to first class mail and that it could only be opened pursuant to a warrant. However, the Court concluded that the delaying of the packages until information could be obtained justifying the issuance of a warrant was not unreasonable under the Fourth Amendment. The court also drew an analogy between the facts of this case and those of Terry. See Annotation, "Warrantless Detention of Mail for Investigative Purposes as Violative of Fourth Amendment," 115 A. L. R. Fed. 439 (1993).

In United States v. Klein, the court found that the officers' observations and information received justified the detention of bags at an airport while the other investigation was being conducted. The court said that this was true even though there was no probable cause for an arrest of the owner. Additionally, although there was no probable cause for an arrest, the court found that there were grounds for a Terry stop. In Yocham v. State, the court said that while "one has a right under the Fourth Amendment to expect privacy of the contents of one's luggage, this right does not extend to the bags' exterior or to control of who actually handles them" once they have been checked. "Having the bags removed from the baggage cart pending further investigation was not an unreasonable seizure."

In United States v. Place, the United States Supreme Court said "when an officer's observations lead him reasonably to believe that a traveler is carrying luggage that contains narcotics, the principles of Terry and its progeny would permit the officer to detain the luggage briefly to investigate the circumstances that aroused his suspicion, provided that the investigative detention is properly limited in scope. . . . There is no doubt that the agents made a 'seizure' of Place's luggage for the purposes of the Fourth Amendment when, following his refusal to consent to a search, the agent told Place that he was going to take the luggage to a federal judge to secure issuance of a warrant. . . . At the outset, we must reject the Government's suggestion that the point at which probable cause for seizure of luggage from the person's presence becomes necessary is more distant than in the case of a Terry stop of the person himself. . . . The precise type of detention we confront here is seizure of personal luggage from the immediate possession of suspect for the purpose of arranging exposure to a narcotics detection dog. . . . [W]hen the police seize luggage from the suspect's custody, we think the limitations applicable to investigative detentions of the person should define the permissible scope of an investigative detention of the person's luggage on less than probable cause. Under this standard, it is clear that the police conduct here exceeded the permissible limits of a Terry-type investigative stop. The length of the detention of respondent's luggage alone precludes the conclusion that the seizure was reasonable in the absence of probable cause. . . . [T]he brevity of the invasion of the individual's Fourth Amendment interests is an important factor in determining whether the seizure is so minimally intrusive as to be justifiable on reasonable suspicion. . . . [I]n assessing the effect of the length of the detention, we take into account whether the police diligently purse their investigation. [] . . . [A]lthough we decline to adopt any outside time limitation for a permissible Terry stop, . . . we have never approved a seizure of the person for the prolonged 90–minute period involved here and cannot do so on the facts presented by this case. . . . [Also] the violation was exacerbated by the failure of the agents to accurately inform respondent of the place to which they were transporting his luggage, of the length of time he might be dispossessed, and of what arrangements would be made for return of the luggage if the investigation dispelled their suspicion."

In Bothwell v. State, the defendant "traveled alone, from an identified source city, flying under a false name, carried little or no luggage, purchased his expensive airline ticket in cash, acted very nervous, and had given false information to the airline." The stop was based solely on the drug courier profile. See section 3-4, supra. At the time of the stop, one of the officers took the defendant's ticket, retained it and took the defendant to a private office while retaining his boarding pass. He consented to a pat-down search of his person. At first he said he would consent to a search of his bag but after officers retrieved it, he withdrew his consent to the search of his bag. The agents retained the defendant's bag, but the defendant continued his flight to Phoenix. The agents obtained a drug dog. The dog indicated that there were narcotics in the bag. A search warrant was obtained, and a search produced cocaine. The defendant was arrested when he deplaned in Phoenix. In a four to three decision of the Georgia Supreme Court, the court affirmed the denial of the motion to suppress. See Florida v. Royer, discussed in section 3-4, supra.

In State v. Foster, the defendant fit the "drug courier profile." He was frisked but refused to consent to a search of a shaving bag he was carrying. The court held that the officers could briefly detain the bag under Terry. "[W]hen an officer's observations lead him reasonably to believe that a traveler is carrying luggage that contains narcotics, . . . the officer . . . [may] detain the luggage briefly to investigate the circumstances that aroused his suspicion, provided that the investigative detention is properly limited in scope." In this case, a dog sniffed the bag, detected narcotics in the bag, and the defendant was then arrested. The bag was then searched and cocaine was found in it.

In Dawson v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals concluded that "[w]here a drug dog's alert is the only basis for suspecting the presence of contraband . . . , evidence that the dog has been extremely unreliable in the past may lead the trial court to conclude that the dog's alert, by itself, does not indicate a 'fair probability' of the presence of contraband. However, where there are additional indications of the presence of contraband . . . , the totality of the circumstances may support a finding of probable cause notwithstanding evidence of the dog's unreliability."

On the other hand, in State v. Smith, the defendant arrived at the Atlanta Airport from Fort Lauderdale, a source city. He looked around, staring at people. He appeared nervous. An agent followed the defendant to determine the name on his ticket. The agent learned from the ticket agent the defendant's name, destination, and the fact that the ticket had been paid for with a credit card. The agent called the call-back number in Fort Lauderdale and found it was a hotel there; he estimated that the defendant had remained there about 19 hours. When the defendant was approached, he produced "his ticket, driver's license, and his [real] name." The defendant said he had gone there to look at an airplane. As the defendant was questioned he seemed to become more nervous. He said he was not carrying contraband on his person or in his luggage. He consented to a search of his boots and had a considerable amount of money there. He was given Miranda warnings, was accused of carrying drugs in his luggage, and was warned that if he did not consent to a luggage search, he would, if possible, be met in Tulsa by officers and drug dogs. The defendant declined to consent. The agent then retrieved the defendant's checked suitcase, and the defendant was informed of his rights regarding the search of his suitcase. He was told that he was free to leave but that his suitcase would be retained. The defendant left for Tulsa while a search warrant was being obtained for the suitcase. When the suitcase was opened it was found to contain cocaine. The court affirmed the granting of the motion to suppress finding (1) that the stop was not justified by an articulable suspicion, and (2) that the scope of a Terry stop had been exceeded and the stop amounted to an illegal detention.

In State v. Grant, the court, while disapproving of the conclusion of the trial judge, concluded that a retention of luggage for about an hour was justified where officers acted diligently, the retention was not prolonged needlessly, the agents tried to make arrangements to return the luggage, and the intrusion was minimal and was justifiable.

See section 4-44, infra, on border searches and section 4-45, infra, on search of incoming international mail. See section 3-4, supra, on stops related to the airport drug courier profile. See section 4-34, infra, on searches at airports.

Chapter 4

Search And Seizure

§ 4-1 Definitions of search and seizure
§ 4-2 Protected areas and interests
§ 4-3 Property which may be seized
§ 4-4 Who may apply for a search warrant?
§ 4-5 Judicial officers who may issue search warrants
§ 4-6 —Neutral and detached magistrates
§ 4-7 Probable cause required for issuance of search warrant—General
§ 4-8 —Observation of affiant who is officer, victim, or private citizen
§ 4-9 —Observation of officer, victim, or private citizen not appearing before magistrate
§ 4-10 —Observation of "informer" not appearing before magistrate
§ 4-11 —Time
§ 4-12 —Description of place and person to be searched
§ 4-13 —reason for searching place and person
§ 4-14 —Person or thing to be seized
§ 4-15 Issuance of search warrant
§ 4-16 Execution of search warrant—General
§ 4-17 Who may search?
§ 4-18 Execution of search warrant—Knock and announce
§ 4-19 —Area to be searched—Curtilage
§ 4-20 —Purpose of search
§ 4-21 —Detention and search of person present
§ 4-22 —Property which may be seized—General
§ 4-23 — —Obscene material
§ 4-24 Return by officer
§ 4-25 Warrantless searches—General
§ 4-26 —Incident to lawful arrest—Person
§ 4-27 — —Articles and area around person arrested
§ 4-28 —Valid stop-and-frisk
§ 4-29 —Exigent circumstances
§ 4-30 —Officer in hot pursuit
§ 4-31 —Valid consent—General
§ 4-32 —Valid consent by defendant
§ 4-33 —Valid consent by third person
§ 4-34 —Airport searches
§ 4-35 —Courthouses and public buildings
§ 4-36 —Places of recreation and entertainment
§ 4-37 —Abandoned property
§ 4-38 —Plain view—General
§ 4-39 — —Inadvertent discovery
§ 4-40 — —Right of officer to be where he was at time of discovery
§ 4-41 — —Illegality of seized items immediately apparent
§ 4-42 —Open fields
§ 4-43 —Jails, prisons, probationers, and inmates
§ 4-44 —Border searches
§ 4-45 —Administrative searches
§ 4-46 —Vehicles—Overview of some United States Supreme Court cases
§ 4-47 — —General
§ 4-48 — —Incident to valid arrest
§ 4-49 — —Probable cause—General
§ 4-50 — —Circumstances not amounting to probable cause
§ 4-51 — —Circumstances amounting to probable cause
§ 4-52 — —Nature of search permitted
§ 4-53 — —Search of occupants
§ 4-54 — —Abandonment
§ 4-55 — —Inventory search after impound, put in storage, or condemned
§ 4-56 Scope and intensity of search
§ 4-57 Second search
§ 4-58 Electronic surveillance—General

KeyCite®: Cases and other legal materials listed in KeyCite Scope can be researched through the KeyCite service on Westlaw®. Use KeyCite to check citations for form, parallel references, prior and later history, and comprehensive citator information, including citations to other decisions and secondary materials.

§ 4-1 Definitions of search and seizure

A search is a quest for information. The "term implies some exploratory investigation, or an invasion and quest, a looking for or seeking out . . . a prying into hidden places for that which is concealed." In Maryland v. Macon, the United States Supreme Court said, "A search occurs when 'an expectation of privacy that society is prepared to consider reasonable is infringed.' " In that case, the Court held that there was no search where an officer entered a bookstore and examined magazines "that were intentionally exposed to all" who entered the bookstore.

There is no search when an officer sees from a public road what is in plain view to the unaided eye or, apparently, when the officer sees something from business property generally used by and open to the public.

Based on the theory that "a search ordinarily implies a quest by an officer," the United States Supreme Court in Wyman v. James concluded that there was not a search by a social worker in making a home visit to a family receiving Aid to Families with Dependent Children money, even though the visit was to some extent investigative. In United States v. DeBardeleben, the court held that the insertion of the keys in the locks of a car was a minimum intrusion which did not amount to a search. See Annotation, "Attachment or Use of Transponder (Beeper) to Monitor Location of Airplane or Automobile as Constituting 'Search' Within Fourth Amendment," 57 A. L. R. Fed. 646 (1982). Also see section 4-2, infra, on protected areas and interests, and sections 14-74 to 14-78, infra, on expectation of privacy. See section 4-39, infra, on field tests of suspected drugs.

The act of taking and removing tangible personal property is a seizure. In Maryland v. Macon, the Supreme Court said, "A seizure occurs when 'there is some meaningful interference with an individual's possessory interests' in the property seized." No seizure was found in Maryland where an officer bought magazines he suspected were obscene that were on display in a store.

It has been held that where officers attempt to maintain a status quo until a warrant can be obtained, there is a seizure where the officers lock the premises or wait inside or outside for the arrival of a warrant. A seizure also occurs when intangible items are obtained, as in the case of overhearing or recording a telephone call improperly.

There is, however, no expectation of privacy in conversations which occur between a prisoner and a visitor in a prison or jail visiting area. Nor is there such an expectation in the case of a telephone call made from a police station reception area. Likewise, conversations between arrestees in the rear seat of a police patrol car which are secretly recorded have no reasonable expectation of privacy.

Finally, it must be noted that seizure of a person occurs not only in the case of an arrest, but also where a person is restrained so that he cannot walk away. See Chapter 2, supra, on arrest, and Chapter 3, supra, on stop-and-frisk.

§ 4-2 Protected areas and interests

Whatever areas and interests are protected by the Fourth Amendment are protected only against governmental action; individuals acting on their own initiative are not within the amendment's scope. See section 4-59, infra.

The Fourth Amendment states that people shall "be secure in their persons, houses, papers and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures." An admirable opinion written by Judge Clark of the Georgia Court of Appeals contains the following: " 'A man's home is his castle. The storm and wind may enter, but the King cannot enter, and all the forces of the Crown cannot cross the threshold of his ruined tenement.' These words by Lord Eldon served as the basis for that portion of the Fourth Amendment in the Bill of Rights declaring that the people shall be secure in their houses against unreasonable searches and seizures. Our state Constitution contains almost identical language as used in the federal document." The Fourth Amendment protection has been extended beyond the home to people, automobiles, boats, the area within the curtilage of a house, apartments, hotel rooms, public telephone booths, offices, desks, a coin-operated locker in a bus station, a tent, and a refrigerator in a locked storage unit.

For example, a warrant authorizing the search of a house was held to give officers authority to search a U–Haul truck within the curtilage of the house. Marijuana found in a cooler about 100 yards from the defendant's house trailer at the end of a path from the trailer was also found to be in the curtilage of defendant's home. However, the curtilage concept does not prevent an officer without a warrant from approaching the front door of a house by the same route as would be used by any guest, delivery man, or postal employee. Likewise, the common areas of an apartment building, such as the lobby and the corridors, do not provide a tenant who resides there with a reasonable expectation of privacy where such areas are open and accessible to tenants, visitors, the landlord and its employees as well as the public. See section 4-42, infra. Generally, on curtilage, see section 4-19, infra.

The United States Supreme Court, in Katz v. United States, pointed out that the common law concept of trespass will no longer determine whether a violation of the Fourth Amendment has occurred, because the Fourth Amendment is intended to protect people, not simply places. However, a place is entitled to Fourth Amendment protection where an individual connected with the place has a reasonable expectation of privacy in that area. Generally, on expectation of privacy, see sections 14-74 to 14-78, infra. See section 4-27, infra, on seizure of premises while a search warrant is being obtained.

Generally, articles which can be seen with the naked eye from a place an officer is entitled to be are not protected, and this rule seems to apply to the other senses. Thus, in Cox v. State, the court stated that officers do not have to obtain prior judicial approval to listen to conversations from a hall outside an apartment or to place the naked ear next to the door to the apartment. In Maryland v. Macon, the United States Supreme Court held that there was no reasonable expectation of privacy in an obscene book on display in the public area of an adult bookstore, and the purchase of such a book was not a seizure.

In United States v. King, the Eleventh Circuit Court of Appeals held that a private contractor who accessed a military computer network on his personal computer while on a military base located in Saudi Arabia had no reasonable expectation of privacy as to the contents of files that were on a "shared" network, which enabled anyone on that network to access the files.

In New York v. Burger, the United States Supreme Court stated, "An expectation of privacy in commercial premises . . . is different from, and indeed less than, a similar expectation in an individual's home. . . . This expectation is particularly attenuated in commercial property employed in 'closely regulated' industries." The court then concluded that a state statute was constitutional which was enacted to combat auto theft which authorized a warrantless inspection of junkyards when certain criteria were followed.

In United States v. Place, the United States Supreme Court, in considering the sniffing by a dog of luggage of an airline passenger, said "the present course of investigation that the agents intended to pursue here—exposure of respondent's luggage, which was located in a public place, to a trained canine—did not constitute a 'search' within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment." However, in Bond v. United States, the Court held that an INS agent conducted an illegal search when he felt of the luggage in the overhead compartment of a bus. The agent detected a "brick-like object" in one of the bags and after receiving consent from the owner, searched and found methamphetamine. The court explained that while "a bus passenger . . . expects that his bag may be handled . . . [he] does not expect that other[s] . . . [will feel the bag] . . . in an exploratory manner."

In Carter v. State, the court held that the use of a dog to smell a package at a UPS station did not interfere with the defendant's possessory interest nor was it a search within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment.

As pointed out in section 4-27, infra, even though a container may be seized, this alone does not mean that the officer has the right to search the container. Abandoned premises and articles lose their protection; open fields and the public portions of business and commercial establishments are not protected.

Surveillance of a stall in public restrooms has sometimes been held to be protected and sometimes held not to be protected. In Wylie v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals affirmed the denial of a motion to suppress where an officer entered a restroom, saw two pairs of feet facing each other under the partition around the commode stall. The officer then looked through the crack between the door and the adjacent wall "and saw two men ingesting a white powder which he took to be and which examination proved was in fact cocaine."

The exterior of a vehicle and articles which can be observed by the public from the outside are not protected. Similarly, in New York v. Class, the United States Supreme Court held that a motorist has no reasonable expectation of privacy in a motor vehicle identification number on the dashboard of the car, even if an object on the dash prevented an officer from reading the number from outside the vehicle which the officer had stopped for a traffic violation. The court also held that a gun, discovered by the officer when he leaned into the vehicle to uncover the identification number, was admissible against the defendant. See section 3-10, supra, on the "plain feel" doctrine.

In United States v. Miller, the United States Supreme Court held that a depositor had no Fourth Amendment interest in bank records consisting of microfilms of checks, deposit slips and other records relating to his bank account and that the subpoenaed records were the records of the bank and not the depositor's private papers. In Braswell v. United States, the United States Supreme Court held that there was no violation of the Fifth Amendment privilege of a sole stockholder of a corporation to require him, as custodian of the corporate records, to produce those records pursuant to a subpoena. However, in the Eleventh Circuit opinion of In re Grand Jury Subpoena, dated April 9, 1996, the court, relying on Curcio v. United States, held that the sole officer and director of a corporation could not be required to testify before a grand jury to the location of the corporate records after she asserted her Fifth Amendment privilege and stated that she did not possess the records. In Smith v. Maryland, the United States Supreme Court has held that there is no Fourth Amendment violation when a pen register is installed at the central telephone office to record the numbers dialed from a person's telephone. The Georgia Supreme Court, in Kesler v. State, cited and followed Miller in holding that neither the user of a telephone nor the subscriber to the telephone service has any expectation of privacy in telephone toll and billing records of the telephone company. However, in Ellis v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court, while recognizing that from a Fourth Amendment standpoint a pen register does not require a warrant, a warrant is required for a pen register under Georgia statutory law.

In Skinner v. Railway Labor Executives' Association, the United States Supreme Court held that a blood, urine, and breath test of employees involved in accidents for drugs is a "search" within the ambit of the Fourth Amendment. Even in the absence of a particularized suspicion of drug or alcohol use, the compelling governmental interest in railroad safety outweighs the limited intrusion upon the privacy interest of the employees, and such tests are admissible. The same Court handed down a decision in National Treasury Employees Union v. Von Raab on the same day as the Skinner case. In the Von Raab case, the Court held that the Customs Service may constitutionally require employees seeking promotions to positions requiring the carrying of firearms to undergo blood screening.

In Chandler v. Miller, the United States Supreme Court held invalid a Georgia statute requiring certain elective officials to certify that they have tested negative for drugs before qualifying for office. The court held that when public safety is not genuinely in jeopardy, the suspicionless search, no matter how unintrusive or conveniently arranged, is still a violation of the Fourth Amendment. The court pointed out that there was "no evidence of a drug problem among the State's elected officials . . . [that they] do not perform high risk, safety sensitive tasks, and the required certification immediately aids no interdiction effort."

In Jackson v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals concluded that " 'there is no constitutionally protected right in a decedent's body. Rather, the courts have evolved the concept of quasi property in recognition of the interests of surviving relatives in the possession and control of decedents' bodies. We do not find this common law concept to be of constitutional dimension.' . . . [Hence, a defendant's] quasi-property interest in [a] stillborn fetus will not support a privacy claim sufficient to implicate the search and seizure provisions of the United States Constitution." (Emphasis in original.)

In Ferguson v. Charleston, S.C., the United States Supreme Court, in a five to four decision, held a hospital's policy of conducting non-consensual drug tests on pregnant women and turning positive results over to police violates the Fourth Amendment. The court reasoned that the purpose behind the policy takes it outside prior rulings of the court upholding searches conducted under policies that dispense with usual Fourth Amendment requirements in order to serve "special needs" of law enforcement.

In Stephenson v. State, the court held that in response to harassing phone calls, there was no Fourth Amendment violation when a phone company employee traced a call, determined that it originated from the defendant's number, " 'trapped' the call by preventing the two phones from being disconnected from each other, and notified the police. Police went to defendant's residence, received permission to check his telephone and discovered that his line was dead. They also discovered that the phone line had been cut outside of the house. . . . The following day, . . . a telephone company employee and a police officer went to defendant's residence, and found no one at home. They went to where the line was cut outside of the house where the employee connected a test phone to the cut line. The police officer then spoke on the phone to another officer who was at the victim's phone . . . ."

There seems to be a division of authority on whether or not the use of "bugs" or electronic tracking devices violates the Fourth Amendment. However, in 1983, in United States v. Knotts, the United States Supreme Court held that there was no invasion of any legitimate expectation of privacy and no "search" or "seizure" within the contemplation of the Fourth Amendment in the use of a beeper to follow an object carried in an automobile on public roads and to a private residence. In Knotts, one Armstrong was purchasing chloroform to be used in the manufacture of drugs. Officers arranged to place a beeper inside a chloroform container which was sold to Armstrong. When Armstrong obtained the container, officers followed the car and maintained contact visually and with a monitor. Armstrong transferred the container to one Petschen. Petschen was then followed. Officers lost visual and "beeper" contact at one time but later located the container by the use of a helicopter. The container was then stationary at a cabin of Knotts. The officers then obtained a search warrant and discovered a drug laboratory at Knotts' cabin. The five gallon container was outside the cabin. The court pointed out that the surveillance amounted principally to following automobiles on public streets, that persons driving on public streets have no reasonable expectation of privacy, and that there was no indication that the beeper was used in any way to reveal the movement of the container in the cabin or in any way which would not have been visible to the naked eye outside the cabin.

In United States v. Karo, the United States Supreme Court held that, while the installation of a beeper in a drum of ether, with the consent of a dealer, was not a violation of the Fourth Amendment, there is such a violation where the beeper continued to be monitored after the drum had been placed in a private residence. Although the case was later overruled, the court in Banks v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals summarized its holding as follows: "[O]fficers who find an apparently closed business unlocked during a normal security sweep may conduct a limited intrusion on the business premises for the sole purpose of securing the area and ensuring no intruders are present."

The Fourth Amendment does not protect against a misplaced confidence. Thus, where a person invites a guest into his home or room, the guest may later testify as to what he saw or heard while he was in the area into which he was invited, even though the guest is an undercover officer or is working with officers. Likewise, if such a guest is carrying a transmitter to which officers are listening, or if he is carrying a concealed recording device, there is no Fourth Amendment violation. See section 4-58, infra.

In Zurcher v. Stanford Daily, the United States Supreme Court held that a search warrant, rather than a subpoena duces tecum, may be used to search the premises of a third party who was not suspected of involvement in the underlying crime. See section 17-10, infra, on subpoenas for production of documents. However, by Georgia statute a search and seizure shall not be conducted without a warrant from a superior court judge, and no search warrant shall be issued for any evidence in the possession of an attorney who is not a criminal suspect unless the application specifies the place to be searched and shows that there is probable cause to believe that such evidence will be secreted or destroyed if a warrant is not issued.

In Ledesma v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court held that when officers recover property reported to be stolen, a good faith inventory of the property may be conducted.

In addition to the protection of the Fourth Amendment, as it is being applied by the United States Supreme Court, there is also a growing number of states which have extended greater protection to their citizens, through their own statutes and state constitutions, than that provided by the federal Constitution.

The United States Supreme Court in United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez held that the Fourth Amendment does not apply to the search and seizure by United States agents of property that is owned by a nonresident alien and located in a foreign country. See Annotation, "Expectation of Privacy in Internet Communications," 92 A. L. R. 5th 15 (2001).

Computers pose a unique challenge to the case law which has developed around such Fourth Amendment issues as expectation of privacy, probable cause, consent and the extent to which a computer's files may be searched. Although there is law developing in some recent cases, defense counsel, prosecutors and courts should proceed with caution where the subject of a police search resides within a suspect's computer.

It must be kept in mind that the failure to file a timely motion to suppress constitutes a waiver of any violation of the Fourth Amendment with respect to search and seizure.

Generally, see 1 LaFave, Search and Seizure, 220 et seq. (West 1978). See section 4-58, infra, on electronic surveillance. See section 5-22 et seq., infra, on non-testimonial evidence. See section 4-1, supra, on the definition of a "search" and a "seizure." See sections 14-74 to 14-78, infra, on expectation of privacy. See section 4-59, infra, on school searches. See Annotation, "Validity, Under Fourth Amendment, of 'Mail Cover,' " 57 A. L. R. Fed. 742 (1982). See section 4-42, infra, on material observed from a helicopter or plane.

§ 4-3 Property which may be seized

O.C.G.A. § 17–5–21 provides that a search warrant may issue for the seizure of the following:

(1) Any instruments, articles, or things, including the private papers of any person, which are designed, intended for use, or which have been used in the commission of the offense in connection with which the warrant is issued;
(2) Any person who has been kidnapped in violation of the laws of this state, who has been kidnapped in another jurisdiction and is now concealed within this state, or any human fetus or human corpse;
(3) Stolen or embezzled property;
(4) Any item, substance, object, thing, or matter, the possession of which is unlawful; or
(5) Any item, substance, object, thing, or matter, other than the private papers of any person, which is tangible evidence of the commission of the crime for which probable cause is shown.

When the peace officer is in the process of effecting a lawful search, nothing in this Code section shall be construed to preclude him from discovering or seizing any stolen or embezzled property, any item, substance, object, thing, or matter, the possession of which is unlawful, or any item, substance, object, thing, or matter, other than the private papers of any person, which is tangible evidence of the commission of a crime against the laws of this state.

In Sears v. State, the court held that the term "private papers" applies only "to papers covered by privilege (attorney-client, doctor-patient, etc.)."

While it is true that the above statute is couched in terms of a search pursuant to a warrant, it seems that the same persons or things might be seized pursuant to a lawful warrantless search if it is immediately apparent that the person or object falls within this Code section. See section 4-38 et seq., infra, on plain view.

In more general terms, in a lawful warrantless search, an officer may seize any contraband, stolen property, or mere evidence of a crime which he sees in plain view and which he immediately recognizes as such, provided that the scope of the search was strictly tied to and justified by the circumstances which rendered it permissible when initiated. Thus, in United States v. Jones, the court affirmed the trial court in approving a seizure of a handgun in plain view. The officer had been talking to the defendant through a closed screen door and there was another occupant of the room within arm's reach of the weapon.

Generally, see 68 Am. Jur. 2d Searches and Seizures § 85.

§ 4-4 Who may apply for a search warrant?

In Georgia, by statute any officer of this state or its political subdivisions, or a university, college or school charged with the duty of enforcing the criminal laws may file a written complaint for the issuance of a search warrant. An application for the issuance of a search warrant may be conducted by video conference and will be considered a written application if it satisfies statutory requirements. However, an officer is not entitled to obtain a search warrant unless he is certified pursuant to the provisions of O.C.G.A. §§ 35–8–1 et seq.. See section 2-8, supra.

In State v. Harber, the court held that where an officer was "not authorized to obtain and execute an extraterritorial search warrant, this lack of authority would constitute no more than a mere 'technical' defect" not affecting any substantial rights of the defendant.

§ 4-5 Judicial officers who may issue search warrants

Georgia statutes contain several references to the issuance of a search warrant by a "judicial officer." A judicial officer in the strict legal sense is one "who determines causes" between parties or who "renders decisions in a judicial capacity."

O.C.G.A. § 17–5–21 specifically provides that "any judicial officer authorized to hold a court of inquiry . . . may issue a search warrant." It has been expressly held that a magistrate may issue a search warrant for any area of the county in which his district lies. Judges of recorders' court or municipal court may issue search warrants apparently for any area within the municipality. In Campbell v. State, the court held that a judge of the Municipal Court of the City of College Park could sign a warrant in her home in Fulton County to be executed in Clayton County. The court reasoned that because the municipality of College Park crossed the Fulton County line into Clayton County, the judge's authority extended across the county line to the limits of the municipality. A judge pro hac vice of a municipal court may also issue a search warrant. In State v. Kirkland, the court held a judge of the Atlanta City Court lacked authority to authorize a search in Coweta County since no part of the City of Atlanta is in Coweta County. In McLendon v. State, the court upheld a warrant issued by a person sitting as a de facto magistrate. A juvenile court judge may issue a search warrant even in matters which are not concerned with juveniles. Of course, a superior court judge may issue a search warrant for execution in any county of his circuit and the warrant may be signed in any county of the circuit, regardless of the county in which the search is to be executed.

Prior to the enactment of the present Georgia statutes on search and seizure, it had been held that a deputy clerk could issue a search warrant if there existed express authorization by the legislature. However, such procedure has been recognized as not being valid in that "only a judicial officer can issue a [search] warrant."

Where a motion to suppress is filed and no issue is raised as to the authority of the magistrate to issue the search warrant, this amounts to a waiver of the right of the defendant to object.

In 2001, O.C.G.A. § 17–5–21.1 became effective and provides that a search warrant application may be heard by video conference under the conditions of the statute.

§ 4-6 Judicial officers who may issue search warrants—Neutral and detached magistrates

It is well recognized that the determination of whether probable cause exists to issue a search warrant must be made by a "neutral and detached magistrate." Thus, it has been held that a magistrate who serves as a weekend dispatcher for the police is disqualified from issuing a search warrant. Likewise, a magistrate who issues search warrants and then takes part in the searches is not regarded as neutral or detached. In Connally v. Georgia, it was held that a magistrate who is paid $5 for issuing a search warrant and receives no fee if he declines to do so is not a neutral and detached magistrate. However, this rule has not been applied retroactively. The Georgia Court of Appeals has concluded that each of these cases must be decided on its own facts and the "test . . . is whether . . . [the magistrate's] welfare is enhanced by positive action and not enhanced by negative action." The Georgia legislature in 1977 attempted to circumvent this problem by amending the statute providing compensation to a justice of the peace (now magistrate) by providing that he will be paid $5 regardless of whether he decides to issue a search warrant. However, the amended statute provides that the fee "shall not exceed $10.00, but this fee may be waived by the issuing magistrate." If the magistrate holds commitment hearings and obtains a fee for this service, the magistrate might be inclined to issue the search warrant so he could obtain fees incident to the preliminary hearing. In Felker v. State, the court held that a magistrate was not disqualified where he had a practice of not billing the county if he denied a search warrant but billing the county if he did. However, in Rains v. State, the court concluded that a magistrate issuing an arrest warrant is not disqualified by receiving warrant application forms from the county at no cost. Also it has been held that a magistrate is not to be regarded as disqualified to issue a search warrant where in the past in an unrelated incident he signed blank warrants to accommodate officers.

A magistrate is not disqualified merely because of personal association with police officers or regular visits to the sheriff's office and jail or because he was formerly a deputy sheriff. Likewise, an ex officio magistrate is not disqualified because he is also a coroner. In Clark v. State, the court held that a magistrate's neutrality was not impaired by the fact that the magistrate's son was a police officer for the same police department which obtained the search warrant where the son was not involved in the case in any way. In Judicial Qualification Opinion No. 101, the Commission concluded that any employee of a law enforcement body is disqualified by conflict of interest from serving as a magistrate.

Where a superior court judge personally impaneled a special investigative grand jury which indicted the defendant, and made suggestions to the district attorney concerning witnesses to be called, he was held not to be a neutral and detached magistrate. However, in Beal v. State, the court held that when a judge "notarized" an affidavit submitted in support of a warrant application, it did not keep him from being neutral and detached in examining or issuing the search warrant.

When a warrant is issued for the search and seizure of documentary evidence in the possession of an attorney, the court shall appoint a special master who is a member of the bar to accompany the person serving the warrant. The special master shall specify the items sought, and if the party fails to provide such items, he shall conduct a search. See section 4-2, supra, on warrants for the search and seizure of documentary evidence in an attorney's possession.

§ 4-7 Probable cause required for issuance of search warrant—General

A proceeding to obtain a search warrant can be initiated by "any officer of this state or its political subdivisions charged with the duty of enforcing the criminal laws." See section 2-8, supra, on officers who may obtain a search warrant. The Fourth Amendment provides that "no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation . . . ." The Georgia Constitution and O.C.G.A. § 17–5–21 contain the same threshold requirement.

As previously pointed out, probable cause is based on probabilities—there must be more than mere suspicion, but there is no requirement of proof beyond a reasonable doubt. However, in State v. Stephens, the Georgia Supreme Court pointed out that "[b]y no means is probable cause to be equated with proof by even so much as a preponderance of evidence . . . . 'Probable cause does not demand the certainty we associate with formal trials.' The issuing magistrate now need only conclude that there is a 'fair probability that contraband or evidence of a crime will be found in a particular place.' " (Emphasis by the court.)

The evidence utilized in the determination of probable cause may be presented in an affidavit, sworn oral testimony, verified complaint, or any combination of the foregoing. In Williams v. State, the court held that a magistrate could consider a taped "affidavit" which was sworn to before the magistrate. However, it is necessary to have a written, signed complaint or affidavit before a search warrant may issue, although it is possible to supplement these with oral testimony under oath. Nevertheless, since it is usually impossible for either an officer or a magistrate to remember precisely what the officer said in the presence of the magistrate (even if he gives sworn testimony) every reasonable effort should be exercised to see that all the information given the magistrate is in writing or recorded and preserved, but the failure to do so is not error. It has also been held that a magistrate may take into consideration an "on the scene" viewing to which he is taken by an officer. A search warrant may properly issue based on a signed, but unverified affidavit if testimony establishes that the signing party was, in fact, sworn at the time he gave the information to the magistrate. In Latimer v. State, the court held that where an officer sought two search warrants at the same time, one for the residence of a suspect and one for his business, it was possible for one affidavit to incorporate allegations of the other by reference.

The facts on which the officer relies in seeking the search warrant must be set forth so that a determination of probable cause can be made. An affidavit which merely states a conclusion that narcotics are located in a certain area is not sufficient. Likewise, "observation of activity that fits a 'drug traffic pattern' . . . does not amount to probable cause to search . . . [a] home." However, the reputation of the suspect, whose place is to be searched, is a fact which may be considered in determining whether or not probable cause for a search exists.

Verified facts are presented to a magistrate for the purpose of permitting him to make an independent and detached judgment as to whether probable cause exists for the issuance of a search warrant. Hence, the magistrate must read the affidavit and make such a judicial determination. If the magistrate fails to make a determination as to probable cause, any search warrant which he issues is void.

In determining the existence of probable cause, the evidence presented to the magistrate must be considered as a whole. The courts have indicated that exculpatory material does not have to be inserted in an affidavit for a search warrant "if no misconduct on the affiant's part has occurred." See section 4-10, infra, on reliability of confidential informer. In Hayes v. State, the court indicated that failure of an affidavit "to present 'exculpatory' information does not render an affidavit invalid."

The affidavit must be interpreted by the magistrate and reviewing court in a common sense and realistic manner. An officer's affidavit "should not be judged as an entry in an essay contest." In White v. State, the court held "[e]laborate specificity is not required in affidavits supporting search warrants and, where the affidavit leaves doubt as to the existence of probable cause, such questions should largely be resolved by a preference accorded warrants." Probable cause in a warrant proceeding is not the equivalent of guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. There need only be probable cause to believe that evidence of a crime has been secreted on specific premises. Probable cause exists where the facts and circumstances would warrant a man of reasonable caution in believing that the evidence sought is in the place described. However, courts should treat the judgment of experienced officers with considerable deference because of their expertise which enables them to "articulate meaning in given conduct which would be wholly innocent to the untrained observer." Thus, in Daniels v. State, the court upheld the finding of probable cause to search the computer of the defendant, a convicted child molester, where the investigating detective attested that, based on his experience and training, persons involved in the acts of child molestation often use their computers to perpetrate their illegal acts and to maintain files and data related to their illegal acts. There is an indication that less evidence is needed in order to establish probable cause for the issuance of a search warrant than is required for a warrantless search of the premises.

The omission of information from a search warrant application and affidavit will not necessarily justify the suppression of evidence. Indeed, the intentional misrepresentation of the facts presented to the magistrate will not automatically require suppression. The test in each case is whether there exists other corroborative evidence which was presented to the magistrate and which under the totality of circumstances "supplies an alternative basis for finding probable cause, where there are deficiencies in the showing of the informant's veracity, reliability or basis of knowledge."

Probable cause may be established at least in part by smell as well as sight or hearing.

"[T]he time within which proof of probable cause [must exist] . . . must be of facts closely related to the time of the issuance of the warrant so as to justify such finding at that time." Thus, later conflicting statements of an affiant will not "undo" a finding of probable cause at the time of issuing a warrant. However, a trial court passing on a motion to suppress must give "great deference" to a magistrate's determination that probable cause exists. " 'A grudging or negative attitude by reviewing courts toward warrants' . . . is inconsistent with the Fourth Amendment. . . . [S]o long as the magistrate had a 'substantial basis for . . . conclud[ing]' that a search would uncover evidence of wrongdoing, the Fourth Amendment requires no more." "A search warrant, regular and proper on its face, is presumptively valid. . . ." However, the issuance of the warrant may not be justified by what is discovered in the later search.

"Minor factual inaccuracies which are only peripherally relevant to the showing will not void the warrant where their presence in the affidavit is not such as to reflect on the credibility of the affiant." In Houston v. State, the court pointed out that the defendant has "the burden of showing not only that the false and omitted information was material to the determination of probable cause but that any false information given or material information omitted was done so for the purpose of misleading the magistrate." However, the defendant need not carry the burden of showing that a warrant was obtained through the use of false or misleading information until the State first meets its burden of producing evidence showing the validity of the warrant. At a minimum, this will require the warrant and the supporting affidavit.

Generally, it has been said that if the information set forth in the affidavit is obtained by an illegal wiretap, or in some other illegal manner, a search warrant based thereon is not valid. However, probable cause may be based on evidence obtained when a warrantless search is conducted by private persons who are not officers. Also, even where an affidavit contains information, which has, in part, been unlawfully obtained, the warrant is not necessarily defective. The question is whether the untainted information is alone sufficient to establish probable cause. If the lawfully obtained information alone is sufficient to constitute probable cause, the evidence seized pursuant to the warrant is admissible. Thus, while it is not appropriate for the police to inform the magistrate that the suspect refused authorities permission to conduct a search of his premises (or for the magistrate to consider the same), if there was enough untainted information in the warrant application to support the issuance of the warrant, any evidence seized as a result will not be suppressed.

In Evans v. State, the court held that there is no obligation on the state to produce at trial the officer whose affidavit was the basis of a search warrant.

Generally, see section 2-10 et seq., supra, on probable cause. See 68 Am. Jur. 2d Searches and Seizures § 68.

§ 4-8 Probable cause required for issuance of search warrant—Observation of affiant who is officer, victim, or private citizen

The truthfulness or reliability of facts observed and stated in an affidavit or sworn testimony, unless obviously false, may be relied on by the magistrate if the affiant is a police officer, the victim of the crime, or a private citizen. (See section 2-11, supra, on information received by an officer from an informant.) However, the magistrate is not obligated to believe the facts stated orally under oath or by affidavit.

An affidavit or testimony for a search warrant must not be conclusory. Thus, it has been held that an assertion of an affiant that he had seen "contraband (marijuana residue) in . . . [defendant's] house" was held to be a mere conclusion and not to justify the issuance of a search warrant where "the affidavit contains no information concerning the affiant's ability to distinguish marijuana residue from tobacco residue."

In Britt v. State, an informer showed a bag of what she said was PCP to an officer. The officer took the informer and the contents of the bag to a magistrate. The officer did not know the informer, but in his affidavit said she was reliable. The informer did give a detailed description of the criminal activity involved. The record does not indicate that the informer was sworn. However, the officer had seen her at the place to be searched shortly before she presented the bag to him. The court concluded that the reliability of the informer had been established sufficiently to justify the issuance of a search warrant.

In Eaton v. State, the court held that an anonymous informant may not be established as a concerned private citizen based on what the informant told the officer.

§ 4-9 Probable cause required for issuance of search warrant—Observation of officer, victim, or private citizen not appearing before magistrate

Hearsay may be relied on in order to establish the accuracy of the facts related by the affiant to the magistrate. Here again, the magistrate may rely on information related to an officer affiant by another police officer, the victim of the crime, or by a disinterested private citizen of good reputation. Also, "when a named informant makes a declaration against . . . penal interest and based on personal observation, that in itself provides a substantial basis for the magistrate to credit that statement." (Emphasis in original.) However, the fact that the caller was "a well-spoken black lady" without more does not make the caller a "concerned citizen." It is not necessary for the person making the firsthand observation to be named in the affidavit, provided he is sufficiently described so as to make it clear that he falls within one of the above categories and provided the person actually exists.

In Johnson v. State, the court pointed out that "information obtained by police officers engaged in an investigation may be used by another officer common to that investigation as a reliable basis for the establishment of probable cause. . . . [However,] where an informant supplies the information to one officer who then relays it to a fellow officer, the reliability . . . of the informant" determines the reliability of the information the second officer received.

In State v. White, the court held that an anonymous tipster is not to be regarded as a "concerned citizen" unless facts are presented to the magistrate from which it can be concluded that the tipster is in fact a "concerned citizen." In Wood v. State, the court held that the "uncorroborated statement of an unnamed third-party source, as filtered through a reliable informant to a police affiant, did not give rise to probable cause sufficient to support the issuance of a search warrant," and this is true even if the original statement was against the interest of the declarant. See section 2-11, supra.

In Davis v. State, the court pointed out that "attesting officers and magistrates [should] make every effort to see that supporting affidavits reflect the maximum indication of reliability [of informants]."

§ 4-10 Probable cause required for issuance of search warrant—Observation of "informer" not appearing before magistrate

In general terms, anyone who gives an officer information is an informer. However, in the context of probable cause to search, the word often implies a person who is himself, to some extent, involved in unlawful activity. He may be a user of drugs, frequently he has been arrested, perhaps not infrequently he hopes for some special treatment because of his "helping" the police. On some occasions, the information is given because of jealousy, anger or "to get even" with the person "informed on." This is the kind of person whose credibility is discussed in this section.

A troublesome area in the law of search and seizure involves the credibility of information given to the affiant by an unnamed informer. For instance, although Georgia recognizes the validity of the "statement against interest" rule, it does not apply where the informant is unnamed. It is frequently said that the affidavit or sworn testimony before the magistrate must specifically state sufficient facts to show that the unnamed informer is reliable. In Mitchell v. State, the court pointed out that "when the information supplied by the informant is not corroborated, the magistrate must look to see whether the informant himself . . . [is] reliable." In Pitts v. State, the court pointed out that a magistrate, in determining reliability of an informer, may consider (1) the type of information previously supplied, (2) the use to which the information was put, and (3) the lapse of time since the information was furnished.

In Aguilar v. Texas, the United States Supreme Court held that where an affiant relies on information obtained from an informer, the affidavit must (1) state the underlying circumstances showing the informer's credibility, or the reliability of his information, and (2) state the underlying circumstances to support the conclusion that the informer had observed criminal activity. In other words, two essentials must be met: (1) There must be a showing of veracity of the informer and his information—the veracity prong of the two-prong test; and (2) there must be a showing of how or why the informer knew "the narcotics were where he claimed they were"—the basis of knowledge prong of the two-prong test.

The first prong of the Aguilar test, reliability of the informer, has often been established by including a statement in the affidavit that the informer has in the past given information which has led to arrests and convictions. Likewise, a statement that the informer has in the past given accurate information which led to the arrest of a person has been held to be sufficient. Where an informer, alleged to be reliable because of information given on two prior occasions which led to arrests, gave information received from an acquaintance, the Georgia Court of Appeals held the affidavit adequate despite the double hearsay objection.

The second prong of the Aguilar test has been said to require proof to support the informer's conclusion that criminal activity exists. Georgia courts have construed the second prong of the Aguilar test as requiring the affidavit to state how the information was obtained or to describe the criminal activity in such detail so that the magistrate can conclude that the informer's information is more than "a casual rumor circulating in the underworld," or a charge based on an individual's general reputation.

However, all of the foregoing material in this section must be examined in the light of the 1983 United States Supreme Court case of Illinois v. Gates. In Gates an anonymous letter received by police set out rather detailed information about the drug activities of Mr. and Mrs. Gates. Much of the information was corroborated, but there remained important gaps in the tip. The letter and an affidavit setting out what had been corroborated was used in obtaining a search warrant. A search pursuant to the warrant resulted in a discovery of a large amount of contraband. The Supreme Court said "an informant's 'veracity,' 'reliability' and 'basis of knowledge' are all highly relevant in determining the value of his report. . . . [H]owever . . . these elements should [not] be understood as entirely separate and independent requirements to be rigidly exacted in every case. . . . Rather . . . they should be understood simply as closely intertwined issues that may usefully illuminate the common sense, practical question whether there is 'probable cause' to believe that contraband or evidence is located in a particular place. . . . [The] totality of the circumstances approach is far more consistent with our prior treatment of probable cause . . . than is any rigid demand that specific 'tests' be satisfied by every informant's tip. Perhaps the central teaching of our decisions bearing on the probable cause standard is that it is a 'practical, nontechnical conception.' . . . [P]robable cause is a fluid concept—turning on the assessment of probabilities in particular factual contexts—not readily, or even usefully, reduced to a neat set of legal rules . . . [T]he 'two-pronged test' directs analysis into two largely independent channels—the informant's 'veracity' or 'reliability' and his 'basis of knowledge.' There are persuasive arguments against according these two elements such independent status. Instead, they are better understood as relevant considerations in the totality of circumstances analysis that traditionally has guided probable cause determinations; a deficiency in one may be compensated for, in determining the overall reliability of a tip, by a strong showing as to the other, or by some other indicia of reliability. . . . [I]t is wiser to abandon the 'two-pronged test' established by our decisions in Aguilar and Spinelli. . . . In its place we reaffirm the totality of the circumstances analysis. . . ." It is important to recognize that the Court did not completely abandon the Aguilar–Spinelli test in Gates; the two prongs became part of a balancing test that includes the totality of the circumstances.

In State v. Stephens, the Georgia Supreme Court expressly adopted the rule of Illinois v. Gates, supra, stating (1) that "it is, at heart, a rule of subjectivity. One judge's 'probable cause' can be another judge's 'inarticulable suspicion' . . . [and (2)] that Gates be considered as the outer limit of probable cause. Accordingly we urge that arresting officers and magistrates make every effort to see that supporting affidavits reflect the maximum indication of reliability along the lines of Aguilar-Spinelli, whenever and wherever that shall be feasible."

In Clark v. State, the court held that Gates is to be applied retroactively.

In Peacock v. State, the court held that the " 'totality of the circumstances' is a less rigorous test than that of Aguilar and Spinelli . . . [and] an affidavit that would pass the former test must necessarily meet the 'totality of the circumstances' criterion." However, in Langford v. State, the court emphasized that veracity and basis of knowledge are still major concerns and that an affidavit for a search warrant must set forth sufficient facts from which the magistrate can independently determine the reliability of both the information and the informant.

In Caswell v. State, the affidavit, which was the sole basis of the warrant, established the reliability of the informant and adequately stated that "[d]uring the past five (5) days affiant has received information from a reliable confidential informant that Bert Caswell had a quantity of methamphetamines in his residence." However, concerning the informant's basis of knowledge, the appellate court pointed out that "[t]here was no indication in the affidavit as to whether this information came from the informant's personal knowledge so the informant's tip must be relegated to the status of a casual rumor." At the motion to suppress hearing there was additional information concerning the basis of the informant's knowledge other than that set out in the affidavit. However, the appellate court pointed out that this was irrelevant since it was not given to the magistrate at the time of the issuance of the warrant and reversed the trial court's denial of a motion to suppress.

In State v. Goodrich, the court affirmed the grant of a motion to suppress where the affidavit did not sufficiently set out facts from which the magistrate could independently determine the reliability of the information contained in the affidavit and the reliability of the informant.

In VonLinsowe v. State, the court pointed out that "[i]n order for the corroboration [by an officer] to be meaningful enough to show reliability, . . . the information corroborated must include 'a range of details relating not just to easily obtained facts and conditions existing at the time of the tip, but to future actions of third parties ordinarily not easily predicted.' . . . In short, the information corroborated will generally need to be a prediction of future behavior, as in [Gates] or something similar—that is, inside information not available to the general public." However, in Wilson v. State, the court held that this rule relating to a prediction of future behavior "applies to an anonymous telephone tip but not to a tip from a known reliable informant." For instance, in Fiallo v. State, the court held that "[m]erely confirming that the accused lives where the informant said he did is not sufficient corroboration of the information regarding illegal activity."

In Kessler v. State, the court held that it was not necessary for an affidavit to include the fact that the informant was a felon. See section 14-82, infra, on falsity of affidavits for search warrants. However, in Perkins v. State, the court pointed out that "officers seeking warrants should provide the magistrate with any information they have relevant to a CI's reliability or motivation, including criminal records and any payments made." In Robertson v. State, the court reversed the denial of a motion to suppress pointing out that the "officer's failure to inform the magistrate about the informant's criminal background, pending criminal charges and the possible revocation of his probation or parole, and his personal animosity toward . . . [the person whose home was searched] resulted in the magistrate being deprived of the opportunity to independently determine the reliability of the informant." If material information is knowingly or recklessly omitted, "the reviewing court should include it with other information provided the magistrate to determine whether probable cause to issue the warrant existed." "[H]owever, [if] the information directly known by the officers . . . was sufficient to establish probable cause," a reversal is not required.

In Pettus v. State, the court pointed out that "our courts have, on occasion, recognized the affiant's desire to protect the identity of a confidential informant by omitting certain details from the affidavit," such as the exact date drugs were seen on premises.

§ 4-11 Probable cause required for issuance of search warrant—Time

The time of the occurrence of the facts relied upon by the affiant is a prime element in establishing probable cause for the issuance of a search warrant. The magistrate must determine whether the facts presented create a reasonable belief that the same conditions described in the affidavit exist at the time of the presentation of the warrant. However, there has been some relaxation of the requirement of showing that the search warrant is not "stale." Thus, if from all the circumstances set out in the affidavit "there is a fair probability that contraband or evidence of a crime will be found in a particular place," a search warrant may be issued. In Ayers v. State, the court said that "the determination of staleness has been modified so that now that issue is included in the broad overview of 'totality of circumstances.' " As the Court of Appeals observed in State v. Graddy, "[t]he mere passage of time does not equate with staleness."

Where an affidavit contains no information relating to the time of the occurrence, a search warrant may not issue. However, in Scott v. State, the court held that "the absence of the precise time" the informant observed drug transactions is not necessarily fatal. When an affidavit uses the present tense in stating that a person is selling drugs at a specified location, this may sufficiently show that the information is current and not stale. An affidavit signed on a particular day stating that the informer had within five days prior thereto overheard a specified person state she was using cocaine and planned to use it over the upcoming weekend was held to be sufficient as to timeliness.

When an ongoing activity is described, the passage of time as to some of these events is less significant than in the case of a single, isolated transaction.

Generally, officers are permitted to obtain search warrants in advance when there is a probable cause to believe that the thing to be searched for will be at the location described when the search is executed even though the thing to be searched for is not at the location to be searched at the time of the issuance of a warrant.

In United States v. Grubbs, the Supreme Court held that such "anticipatory" warrants are not categorically unconstitutional and that a "triggering condition" is not required on the face of the warrant to satisfy the Fourth Amendment.

In McLarty v. State, a detective obtained a search warrant for drugs at the residence of the defendant but did not execute the warrant until an informant gave the detective confirming information that a person had just left the premises and that drugs were present. The appellate court affirmed the denial of defendant's motion to suppress.

While not directly related to the subject matter of this section, it should be kept in mind that a search warrant is void if not executed within 10 days from the date of issuance.

Generally, see 68 Am. Jur. 2d Searches and Seizures § 70. See also section 4-13, infra.

§ 4-12 Probable cause required for issuance of search warrant—Description of place and person to be searched

In order to allege probable cause, an affidavit must meet two essentials concerning the place and person to be searched: (1) an adequate description of the place or person and (2) facts to establish probable cause that the object sought is located at the described place.

The Fourth Amendment, the Georgia Constitution, and the Code all provide that the place to be searched be particularly described. In addition, according to the Georgia statute, if a warrant is to issue for the search of an individual, the person must be specifically described. The Constitution prohibits the issuance of a general warrant. A search warrant which does not particularly describe the place or person to be searched is considered a general warrant. However, the contents of the affidavit may be considered in determining the description of the place to be searched.

The description of the place to be searched must be sufficient to enable a prudent officer executing the warrant to locate the premises "definitely and with reasonable certainty." It has been pointed out that "[s]earch warrants are not directed at persons; they authorize the search of 'places' and the seizure of 'things,' and as a constitutional matter they need not even name the person from whom the things will be seized." The slight misspelling of the last name of the person occupying the premises will not necessarily render the affidavit and search warrant invalid, and if the property to be searched is clearly described, a search warrant using a completely incorrect first name does not void a search warrant for the premises.

In Maryland v. Garrison, the United States Supreme Court held that whether a mistake as to the place to be searched renders the warrant invalid depends upon the extent to which it was possible for an officer, acting reasonably, to discover a mistake either at the time the warrant was sought or at the time it was executed. Hence, the Georgia Court of Appeals held that a warrant to search a named theater located at "No. 13 West 11th Street" (in a named city) may be used to search a theater of the same name located at "No. 15 West 11th Street" where there is no such theater at the address set out. A search warrant to search lot 14K rather than 15K in a mobile home park was found sufficient where it was difficult to determine what the correct number was. A map was attached and the defendant's car was described and found at the site of the search. However, a warrant to search "283 Rock Springs" cannot be used to search "293 South Rock Springs."

An affidavit describing a room at one of two designated motels without giving a room number is insufficient. In the case of a warrant to search an apartment house, a dormitory, a motel, a duplex or a partitioned house, the warrant, on its face, must indicate more than a street address for the building. Where a two-story dwelling contained several front and back doors and separate mailboxes in front of each door, a warrant to search the entire first floor was held not to be sufficiently particular. However, where a single-family dwelling is rented by one person but occupied by several who pay rent to the lessee and there are no external signs of occupation by several families, a warrant to search the entire house is valid. In Andrews v. State, the court pointed out that where "several persons occupy the premises in common, sharing common living quarters but having separate bedrooms, the courts have held that a single warrant describing the entire premises is valid and justifies the search of the entire premises." Likewise, in Newby v. State, a warrant to search "for the person of defendant and the premises known as 2059 East Drive, Decatur, DeKalb County, Georgia" was held sufficiently definite where the warrant also provided that it was "requested for the above residence where [the defendant] rents a room."

In a town or small city, it may be sufficient to describe a building or home as the residence of a named person on a particular street in a specified county. However, it has been said that if "the name of the owner or occupant is not given, the description of the premises must be exact." Where a house was incorrectly described as being two-storied when it actually was one-storied but otherwise properly designated, the description was held to be sufficient since the officer could locate the building with "reasonable certainty." However, the description of the place to be searched as a named person's house trailer of a certain color located approximately one and one-half miles east of the intersection of two named roads "to a drive turning north to trailer park, said trailer being last on left in pines with a white station wagon sitting in yard" was found to be insufficient where no city or county was alleged. But in Mosier v. State, an affidavit and search warrant were headed "GEORGIA, GWINNETT COUNTY" and described the place to be searched as "6529 Norcross–Tucker Road." The defendant contended that the description was inadequate since the description did not name a county. The court took judicial notice that "Tucker, Georgia" is not an incorporated city, as contended by the defendant, but is merely a community encompassing portions of DeKalb and Gwinnett counties and concluded that the heading was sufficient to enable the officer "to ascertain with reasonable certainty" the place to be searched. See section 4-16 et seq., infra, on execution of search warrants.

A search warrant authorizing the seizure of records may or may not also authorize the seizure of a personal computer which may contain such records. In Grant v. State, the court held that if the warrant did not specify a computer or computer disks as items to be seized, those items could not be seized regardless of whether other permitted items could be found on the computer or computer disks. The court found no legal support for the trial court's decision that practical considerations and time constraints justified the overly extensive search. However, cases in other jurisdictions have held that computers may be seized where a warrant authorizes the seizure of records of certain types of crimes, such as drug-dealing, even though the police have no idea what is actually contained on the computers.

A search warrant for a car need not state the location of the vehicle if the description is sufficiently detailed. A warrant describing the person and place as "John Doe #Blue" and "on or about his person or auto (or truck) in the vicinity of Magnolia and Sunset, vehicle being either a green pickup truck or a blue and white Ford" was held sufficient since the affidavit contained a physical description of the individual.

The person or persons to be searched must also be described with particularity. This may be done by using the person's name or by describing him in some other manner. A warrant which states an alias as the name of a person is not invalid if in fact the individual is using the alias. However, a "John Doe" warrant which contains no description of the person to enable an officer to locate the person with reasonable certainty is void. A search warrant for a specified location and "all persons on the premises" is a general warrant as to a commercial customer in the place at the time of the search.

There is some older authority which holds that if a warrant provides for the search of "any other person on said premises who reasonably might be involved in the commission of the aforesaid violation of the laws of Georgia," this is regarded as sufficient particularity to justify the search of those persons present when the warrant is executed. But the addition of such words in a search warrant does not broaden the authority of an officer to search persons coming to the premises during the search or afterwards beyond the limited terms of O.C.G.A. § 17–5–28, which provides that an officer executing a warrant "may reasonably detain or search any person in the place at the time: (a) To protect himself from attack, or (b) To prevent the disposal or concealment of any instruments, articles or things particularly described in the warrant."

Generally, see 2 LaFave, Search and Seizure 72, § 4.5 (West 1978). See section 4-21, infra, on execution of a search warrant. See Annotation, "Search warrant: sufficiency of description of apartment or room to be searched in multiple-occupancy structure," 11 A. L. R. 3d 1330 (1967).

§ 4-13 Probable cause required for issuance of search warrant—reason for searching place and person

Not only must the place or person be particularly described, but the affidavit must contain sufficient facts to show the magistrate that there is probable cause for believing the object sought is located at the place described. However it has been held that "[a]n officer's inference that items sought will be at the place to be searched requires no more than 'a fair presumption' to be reasonable." It has been held that if a reliable informer has recently observed narcotics in the described premises, a finding of probable cause is justified without alleging facts to demonstrate that the informer knew the substance was a narcotic. However, in State v. Law, the court held that an affidavit for a search warrant "is not insufficient merely because it fails to show how the informant knew that the substance he saw was a narcotic." Nevertheless, it has been held that if stolen goods are seen on the premises, the informer must state sufficient facts to show how he knew the objects were stolen. An affidavit setting out general suspicious circumstances is insufficient. For example, observation of premises for several weeks, seeing known drug users and pushers there, seeing as many as 15 cars at the home at one time and general information that users and pushers hang around the house, do not add up to probable cause.

Frequently, officers may have probable cause to believe that a named person committed a burglary or possesses contraband. Without any additional facts, the cases are in conflict as to whether or not there is probable cause to believe that stolen goods or narcotics are in that individual's home.

Similar issues arise when the object of a search is a personal computer. Due to the ease with which files and data may be deleted over time, establishing probable cause to search these devices may be problematic. However, law enforcement officials now have various forensic tools which enable them to extrapolate data even long after deletion. In Buckley v. State, the court held that because the hard drive on the defendants computer was not perishable, previously obtained information that there were pornographic images on the computer was not stale. Thus, there was probable cause to search the computer.

In McClain v. State, the court pointed out that "[a]n officer's inference that items sought will be at the place to be searched requires no more than 'a fair presumption' to be reasonable."

It has been held that a well-defined path from the defendant's premises to a neighbor's property where marijuana was grown justifies issuing a search warrant for the defendant's home.

See section 4-11, supra, on timeliness of information.

§ 4-14 Probable cause required for issuance of search warrant—Person or thing to be seized

The warrant clause of the Fourth Amendment provides in pertinent part that "no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, . . . particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized." Further defining "persons or things," the Georgia Legislature established that a search warrant may be issued for the following: (1) any things or papers which are designed or intended for use, or have been used, in connection with a crime; (2) any person who has been kidnapped or any human fetus or corpse; (3) stolen or embezzled property; (4) anything which it is unlawful to possess; and (5) anything which is tangible evidence of the commission of a crime except private papers. However, "private papers" which are the instrumentalities of a crime may be seized even though not listed in a search warrant. Deposit slips and checks have been held not to be private papers.

In Sanford v. Texas, Justice Stewart expressed the unanimous view of the Supreme Court in holding that under the federal Constitution, the need to particularly describe the "things to be seized" is "accorded the most scrupulous exactitude when the 'things' are books and the basis for their seizure is the ideas they contain." However, in Hunt v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals concluded that under the Georgia Constitution the requirements of Sanford for "scrupulous exactitude" applied to all search warrants.

The affidavit in support of a search warrant must describe with particularity the person or thing to be seized. In United States v. Cook, it was explained that "[a] general order to explore and rummage through a person's belongings is not permitted. The warrant must enable the searcher to reasonably ascertain and identify the things which are authorized to be seized. . . . Circumstances often make an exact description of the property impossible and in those cases the judicial officer issuing the warrant must weigh the practical necessities of law enforcement against the likelihood of a violation of the personal rights of the one whose premises and possessions are to be searched."

"The use of a generic term or a general description in a warrant, however, is acceptable to the judicial officer issuing the warrant only when a more specific description of the things to be seized is unavailable. Thus, in United States v. Cortellesso, the First Circuit upheld a warrant issued to search for and seize stolen clothing when the 'labels had been removed from the Pierre Cardin suits so that a more precise description would not have assisted the [searcher] and, that with respect to other stolen items, only a generic description was known.' Failure to employ the specificity available will invalidate a general description in a warrant." In United States v. Bright, the Fifth Circuit held that if the police had possessed a complete list of serial numbers of currency being sought, it would have been necessary to give them in the warrant description because "generic classifications in a warrant are acceptable only when a more precise description is not possible."

A description of "one statue of a Cobra Snake and other items that are fruits of the crime of burglary" is too general except as to the cobra statue. However, an affidavit which describes the things to be seized as "[f]ruits of the crime of the theft of a shipment of assorted shipment of clothing; traveral [sic] sport coats, suits, dresses, swimware [sic], handbags, taken 21 July, 1972, Tucker, Ga." has been held sufficient. In describing a pistol, it is not necessary to set out the exact caliber.

In Lo-Ji Sales, Inc. v. New York, the Court held that an open-ended search warrant which authorized the seizure of two films judicially determined to be obscene and the seizure of other items deemed to be obscene was a general warrant and invalid even when the magistrate went along to determine what articles were deemed to be obscene. See section 4-23, infra, on seizure of obscene material. Likewise, in Dobbins v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court concluded that the warrant which described the articles sought as "certain property and/or materials of a pornographic nature, to-wit, movies, pictures, and magazines which are contrary to the laws of Georgia" was a general warrant in violation of the Fourth Amendment. The Dobbins case concluded that the "warrant left the determination of what items were likely to be 'of a pornographic nature' entirely to the discretion of the officers executing the warrant."

However, in the child molestation case of Cooper v. State, the court concluded that a search warrant was valid which directed the seizure of "[a]ny video tape showing males/females involved in sexual intercourse or any sexual act" and "[a]ny magazine that shows nude males/females posing/involved in any sexual act . . ." used in the furtherance of the criminal act charged.

If a search warrant is general in nature, but also particularly describes certain articles to be seized, a motion to suppress based on the general nature of the warrant is valid only as to articles seized which were not particularly described. In other words, the valid portion of the search warrant should be severed from the invalid portion and the seizure pursuant to the valid portion should be sustained by the court at a suppression hearing.

See Annotation, "Sufficiency of Description of Business Records Under Fourth Amendment Requirement of Particularity in Federal Warrant Authorizing Search and Seizure," 53 A. L. R. Fed. 679 (1981). See also section 4-21, infra, on detention and search of person, and section 4-6, supra, on the necessity of having a neutral and detached magistrate.

§ 4-15 Issuance of search warrant

After the magistrate has considered affidavits, written complaints and/or sworn testimony, he must then make an independent determination of whether or not probable cause exists for the issuance of a search warrant. If the magistrate concludes probable cause exists then he should issue a search warrant. The magistrate has no right to issue a warrant to search a place not mentioned in the affidavit. When facts essential to a proper description of the place to be searched are omitted, this deficiency may not be supplied by the knowledge of the officers attempting to execute the warrant. The Georgia Code, surprisingly, does not contain a form for a search warrant, although certain requirements are set out.

The warrant should state the time and date of issuance. However, if the time of the issuance is not mentioned but it is shown that the warrant was issued prior to the search and seizure, the omission will be regarded only as an irregularity and will not void the warrant. The warrant should also command the search of the place described and the seizure of items enumerated.

A search warrant is not invalid where it is captioned "Superior Court of Hall County, Georgia," but is signed by a magistrate. "[T]he change in name of any court previously known as a police court, recorders court, mayors court, etc. 'shall not affect the validity of any action or prosecution.' "

The magistrate is charged with the duty of keeping a docket record of all warrants issued by him. The warrants shall be executed in duplicate and be directed to all peace officers in the state.

It now appears that a search warrant may be amended after it is issued. If, in such a situation, it were possible to amend the warrant, it would seem that it could only be done by the magistrate issuing it, and then only in conformity with the verified evidence on which the warrant was based. However, in Green v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court held that "an amendment to a search warrant may be authorized by a second judicial officer upon a proper showing of probable cause." In State v. Sanders, the court held that where an officer was about to execute a search warrant, but found the defendant to be registered in a different hotel room from the one mentioned in the search warrant, he could call the magistrate on the telephone and get the magistrate's consent to change the room number, make the change in the search warrant and search the room in which the defendant was registered. In Oliver v. State, a search warrant was issued to search "the residence . . . located at 506 Lamar St." The executing officer discovered that the house number was not correct. The next day he returned to the magistrate and orally requested that the number be changed from 506 to 206 on the warrant. Apparently, the number was changed before the search was conducted. The court concluded that the warrant was valid.

§ 4-16 Execution of search warrant—General

"Search warrants are not directed at persons; they authorize the search of 'places' and the seizure of 'things,' and as a constitutional matter they need not even name the person from whom the things will be seized." Thus, a warrant which allows the search of a person and his home does not permit the search of his person at his place of employment.

By statute, a search warrant must be executed within 10 days from the time of its issuance, and any warrant not executed within 10 days will be void. The warrant may be executed at any reasonable time within the 10–day period. When it is executed, the duplicate copy shall be left with the person from whom any articles are seized. It has been held that an officer may make a valid search after exhibiting to the defendant a photocopy of a search warrant rather than the original. Indeed, provided the officer executing the warrant properly informs the resident of the premises sought to be searched of the warrant's existence and if the search does not exceed the scope of the search authorized, the warrant need not be in the physical possession of the officer conducting the search provided it was issued based upon probable cause prior to the commencement of the search.

When necessary, reasonable force may be used to obtain entrance in order to execute a search warrant. The Georgia Code requires that a good-faith attempt be made to give verbal notice of the authority and purpose of the officers before force is used, and in the absence of such notice there is generally no right to enter a place to be searched. However, it has been held that the failure to give advance notice may be excused if such procedure would increase the officers' peril or lead to the destruction of evidence. See Annotation, "Sufficiency of showing of reasonable belief of danger to officers or others excusing compliance with 'knock and announce' requirement—state criminal cases," 17 A. L. R. 4th 301 (1982).

The same code section provides that after proper notice, or an attempt in good faith to give such notice, "necessary and reasonable force may be used to effect an entry."

§ 4-17 Who may search?

An officer has a right to apply for a search warrant. An officer having knowledge of exigent circumstances or a search warrant may conduct a search. Officers arriving after the original entry may take part in the search; however, "the later officials must confine their intrusion to the scope of the original invasion unless a warrant or one of the exceptions to the warrant requirement justifies a more thorough or wide ranging search."

§ 4-18 Execution of search warrant—Knock and announce

In the 1995 United States Supreme Court case of Wilson v. Arkansas, the Court unanimously held the "common-law 'knock-and-announce' principle forms a part of the reasonableness inquiry under the Fourth Amendment" in a search of a home. However, the Court stated that this was not a "rigid rule" and gave examples when the rule would be excused: (1) cases involving the safety of the officer, (2) cases where a felon has escaped and "retreats to his dwelling," and (3) cases where there is a risk of the destruction of evidence if advance notice is given. Then the Court pointed out that it "need not attempt a comprehensive catalog of the relevant countervailing factors here. For now, we leave to the lower courts the task of determining the circumstances under which an unannounced entry is reasonable under the Fourth Amendment."

In Richards v. Wisconsin, the United States Supreme Court rejected the blanket exception to the knock-and-announce requirement for felony drug investigations. The court recognized that even though threats of violence and the possibility of destruction of evidence are frequently present in felony drug investigations, these facts do not dispense with the need for a case-by-case evaluation of the manner in which the search is executed. A "no-knock" entry will be justified if the police have a reasonable suspicion that under the circumstances it would be dangerous, futile or it would inhibit a criminal investigation, such as allowing the destruction of evidence, to knock and announce their presence. "This standard . . . strikes the appropriate balance between the legitimate law enforcement concerns . . . and the individual privacy interests affected by no-knock entries."

In United States v. Jones, the court affirmed the trial judge in denying a motion to suppress where there had been a "wait" of 15 to 20 seconds between the "knock and announcement" and the time the officers entered an apartment of a suspected drug trafficker, over an objection of the defendant that he was not given time to respond. Similarly, in United States v. Banks, the United States Supreme Court held that it was reasonable for the officers to suspect imminent loss of evidence in a drug trafficking case after 15 to 20 seconds without a response based on the facts known to the officers at that time. In United States v. Ramirez, the Supreme Court held that the Fourth Amendment does not require "officers to [have] a higher standard . . . when a 'no-knock' entry results in the destruction of property" than when no property is damaged.

One Georgia case has specifically approved the issuance of a search warrant containing a "no-knock" provision where the facts set out in the affidavit demonstrated the potential of danger to the officer and destruction of evidence. Even without a "no-knock" provision in a search warrant, where officers knock, identify themselves, and receive no response, after a reasonable time they may use reasonable force to gain entrance. In Swan v. State, the Court of Appeals approved as reasonable a three to five second interval between the knock/announcement and the entry into the home. The Court found that the interval was sufficient in light of explicit judicial recognition that firearms are common to the drug trade. In Georgia it seems that even if there is no "no-knock" provision and even if the officers did not "knock and announce," the execution of a search warrant is still not illegal if exigent circumstances are found to exist, such as danger to the officers or destruction of evidence. In Adams v. State, the court held that even where a "no-knock" provision was erroneously included by the magistrate, this did not invalidate a search where the officers entered in a good faith belief that they were so authorized because of the peril created by the presence of a dangerous dog.

Violation of the knock-and-announce requirement does not necessitate application of the exclusionary rule. In Hudson v. Michigan the Supreme Court declined to suppress evidence obtained following a failure to knock-and-announce where the police had the ability to execute a previously obtained search warrant. The court went on to explain in dicta that, even if the failure to knock-and-announce is the "but-for" cause of discovery of the evidence sought to be excluded, such evidence may still be admitted where the causation is attenuated or where the deterrence benefits of suppression are outweighed by "substantial social costs." Attenuation occurs when the causal connection is remote, or when, "given a direct causal connection, the interest protected by the constitutional guarantee that has been violated would not be served by suppression of the evidence obtained." Because the knock-and-announce rule does not protect "one's interest in preventing the government from seeing or taking evidence described in a warrant," the Hudson court found that the presence of "but-for" causation would not have affected its ruling. See Annotation, "What constitutes compliance with knock-and-announce rule in search of private premises—state cases," 85 A. L. R. 5th 1 (2001) and 70 A. L. R. 3d 217 (1976).

§ 4-19 Execution of search warrant—Area to be searched—Curtilage

Officers may search the premises which are located at the place described in the search warrant. The right to search also includes the curtilage around a home. The right to search the curtilage of a dwelling includes the right to search "the yards and grounds of a particular address, its gardens, barns [and] buildings," as well as vehicles within the curtilage, but it does not include the right to search beyond the property lines of the dwelling specified in the warrant. In Albert v. State, the court referred to a service station as having a curtilage and approved of a search of a car at the station which was owned by a third person since the vehicle was deemed to be connected with the premises. But in State v. Crank, the court held that a search warrant for the defendant's home and vehicles located there did not authorize the following of the defendant's car for miles, then stopping and searching it. See section 4-2, supra, and section 4-42, infra.

In Barton v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals stated that the word "premises" in a search warrant authorized the search of the home and a shed about 20 feet behind the house. The court stated that "premises" refers to the "entire living area used by its occupant. Living area may be otherwise expressed as the 'curtilage.' The word 'curtilage' includes yards and grounds of a particular address together with the gardens, barn and buildings thereon. . . . The principle of curtilage comes to us from the common law and traditionally has included outbuildings, which may be searched as part of the 'premises' though not specifically described so long as permission has been obtained to search the 'premises.' "

In Payton v. State, the court stated, "Whether the place searched is within the curtilage is to be determined from the facts, including its proximity or annexation to the dwelling, its inclusion within the general enclosure surrounding the dwelling, and its use and enjoyment as an adjunct to the domestic economy of the family."

In Bunn v. State, the court held that a resident of an apartment has a reasonable expectation of privacy in the curtilage around his apartment. However, in Bayshore v. State, the court concluded that the curtilage concept does not apply to a common area such as a parking area for use of occupants of apartments. See sections 4-2, supra, and 4-42, infra, on curtilage.

In Espinoza v. State, a search warrant was issued for "251–B Dickson Road." Officers searched both 251–B and 251–A, as well as the "stethoscope shaped" driveway, a part of which served both units. 251–A is on the left side of the duplex. Drugs were found in bushes several feet to the left of the 251–A driveway, outside the stethoscope. The resident of 251–A was indicted. The Georgia Court of Appeals found that the drugs were "not found within the curtilage shared by both apartments." Subsequently, the Georgia Supreme Court "granted the writ of certiorari to consider whether the Court of Appeals properly applied the concept of curtilage." The court explicitly stated, "We disapprove of the term 'common area curtilage,' on which the Court of Appeals relied." The court reversed on the ground that "police officers discovered the evidence within the curtilage of the defendant's apartment for which they did not have a search warrant." The court reasoned that "[t]he resident of 251–B would have no reasonable expectation of privacy in a portion of the yard that was not directly connected to that unit, its driveway, or its side of the duplex." The court affirmed the trial court's grant of a motion to suppress because the resident of 251–A "was the only resident who had a reasonable expectation of privacy in the yard outside the driveway leading to his unit." See Annotation, "Search and Seizure: Reasonable Expectation of Privacy in Driveways," 60 A. L. R. 5th 1 (1998).

Nevertheless, in Maryland v. Garrison, a description in a search warrant turned out to be ambiguous when the officers, acting in good faith, learned at the time of the execution of the warrant that there was a distinction between McWebb's apartment for which they had a search warrant, and the third floor of the building in that there were two apartments on that floor. Before the officers realized they were in the defendant's apartment rather than McWebb's apartment, they discovered contraband. The United States Supreme Court held that "a good-faith mistaken belief on the part of officers that the area being searched is within the scope of the warrant that is being executed does not mandate suppression." See section 4-12, supra, on description of place to be searched.

However, it must be remembered that while a search, justified by a search warrant, may not be extended beyond the dwelling described and its curtilage, no warrant is required to search an area beyond the curtilage of a house since no constitutional protection extends "to open fields, orchards, or other lands not an immediate part of the dwelling site." See section 4-42, infra.

§ 4-20 Execution of search warrant—Purpose of search

In 1999, the United States Supreme Court held in Wilson v. Layne that it is a Fourth Amendment violation to permit news media to enter a suspect's home to witness a search or arrest when their presence "was not in aid of the execution of the warrant."

In Massachusetts v. Sheppard, the United States Supreme Court considered a case in which a magistrate used an improper form when he intended to issue a search warrant. The warrant was issued by a magistrate at his home on Sunday. The officer had taken a form search warrant to the magistrate which was used in drug cases. The officer told the magistrate about this and the judge assured the officer he had made the necessary changes so that a search could be conducted for evidence related to a homicide. Actually, the warrant, as issued, provided only for a search for controlled substances. Without knowledge of the actual contents of the warrant, the officer searched and found evidence of the homicide. The court held that the exclusionary rule did not apply where the "officers reasonably believed that the search they conducted was authorized by a valid warrant." The court noted that the purpose of the exclusionary rule is to deter police misconduct. Because the defect of this warrant was caused by the judge's error, excluding the results of the search would not serve the goal of the exception. But see section 2-26, supra.

In general terms, an officer may search anywhere within the permissible area in which the object or objects of the search may be located, but not in an area in which the object of the search could not be located. Thus, an officer has no right to search desk drawers in search of a stolen television.

While officers may search in every place in which the object of the search warrant may be located, such officers must be careful to avoid unnecessary damage to the premises and personal property located therein.

In Bradley v. State, the court held that officers were entitled to search a camera bag of a resident of a house being searched even though the defendant was not named in the search warrant.

After a search of the designated area, an officer may apply for and obtain a second search warrant if probable cause is shown.

Generally, see section 4-14, supra, on person or thing to be seized and section 4-57, infra, on second search. See section 2-26, supra, on the application of the exclusionary rule where the officer acts in good faith pursuant to a warrant.

§ 4-21 Execution of search warrant—Detention and search of person present

O.C.G.A § 17–5–28 provides that an officer in the execution of a search warrant may reasonably detain or search any person in the place at the time (a) to protect himself from attack or (b) to prevent the disposal or concealment of any instruments, articles, or things particularly described in the warrant. Officers may not broaden their power to search persons beyond the provisions of this Code section.

This Code section has been said to describe the maximum extent, consistent with the Constitution, to which officers may go in seizing persons not described in the search warrant. In State v. Holmes, the court pointed out that, in connection with the first statutory requirement, "the officer must be able to articulate specific facts that would support a reasonable belief or suspicion that the person to be searched was armed and dangerous."

In Collins v. State, the court held that the inclusion "in a search warrant of 'other persons' on the premises being searched" does not automatically convert an otherwise valid warrant into a general warrant. However, a warrant authorizing the search of places and persons for drugs in all automobiles located on a certain premises was found to be a general warrant and unconstitutional.

In State v. Hawkins, the court pointed out that in order to search a person under subsection (b) of the statute, "there must be a nexus between what the officers are authorized to search for[,] . . . the nature of the evidence sought, the environment in which the search is authorized, and the person searched." Where there was probable cause to believe those coming to a certain residence were carrying lottery tickets, the search of such individuals was held lawful despite the lack of express authorization by the warrant. In the absence of such probable cause, a third party entering premises which are being searched may not himself be searched where he has no opportunity to conceal any of the items described in the search warrant. In State v. Anderson, the court held that in the absence of "independent probable cause," a person present at the time of the search but not named in the warrant may be searched only (1) to protect the officer from attack or (2) to prevent disposal or concealment of contraband described in the warrant.

Searches of persons not named in a search warrant but found on the premises to be searched are illegal without an independent justification for a private search. If an officer has an articulable reasonable suspicion to think that a person on the premises is armed, he has a right to "pat-down" the person for weapons. In McGugan v. State, officers had obtained a search warrant to search a named individual and his residence for evidence relating to the sale of cocaine. A deputy remained outside to "secure the scene." The deputy saw the defendant drive by and then back into the driveway. The deputy approached the defendant's vehicle, identified himself, informed the defendant that a search was in progress and asked the defendant to step out of his vehicle. The defendant became nervous, looked around and did not get out. The deputy opened the door of the defendant's car and instructed the defendant for the third time to step outside. The defendant complied, but tried to pull away. The deputy frisked the defendant for weapons. The appellate court affirmed the trial court's finding that the frisk was justified by the officer's reasonable belief that the frisk was necessary to protect himself.

If an officer has probable cause to think that a person who is present is attempting to conceal the substance described in the warrant, he may arrest the person and have him empty his pockets. In Travis v. State, the court held that the defendant's presence at the time the search warrant for drugs was executed, coupled with his flight, provided probable cause to believe he had possession of contraband. Hence, his arrest was valid and a search conducted incident to the arrest was valid. On searches of persons present who are in some way described in the search warrant, see section 4-12, supra.

In Ybarra v. Illinois, the United States Supreme Court held that, where an officer is executing a warrant for the search of a bar and a certain named individual for narcotics and related items, a weapon frisk or a pat-down of Ybarra was not justified where the officer had no reasonable belief that he was armed and dangerous. The court also pointed out that a Terry frisk does not permit a search for anything other than weapons. In retrospect the Court said the search "was invalid because the police had no reason to believe . . . [Ybarra] had any special connection with the premises, and the police had no other basis for suspecting that he was armed or in possession of contraband."

In State v. Varner, the court affirmed the trial court in suppressing cocaine found in the defendant's pocket. When the search warrant was executed the defendant was present, but there was no evidence that he lived in the house. The officers handcuffed the people present. The officer asked the defendant if he had any drugs; he did not respond and simply looked at the ground. The officer asked the defendant for consent to search him; defendant again looked down and said nothing. "When the officer patted [the] defendant down, he felt what he stated was not a weapon but what he believed to be contraband in [the] defendant's front pocket." The agent reached into the defendant's pocket and retrieved a baggie containing what appeared to be crack cocaine. The officer could not articulate particular facts from which it would be reasonable to infer that the defendant was armed and dangerous.

However, in Michigan v. Summers, the United States Supreme Court considered an incident involving the execution of a warrant to search a house for narcotics. As the officers approached the house they met the defendant, who was leaving. They requested his assistance in gaining entrance to the house and then detained him until they had searched the premises. After learning that the defendant owned the house and after having discovered narcotics in the house, the defendant was arrested and searched. In his coat pocket heroin was found. The court said that if there is probable cause to search a citizen's residence for contraband "it is constitutionally reasonable to require that citizen to remain while officers of the law execute a valid warrant to search his home." In the 2001 case of Illinois v. McArthur, the United States Supreme Court held that where officers had probable cause to believe that the defendant had hidden contraband in his home, they could prevent the defendant from entering his home unaccompanied by an officer for about two hours while officers obtained a search warrant. However, in State v. Mallard, the Georgia Court of Appeals affirmed the trial court in granting a motion to suppress where the defendant was found to have possession of marijuana when he was stopped by an officer shortly after leaving a residence on which a warrant to search the house for marijuana was about to be executed. The officer stopped the defendant in order to determine if the owner of the house was in the car, and, after quickly determining that the owner of the house was not present and checking the defendant's driver's license, the officer asked the defendant if he had any marijuana. The defendant produced a baggy of marijuana. The officer had no information implicating the defendant of wrongdoing.

In State v. Crank, however, the Georgia Court of Appeals intimated that Summers may not justify following a defendant in a car for miles and then stopping him and forcing him to return to his house.

A person's suitcase or purse which he carries has been held to be included in his personal immunity from search so long as it is evident that it belongs to the owner. In Hayes v. State, police officers obtained a warrant to search "the person of . . . and the premises known as: the residence of Mark, being [a particularly described apartment]" for marijuana. The officers entered the apartment and found the defendant sleeping on the couch.

The defendant's suitcase was next to the couch. His name, "Daniel Hayes," was on the outside of the suitcase and the officer testified that immediately upon opening it he found an airline ticket issued in the defendant's name. The officer continued to search the suitcase and found a quantity of illegal drugs. The Georgia Court of Appeals held that because the officer had notice that the defendant was not the person specified in the warrant, and there was no independent justification for his arrest and subsequent search of his suitcase, the trial judge should have granted the defendant's motion to suppress. The same rule applies to a purse of a visitor which is near the visitor and evidently is owned by her. However, if a woman is in a house which is searched pursuant to a search warrant, and her pocketbook is on a bed in another room, it has been held that her purse may be searched even when there is no right to search her person. However, an officer's "investigation based on other similar and related incidents which, when studied as parts of a scheme or design, would lead the reasonable mind to light upon the particular suspect, comprises good probable cause."

In Wright v. State, the court pointed out that when there is no notice of ownership of personal property, "the police are entitled to assume that all objects within the premises [are] lawfully subject to [a] search" as a part of the premises to be searched under a warrant. "Whether the police . . . [knew or should have known] that an object belonged to a visitor must be determined by the trial court on the facts of each case; and the trial court's determination will be upheld if there is any evidence to support it . . . ."

See Annotation, "Sufficiency of description in warrant of person to be searched," 43 A. L. R. 5th 1 (1996). See section 4-7 et seq., supra, on probable cause to issue a search warrant for a person or thing to be seized. See sections 4-26 and 4-27, infra, on searches incident to a lawful arrest. Also see sections 4-22 and 4-27, infra, on protective sweeps. In addition, see section 4-22, infra, on search of personal items in premises searched. See Annotation, "Propriety of Search of Nonoccupant Visitor's Belongings Pursuant to Warrant Issued for Another's Premises," 51 A. L. R. 5th 375 (1997).

§ 4-22 Execution of search warrant—Property which may be seized—General

Generally, the Fourth Amendment permits law enforcement officers executing a search warrant to seize only those persons or items "particularly" described in the warrant. The fact that the officers make the decision as to what objects are listed in the warrant, and therefore subject to seizure, does not alone invalidate the warrant. In Reaves v. State, the court observed that while "a warrant cannot leave the determination of what articles fall within its description and are to be seized entirely to the judgment and opinion of the officer executing the warrant, the degree of specificity in the description is flexible and will vary with the circumstances involved." Thus, where the warrant identifies specified items of potential evidence, "residual clauses" such as "other items related to the crime of murder" or "evidence of child molestation and sexual exploitation of children" have been deemed sufficient to pass muster under the Fourth Amendment. However, in Groh v. Ramirez, the Supreme Court held that a warrant was facially invalid for "provid[ing] no description of the type of evidence sought," even though the application for the warrant adequately described the things to be seized. The court declined to allow the description contained in the application to be incorporated by reference into the actual warrant because the officer failed to leave a copy of the application at the premises to be searched. The court concluded that the search was unreasonable because the person whose premises were the subject of the search would have no way of ascertaining the proper subject and scope of the warrant. In Battle v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals adopted Groh. The court noted that the "apparently widespread custom of preparing warrants which describe the place to be searched only by reference to the probable cause affidavit is not the better practice and should not be encouraged by judges who approve search warrants." The court concluded that a warrant which refers to another documents, e.g., the application, for a description of the premises to be searched and the things to be seized is invalid unless the other document is delivered and left at the subject premises.

Although the Fourth Amendment prevents officers from entering people's homes to conduct exploratory searches for evidence, both the search incident to a lawful arrest and plain view doctrines are used to justify seizure of property not listed in the search warrant if the discovery "resulted from a bona fide search for the items named in the warrant." Thus, an officer conducting a lawful search is not prevented "from seizing tangible evidence of the commission of a crime" if he has probable cause to believe it is such, despite the fact that it was not listed on the warrant.

If in the course of the execution of a search warrant, an officer obtains probable cause to arrest an individual found in the premises searched, the officer as an incident to the lawful arrest may search the individual and the area within his reach, lunge, or grab, and articles found are admissible not pursuant to the search warrant but pursuant to a search incident to a lawful arrest. Once a valid search warrant gets an officer into premises which he has a right to search, he does not have to close his eyes to obvious contraband which he sees in plain view while validly executing a search warrant for other articles.

From a federal constitutional standpoint, subject to some limitations hereinafter set out, and regardless of what objects are named in the search warrant, the following articles are also subject to seizure: (1) contraband, (2) stolen property, and (3) evidence of the commission of a crime.

An officer executing a valid warrant has a right to search any area in which the object sought might be located. However, he has no right to look where the object could not be located. Nevertheless, once the officer knows he has found what the search warrant directs him to seize, the search must stop.

The "plain view" doctrine "may not be used to extend a general exploratory search from one object to another until something incriminating at last emerges." However, when an officer is executing a warrant he may also seize not only what is described in the warrant, but also contraband, stolen property, or evidence of a crime in "plain view." See section § 4-41, infra.

Even when officers have received a consent to search for narcotics, they have no right to rummage through the premises and read through the defendant's papers in search of anything indicating that the defendant was engaged in illegal activity.

However, it has been held that a warrant sufficiently identifies items of a specific crime where a more precise description was not possible under the circumstances. In United States v. Ladd, the court upheld a warrant to seize all property relating to "smuggling, packing, distribution, and use of controlled substances."

In a case where a search warrant is issued to search a specified automobile for "tools and instrumentalities of the crime of burglary," the officers were found to be authorized in seizing and searching a small black leather bag found strapped under the hood of the car. In Furfano v. State, a search warrant was issued authorizing the search of a car for a "handgun, projectiles, blood, fingerprints, [and] other evidence pertaining to the crime of aggravated assault." A 35–millimeter film canister was among the items seized. The officer said it could have contained bullets or film which could have contained fingerprints. The court affirmed the denial of the motion to suppress.

In Felker v. State, a search warrant was issued in a rape case for hair and fibers; however, the court approved the seizure of lewd drawings.

In Hale v. State, the warrant authorized the seizure of "property or things consisting of evidence which tends to show that a crime has been committed or that a particular person has committed a crime." A two-page, handwritten letter to the defendant's wife was seized and the defendant was charged with forgery. The appellate court upheld the seizure of the letter which was used by a handwriting expert for comparison purposes.

Generally, the illegal seizure of items not authorized by the warrant or the plain view doctrine does not require the suppression of all articles, but only the suppression of those illegally seized. Nevertheless, if the officers' unlawful seizure of other materials led to the discovery of other evidence, this derivative evidence is not admissible. See section § 2-25, supra, on "fruits of the poisonous tree."

In Lockhart v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals considered a case in which the officer alleged that an informer reported that the defendant was selling untax-paid whiskey and marijuana. The warrant obtained provided only for a search for untax-paid whiskey. When the officers went to execute the warrant, they took a "narcotics dog." No whiskey was found but marijuana was located by the dog. The appellate court reversed the trial judge's denial of the motion to suppress for three reasons: (1) the warrant did not particularly describe the thing to be seized; (2) the execution of a search "warrant may not exceed in scope the particular article or things to be seized"; and (3) in order "for the 'plain view' exception to the warrant requirement to be invoked, the sighting of the contraband not specified in the warrant must have been 'inadvertent.' "See section 4-2, supra, on curtilage.

In United States v. Fitzgerald, the court held a seizure of a pistol valid under the plain view doctrine even though some portions of the warrant did not sufficiently describe some of the items to be seized. The court said that it recognized that "police might be tempted to frame warrants in general terms, adding a few specific clauses in the hope that under the protection of those clauses they could engage in a general rummaging . . . and then contend that any incriminating evidence they recovered was found in plain view. . . . We believe, however, that careful administration of the rule will afford full protection to individual rights. First, magistrates must exercise vigilance to detect pretext and bad faith on the part of law enforcement officials. Second, courts should rigorously apply the exclusionary rule to evidence seized pursuant to the invalid portions of the warrant. Third, items not described in the sufficiently particular portions of the warrant will not be admissible unless it appears that (a) the police found the item in a place where one would reasonably have expected them to look in the process of searching for the objects described in the sufficiently particular portions of the warrant, (b) the police found the item before they found all the objects described in the sufficiently particular portions of the warrant (that is, before their lawful authority to search expired), and (c) the other requirements of the plain view rule—inadvertent discovery and probable cause to associate the item with criminal activity—are met."

In Teems v. State, while officers were executing a search warrant for drugs, the phone rang. It was answered by an officer. The caller asked for Ronald. The defendant was named Ronald, but the defendant was not present at the time. The officer replied that he was "Ronald." The caller said he "needed 300 Rubies and a quarter-of-a-pound of pot." The court held that the conversation was admissible.

Both the Eleventh Circuit and California have concluded that under the good faith exception of searches conducted pursuant to warrants, the particularity requirement for items to be seized has been relaxed to some extent insofar as the exclusionary rule is concerned. See section 2-26, supra, for the general application of the exclusionary rule where an officer conducts a search in good faith pursuant to a warrant.

See section 4-27, infra, on protective sweeps. See section 4-21, supra, on what property may be seized and searched pursuant to a search warrant. See Annotation, "Seizure of Books, Documents or Other Papers Under Search Warrant Not Describing Such Items," 54 A. L. R. 4th 391 (1987). See Annotation, "Validity of Search or Seizure of Computer, Computer Disk or Computer Peripheral Equipment," 84 A. L. R. 5th 1 (2000).

§ 4-23 Execution of search warrant—Property which may be seized—Obscene material

Because of First Amendment protection, it has been held that an officer has no authority to indiscriminately seize what he considers to be obscene publications without a prior judicial determination as to whether the material is, in fact, obscene. However, where an officer knows that a magistrate has determined that a certain issue of a certain magazine is probably obscene, he may seize a copy of the same issue of the same magazine from a store. Also, in Simpson v. State, the court held that sexual paraphernalia prohibited by O.C.G.A. § 16–12–80(b), which without doubt are designed primarily for the stimulation of genital organs and which are in plain view, may be confiscated.

In New York v. P. J. Video, Inc., the United States Supreme Court pointed out that there is a distinction between seizing films to destroy them and the seizing of a single copy of a film for the bona fide purpose of preserving it as evidence in a criminal case. The court then held that no greater probable cause showing is necessary in the case of seizure of materials presumptively protected by the First Amendment than in other contexts. In order to establish probable cause to seize a copy of a film it is not necessary for the magistrate to actually view the film. It is sufficient if an officer has seen the film and he adequately describes the obscene nature of the film.

In N & N, Inc. v. Veline, the Georgia Supreme Court considered the seizure, pursuant to a warrant, of 42 eight-millimeter projectors. The Georgia case cited Heller v. New York and summarized its holding as follows: "[T]he Constitution does not require an adversary hearing on the issue of probable obscenity prior to the issuance of a warrant for the seizure of a film to be used as evidence where the issuing judge has viewed the film and found it to be obscene . . . . 'If such a seizure (for use as evidence) is pursuant to a warrant, issued after a determination of probable cause by a neutral magistrate, and, following the seizure, a prompt judicial determination of the obscenity issue in an adversary proceeding is available at the request of an interested party, the seizure is constitutionally permissible.' "

The Veline decision then remanded the case for an adversary hearing since it was obvious that N & N, Inc., wanted such a hearing. "In such a hearing evidence should be presented to allow the trial court to determine: (1) If the seizure was pursuant to a warrant (2) issued after a determination of probable cause (3) by a neutral magistrate; (4) that the projectors were used to show obscene films; and (5) the seizure was for the bona fide purpose to preserve the projectors as evidence, and (6) not to block distribution or exhibition of the films."

See section § 4-38 et seq., infra, on plain view. See section 4-14, supra, on description of obscene materials to be seized. See section 10-2, infra, on forfeitures.

§ 4-24 Return by officer

After the search has been completed, it is the duty of the officer to file a verified list of the items seized with the magistrate named in the warrant, or before a court having jurisdiction. However, failure to swear to the inventory will not invalidate the search and items seized and not listed on an inventory are not rendered inadmissible for this reason. By Georgia statute, on demand, the individual whose person or premises were searched shall be entitled to a copy of the inventory. However, such request should be made to the magistrate issuing the warrant and not to the trial judge or the district attorney.

A search pursuant to a warrant issued by a state court judge of one county for a search in that county is not invalidated by reason of the return being filed in that state court when the defendant is being tried for a felony in another county.

§ 4-25 Warrantless searches—General

There is a constitutional preference for searches pursuant to a warrant rather than without one. Under the Fourth Amendment, "a governmental search and seizure should represent both the efforts of the officer to gather evidence of wrongful acts and the judgment of the magistrate that the collected evidence is sufficient to justify invasion of a citizen's private premises. . . ."

Searches conducted without prior approval by a judge or magistrate are per se unreasonable subject only to a few "specifically established and well-delineated exceptions." In other words, "a search conducted pursuant to a search warrant, regular and proper on its face, is presumed to be valid and the burden is on the person who moves to suppress the items found to show that the search warrant was invalid." Thus, in cases which are close or marginal on the question of probable cause, if there is a warrant, the court should largely find there was probable cause, but if there is no warrant in such a case the court should find that there is an absence of probable cause. The preference for a warrant is also demonstrated by the fact that the exclusionary rule does not apply where officers demonstrate an objective reasonable reliance on a warrant later found not to be supported by probable cause.

In general terms, it has been said that in order to justify a warrantless search two essentials must exist: (1) It must be established that the circumstances at the time of the search were sufficient to require immediate action which necessitated not complying with the restrictions of the warrant requirement of the Fourth Amendment. (2) Also, and of equal importance, the manner and scope of the search which was conducted must be reasonably related to the justification of the search. In Mincey v. Arizona, the United States Supreme Court said that "the mere fact that law enforcement may be made more efficient can never by itself justify disregard of the Fourth Amendment. . . . The investigation of crime would always be simplified if warrants were unnecessary. But the Fourth Amendment reflects the views of those who wrote the Bill of Rights that the privacy of a person's home and property may not be totally sacrificed in the name of maximum simplicity in enforcement of the criminal law. . . . For this reason, warrants are generally required to search a person's home or his person unless 'the exigencies of the situation' make the needs of law enforcement so compelling that the warrantless search is objectively reasonable under the Fourth Amendment." In the 1999 case of Flippo v. West Virginia, the United States Supreme Court again "rejected the contention that there is a 'murder scene exception' to the Warrant Clause of the Fourth Amendment." However, if officers "reasonably believe a person is in need of immediate aid," they may make a prompt warrantless search of the murder scene.

In United States v. Ross, the Supreme Court held that a warrantless search which is authorized by an exception to the warrant requirement "is no broader and no narrower than a magistrate could legitimately authorize by warrant."

Exceptions to the warrant requirement may arise in the situations which are hereinafter listed. Also, the list includes a reference to the material contained in this book which relates to each of these exceptions.

(1) Search incident to a lawful arrest (§§ 4-26 and 4-27, infra).

(2) Valid stop-and-frisk (§ 4-28, infra, Chapter 3, supra).

(3) Where exigent circumstances exist (§ 4-29, infra).

(4) Where an officer is in hot pursuit (§ 4-30, infra).

(5) Where there is valid consent (§§ 4-31 through 4-33, infra).

(6) Airport searches (§ 4-34, infra).

(7) Courthouses and public buildings (§ 4-35, infra).

(8) Places of recreation and entertainment (§ 4-36, infra).

(9) Searches of abandoned property (§ 4-37, infra).

(10) Property in plain view (§ 4-39, infra).

(11) Property in open fields (§ 4-42, infra).

(12) Searches of probationers and inmates (§ 4-43, infra).

(13) Border searches (§ 4-44, infra).

(14) Administrative searches (§ 4-45, infra).

(15) Vehicle searches (§§ 4-46 through 4-55, infra).

The Fourth Amendment does not actually apply to "border searches." Also, some of the other situations are not true exceptions since the interest involved is not actually protected by the Fourth Amendment. Moreover, it has been said that some of the other exceptions to the warrant requirement listed above are actually not "true exceptions" in that the Fourth Amendment only prevents "unreasonable" searches and seizures and the so-called "exceptions," when they apply, are regarded as being reasonable.

§ 4-26 Warrantless searches—Incident to lawful arrest—Person

More than 50 years ago, Justice Cardozo wrote, "The peace officer empowered to arrest must be empowered to disarm. If he may disarm, he may search, lest a weapon be concealed." In Washington v. Chrisman, the United States Supreme Court said, "The absence of an affirmative indication that an arrested person might have a weapon available or might attempt to escape does not diminish the arresting officer's authority to maintain custody over the arrested person. . . . Every arrest must be presumed to present a risk of danger to the arresting officer." After an arrest, the officer has a right to remain literally at the defendant's elbow; and if the officer sees contraband while he is with or near the defendant, he may seize it.

In Preston v. United States, a unanimous Court held, "Unquestionably, when a person is lawfully arrested, the police have the right, without a search warrant, to make a contemporaneous search of the person of the accused for weapons or for the fruits of or implements used to commit the crime." In Wade v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals stated that the motivation of a search pursuant to an arrest is irrelevant.

A search incident to an arrest will not be valid unless the arrest itself is lawful. In Brock v. State, the court held that an officer is not prevented from making an arrest for a traffic violation even though the officer is authorized to simply issue a traffic citation. The arrest may not be made as a pretext for conducting a search, and it will not be validated by what is found in the search. When the validity of an arrest is challenged, the burden is on the state to prove its legality. The arrest must generally precede the search or be substantially contemporaneous with the search. Where a search is incident to an arrest, the search is limited to the defendant and the area within his immediate control. Contraband or other fruits or instrumentalities of a crime may be seized in connection with the search. In Lopez v. State, a defendant's cell phone was confiscated at the time of his arrest and later examined for stored phone numbers of co-defendants involved in a drug trafficking scheme. The Court of Appeals did not disturb the trial court's order denying the motion to suppress because it was narrowly tailored to the circumstances of the case.

In the interesting case of Sprinkles v. State, the court pointed out that "[f]light after a lawful command to halt constitutes obstruction of an officer" and justifies an arrest for obstruction and the defendant may be searched as an incident of the arrest. However, the command to stop must be lawful. See sections 2-2 and 3-1, supra, on lawful stops.

The United States Supreme Court has held that the right to search incident to a valid arrest is an exception to the warrant requirement of the Fourth Amendment. "This general exception has historically been formulated into two distinct propositions. The first is that a search may be made of the person of the arrestee. . . . The second is that a search may be made of the area within the control of the arrestee." The remainder of this section is devoted to what is considered a search of the person.

If there is a valid custodial arrest, the officer may make a full search of the person. The extent of a search incident to a lawful arrest is not limited to a frisk, which has been discussed in Chapter 3, supra. In Gustafson v. Florida, the United States Supreme Court held that an officer "was entitled to make a full search" of Gustafson's person, incident to a lawful arrest for driving without a license. The court pointed out that where a defendant is arrested for driving without a license, it is immaterial (1) that the defendant had had no previous encounter with the arresting officer; (2) that only a minor offense was involved; (3) that no police regulations required the officer to take the defendant into custody; (4) that there was no police department policy requiring a full-scale search; and (5) that the officer had no fear of the defendant.

In the Michigan case of People v. Chapman, the court held that the right of a misdemeanant to bail immediately upon arrest does not limit the scope of a search incident to the arrest. See section 4-56, infra, on scope of a search.

In the Georgia case of Baker v. State, the court held that even though an officer could have only required the driver to surrender her license in lieu of bond or arrest for a minor traffic offense, this does not prevent the officer from taking the driver into custody and conducting an inventory search of her purse. In Taylor v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals held that the search incident to the defendant's arrest was valid even though the officer would not have arrested the defendant for the offense if the defendant had consented to a search. Likewise, in the Texas case of Williams v. State, the court held that a search was valid where the defendant was guilty of a parking violation even though the formal arrest did not take place until after the search of the car and the reason for searching the car had little, if anything, to do with the parking violation. In Williams v. State, where an officer would not have stopped a vehicle for speeding had the officer not had a suspicion that it was carrying illicit drugs, the stop was, nonetheless, found valid. In Jones v. State, the court held "[t]he stop of a vehicle is authorized, and not pretextual, if the officer observed a traffic offense." In Sanchez v. State, the court held that when there is actual reason to take a defendant into custody because the officer believed he was violating the Georgia Controlled Substances Act, the arrest is not invalidated even though the initial charge was no proof of insurance and there was probable cause to believe he was guilty of that offense even though as a matter of fact he was not guilty of that offense. In Whren v. United States, the United States Supreme Court held that where a driver violated a traffic law, an officer could stop the vehicle even if the officer would not have stopped it had it not been for some other reason. In Brantley v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals followed Whren. See sections 3-2 and 3-3, supra. See section 3-10, supra, on investigations following traffic stops.

However, under Georgia's seat belt law, absent additional offenses, an officer has no right to search a person or an automobile solely because an occupant of the front seat failed to wear a seat belt.

The defendant may be searched at the place of the arrest, and he may be searched at the jail when officers inventory his property, if this is part of the routine booking procedures. In United States v. Edwards, the Court said, "It is also plain that searches and seizures that could be made on the spot at the time of the arrest may legally be conducted later when the accused arrives at the place of detention."

However, any search of clothing or other property of the defendant at the police station should be done promptly, and it has been held that once property has been inventoried and put in storage, there is no right to a further examination of it without a search warrant.

Fingernail scrapings may be taken from an arrestee. There is a right to conduct a careful examination of the defendant's clothing and even to subject his clothing to a laboratory analysis. Although not sustained on appeal, it has also been held that when a suspect is arrested, his hands may be swabbed with cotton for purposes of a neutron activation test to determine the presence of the gunpowder residue.

In United States v. Ross, the United States Supreme Court abandoned the constitutional distinction between warrantless searches of "worthy" and "unworthy" containers. The court held that "a traveler who carries a toothbrush and a few articles of clothing in a paper bag or knotted scarf claims an equal right to conceal his possessions from official inspection as the sophisticated executive with the locked attache case. . . ." However, "the protection afforded by the [Fourth] Amendment varies in different settings. . . . A container carried at the time of arrest often may be searched without a warrant and even without specific suspicion concerning its contents."

It seems that if a woman's pocketbook is on a bed in another room, it is not considered a part of her person and it may not be searched as an incident to her lawful arrest. However, if a woman has a pocketbook in her possession at the time of her arrest, it seems that it is subject to a full search. See section 4-48, infra, on search of a vehicle as incident to a valid arrest.

Although a court may order a peace officer to apprehend a person pursuant to O.C.G.A. § 37-7-41(b) and, under certain conditions, take him or her to a drug treatment facility, the officer may not search the person who is the subject of the order. An apprehension is not the equivalent of an arrest which would warrant a search.

See section 4-27, infra, on seizures and searches around a person arrested, and section 4-55, infra, on inventories of automobiles. See section 3–7, infra, on automobile searches following a stop for a traffic violation. See section 4–57, infra, on second search of articles taken from an arrested defendant in an automobile. See section 2–22, supra, on search incident to "booking." See section 4-48, infra, on vehicle searches incident to an arrest. See section 3-2, supra, on investigative stops.

§ 4-27 Warrantless searches—Incident to lawful arrest—Articles and area around person arrested

In Chimel v. California, the United States Supreme Court established the validity of and limitations to a search of the area around an arrestee. The court held that officers have the right to search the defendant as well as the area within his "immediate control," or "wingspan," to remove any weapons and prevent the concealment or destruction of evidence. However, Chimel does not give arresting officers the authority to walk the defendant through his home so that they can search everywhere within his reach; nor does the case permit police to search "through all the desk drawers or other closed or concealed areas in [the] room itself."

O.C.G.A. § 17–5–1 provides that an officer has a right, incident to a lawful arrest, to search in the "immediate presence" of the person arrested for weapons to prevent the person from escaping, or to discover fruits of the crime or instruments used in commission of the crime for which the arrest is made. No Georgia cases have explicitly compared the meaning of the words "immediate control" in Chimel with the "immediate presence" language used in the statute. Presumptively, they mean the same thing.

An arrest cannot be used as a pretext to search a home where the true purpose for entering is to search and not to arrest the defendant who lives there. However, after a lawful arrest, the officer has a right to remain literally at the defendant's elbow; and if the officer sees contraband while he is with or near the defendant, he may seize it.

While there is no right to search an entire house incident to a lawful arrest, officers are authorized to make a "limited protective sweep in conjunction with an in-home arrest when the searching officer possesses a reasonable belief based on specific and articulable facts that the area to be swept harbors an individual posing a danger to those on the arrest scene." Such a sweep "may extend only to a cursory inspection of those spaces where a person may be found." In Maryland v. Buie, police officers had arrest warrants for two men. When they entered one defendant's home, they conducted a "protective sweep" and seized a red running suit observed in plain view. The United States Supreme Court upheld the "sweep" as well as the seizure because the defendant was wanted for a robbery in which the assailant wore a red running suit. See sections 4-21 and 4–22, supra, on what property may be seized and searched pursuant to a search warrant. In Inglett v. State, the court held "[p]olice officers are authorized to make a protective sweep in conjunction with an in-home arrest when they possess 'articulable facts which, taken together with the rational inferences from those facts, would warrant a reasonably prudent officer in believing that the area to be swept harbors an individual posing a danger to those on the arrest scene.' "

In Belton v. New York, the United States Supreme Court dealt with the scope of automobile searches when the occupants are arrested. The court held "when a policeman has made a lawful custodial arrest of the occupant of an automobile, he may, as a contemporaneous incident of that arrest, search the passenger compartment of that automobile." In Thornton v. United States, the Supreme Court held that Belton still applies "when an officer does not make contact until the person arrested has left the vehicle." However, in Arizona v. Gant, the Supreme Court held that Belton should not be construed to warrant a search incident to arrest which extends beyond the space within the defendant's immediate control. Even then, a search would only be justified by the arresting officer's reasonable belief that the area might contain a weapon or evidence of the crime for which the defendant was arrested. State and federal cases suggesting otherwise should be reviewed carefully in light of Gant. See sections 4-48 and 4–49, infra, on searches of vehicles and containers found therein.

When police search the area within the arrestee's "immediate control" or "immediate presence," they are sometimes allowed to search articles they find therein.

In Chester v. State, the court considered the search of a suitcase located in a house apparently owned by the defendant. Officers had a search warrant for the premises, and the suitcase had the defendant's surname on it. The court upheld the search even though the defendant's name did not appear in the warrant. The court pointed out that there is a distinction between the search of a suitcase of a visitor to the premises and the search of a suitcase of the owner of the premises.

In State v. Browning, police responded to a complaint of noise in an apartment. When a man opened the door, the officers observed four other persons in the apartment, one of whom was female. The man assured the officers they would keep the noise down and closed the door. As the door closed, the officers smelled marijuana, knocked on the door again, and heard a back door shut. When the officers entered the apartment there were only two men present, drug paraphernalia was in plain sight, and a woman's purse was "open" on the floor. An officer examined the contents of the purse and found marijuana. At trial the officer admitted he was searching the personal effects of a visitor and the judge granted the motion to suppress that evidence. The appellate court affirmed and concluded that the woman had a substantial interest in the privacy of all her possessions and that there was sufficient evidence to find that the purse had not been abandoned.

In Rawlings v. Kentucky, the United States Supreme Court denied a motion to suppress evidence discovered pursuant to a search warrant because the defendant did not have a reasonable expectation of privacy in the contents of a woman's purse, even though it was his belongings (illegal drugs) that were seized therein. In Rawlings, the defendant and others were kept in a house for about 45 minutes while police obtained a search warrant. The defendant contended that his admission of ownership of the drugs was a result of an illegal detention and that the search of his person was illegal. The court assumed that the detention was unconstitutional, but found that it was sufficiently attenuated from the admission to make the statement of ownership admissible. The search of the defendant's person was valid because it was incident to his arrest.

In Segura v. United States, the Court held that an earlier illegal entry into an apartment did not require suppression of evidence seized later pursuant to a valid warrant which was issued on information obtained by police before the illegal entry into the apartment.

See section § 2-25 et seq., supra, on results of illegal arrest. Also see section 4-48, infra, on search of vehicle incident to an arrest and section 4–49, infra, on probable cause to search a motor vehicle. See section 4–57, infra, on a second search of articles taken from an arrested defendant. See section 4-26, supra, on search of a person incident to a lawful arrest. See section 4-55, infra, on conducting an inventory of contents of a vehicle. See section 2–22, supra, on search at police stations.

§ 4-28 Warrantless searches—Valid stop-and-frisk

Stop-and-frisk situations are discussed in Chapter 3, supra.

§ 4-29 Warrantless searches—Exigent circumstances

A warrantless search may be valid in some emergency situations where there is an immediate necessity to search and no opportunity to obtain a warrant. Although "hot pursuit" is a type of emergency or exigent circumstance, it will be discussed separately in the following section. In People v. Mitchell, the court held that in order to establish the existence of an emergency situation, the following basic elements must appear: "(1) The police must have reasonable grounds to believe that there is an emergency at hand and an immediate need for their assistance for the protection of life or property. (2) The search must not be primarily motivated by intent to arrest and seize evidence. (3) There must be some reasonable basis, approximating probable cause, to associate the emergency with the area or place to be searched." In 2006, however, Mitchell was abrogated by Brigham City v. Stuart, wherein the U.S. Supreme Court held that a warrantless entry under exigent circumstances does not run afoul of the Fourth Amendment "as long as the circumstances, viewed objectively, justify [the] action." (Emphasis in original).

"Circumstances which have seemed relevant to courts include (1) the degree of urgency involved and the amount of time necessary to obtain a warrant, (2) reasonable belief that the contraband is about to be removed, (3) the possibility of danger to police officers guarding the site of the contraband while a search warrant is sought, (4) information indicating the possessors of the contraband are aware that the police are on their trail, and (5) the ready destructibility of the contraband and the knowledge 'that efforts to dispose of narcotics and to escape are characteristic behavior of persons engaged in the narcotics traffic.' " United States v. Manning, 448 F.2d 992, 998–999 (2d Cir.1971); United States v. Davis, 461 F.2d at 1031–1032.

In Welsh v. Wisconsin, the United States Supreme Court, in considering a warrantless home arrest, pointed out that the seriousness of the crime may be considered in determining whether exigent circumstances exist. The court said, "Our hesitation in finding exigent circumstances . . . is especially appropriate when the underlying offense for which there is probable cause to arrest is relatively minor. Before agents of the government may invade the sanctity of the home, the burden is on the government to demonstrate exigent circumstances that overcome the presumption of unreasonableness that attaches to all warrantless home entries. . . . When the government's interest is only to arrest for a minor offense, that presumption of unreasonableness is difficult to rebut, and the government usually should be allowed to make such arrests only with a warrant issued upon probable cause by a neutral and detached magistrate."

A number of cases have held that if there is probable cause to believe that contraband will be discovered, but would be destroyed unless there is an immediate search, the search may be conducted without a warrant. In United States v. Rubin, the Third Circuit held that where government agents have probable cause to believe that contraband is present and, based on surrounding circumstances or the information at hand, the agents have reason to conclude that the evidence will be destroyed or removed before they can secure a search warrant, a warrantless search is justified. The court cautioned that a case by case scrutiny of the circumstances is always necessary. According to Rubin:

"The emergency circumstances will vary from case to case, and the inherent necessities of the situation at the time must be scrutinized. Circumstances which have seemed relevant to courts include (1) the degree of urgency involved and the amount of time necessary to obtain a warrant, (2) reasonable belief that the contraband is about to be removed, (3) the possibility of danger to police officers guarding the site of the contraband while a search warrant is sought, (4) information indicating the possessors of the contraband are aware that the police are on their trail, and (5) the ready destructibility of the contraband and the knowledge 'that efforts to dispose of narcotics and to escape are characteristic behavior of persons engaged in the narcotics traffic' " (citations omitted).

In Herring v. State, an officer operating on a tip that a certain homeowner had drugs in his possession engaged in a permissible knock-and-talk procedure in order to investigate a report of a crime. Once the door was opened, the offer observed in plain view evidence of drug use. The officer also observed the defendant get up from a sofa and start walking toward the back of the hours. The court found the officer's warrantless entry to be justified by the likelihood that the contraband was in danger of immediate destruction.

Although the Supreme Court, in Agnello v. United States, stated that even when probable cause exists that evidence will be found in a certain area, a search for an article in a dwelling is unlawful in the absence of a search warrant, the Court alluded to the legality of a warrantless search where there is an emergency situation necessitating prompt action. If there is probable cause and no exigent circumstances, it may be permissible for officers to seize premises to secure the area while a search warrant is obtained; but generally, "they may not enter a home without a warrant merely because they plan to obtain one subsequently." The United States Supreme Court reversed a conviction resulting from the search of a house for narcotics where the state failed to show any exigent circumstances.

In State v. Brannan, the Georgia Court of Appeals said that "[a]lthough we review police actions from the standpoint of a hypothetical 'reasonable' officer, we must measure those actions from the foresight of an officer acting in a quickly developing situation and not from the hindsight of which judges have benefit."

In Coker v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals held that "probable cause to believe that . . . [the defendant] had or was committing an offense standing alone does not authorize a warrantless search of his dwelling." See section 4-27, supra, on impoundment or securing premises pending issuance of a warrant.

In Wayne v. United States, then Judge, later Chief Justice Burger, in an opinion on exigent circumstances, stated that: "Breaking into a home by force is not illegal if it is reasonable in the circumstances. . . . [A] warrant is not required to break down a door to enter a burning home to rescue occupants or extinguish a fire, to prevent a shooting or to bring emergency aid to an injured person. The need to protect or preserve life or avoid serious injury is justification for what would be otherwise illegal absent an exigency or emergency. Fires or dead bodies are reported to police by cranks where no fires or bodies are to be found. Acting in response to reports of 'dead bodies,' the police may find the 'bodies' to be common drunks, diabetics in shock, or distressed cardiac patients. But the business of policemen and firemen is to act, not to speculate or meditate on whether the report is correct. People could well die in emergencies if police tried to act with the calm deliberation associated with the judicial process. Even the apparently dead often are saved by swift police response. A myriad of circumstances could fall within the terms 'exigent circumstances' . . . e.g., smoke coming out a window or under a door, the sound of gunfire in a house, threats from the inside to shoot through the door at police, reasonable grounds to believe an injured or seriously ill person is being held within."

If an officer reasonably believes there are wounded people in a home, he may enter without a warrant. The police have the right to enter without a warrant if they receive a credible call that an individual is dead in a house. Where officers find a man lying unconscious on a public street, they may search him to learn his identity and to obtain information about his medical history. If narcotics are discovered in the search, they are admissible if the defendant is tried for possession.

In a case where an officer found a vehicle parked at 3 a.m. with its motor running and a man lying on the front seat, the court concluded that the policeman had the right to try to rouse the man, and contraband found in the process was admissible. Likewise, a limited search of the trunk of an auto without a warrant was valid where officers smelled a strong odor of ether coming from the trunk and officers knew of its highly explosive character.

It must be remembered that probable cause does not permit a warrantless intrusion into one's home in the absence of a showing that the exigencies of the situation make such a search imperative. Thus, it has been held that an officer investigating a complaint about a loudly playing stereo in the early morning has no authority to enter an apartment uninvited when the defendant comes to the door in response to his knock.

In United States v. Place, the United States Supreme Court said, "Where law enforcement authorities have probable cause to believe that a container holds contraband or evidence of a crime, but have not secured a warrant, the Court has interpreted the Amendment to permit seizure of the property, pending issuance of a warrant to examine its contents, if the exigencies of the circumstances demand it or some other recognized exception to the warrant requirement is present. . . . For example, 'objects such as weapons or contraband found in a public place may be seized by the police without a warrant,' . . . because, under these circumstances, the risk of the item's disappearance or use for its intended purpose before a warrant may be obtained outweighs the interest in possession." (Emphasis added.) However, the mere "presence of contraband without more does not give rise to exigent circumstances."

In Strozier v. State, an officer saw marijuana plants in pots being watered by the defendant. The defendant was in a fenced yard standing at the corner of his carport. The trial court's determination that there were exigent circumstances was affirmed in view of the mobility of the plants. Conversely, in Gates v. State, the court held that exigent circumstances did not exist justifying seizure when a police officer observed marijuana growing on the defendant's property. However, if an occupant "sees" the officer, then the facts may amount to exigent circumstances and will justify an immediate seizure.

On the other hand, because of the mobility of the automobile, exigent circumstances justifying a warrantless search were found where officers received reliable information that a person possessed marijuana in a described automobile at a certain location. In Meadows v. State, officers received information describing the automobile defendant was driving and that the defendant was transporting cocaine to Cusseta from Columbus. Forty-five minutes later on the designated highway, an officer stopped Meadows, ordered him out of the car and patted him down for weapons and drugs. The officer removed a bag which appeared to contain cocaine residue. The appellate court affirmed the trial court in denying the motion to suppress the bag obtained in the search.

Likewise, the Georgia Court of Appeals has held that where the defendant was at an airport en route to another state, a search of his luggage was justified due to the exigent circumstance of insufficient time to obtain a warrant.

Where an officer, while executing a valid search warrant, answered a telephone call from the defendant, who mistook him for the resident, and made arrangements to meet the defendant to purchase marijuana, the warrantless arrest of the defendant and warrantless search were justified because the officer did not know in advance where the actual transaction was going to take place.

In People v. Gardner, the Illinois Appellate Court held that where an officer during a nighttime routine patrol found the door of a business unlocked, he had a right to enter to check for criminal conduct. In People v. Cain, the California Court of Appeals found exigent circumstances to exist when, during the early morning hours, law enforcement officers noticed the lights and television on in an apartment adjacent to the apartment of the victim of a brutal attack. There was no response to the officers' knock and the officers believed another victim might be inside. In upholding the warrantless search, the court pointed out that in such an exigent situation, the question is whether or not there "was . . . [a] threat so imminent and serious [that] a reasonable policeman would believe that a warrantless, emergency entry was necessary to save lives and property."

In a case where a defendant was arrested at a hospital for suspicion of murder following the death of his wife, the search of his home to see if there was any injured person was held reasonable under the circumstances. However, in Mincey v. Arizona, the United States Supreme Court pointed out that (1) "the seriousness of the offense under investigation [does not] itself [create] exigent circumstances," and (2) a warrantless search must be "strictly circumscribed by the exigencies which justify its initiation."

Nevertheless, Mincey continued to recognize "that the Fourth Amendment does not bar police officers from making warrantless entries and searches when they reasonably believe that a person within is in need of immediate aid. Similarly, when the police come upon the scene of a homicide, they may make a prompt warrantless search of the area to see if there are other victims or if a killer is still on the premises. . . .'The need to protect or preserve life or avoid serious injury is justification for what would be otherwise illegal absent an exigency or emergency.' " One of the cases cited in Mincey with approval was People v. Mitchell. Note, however, that in the 2006 decision of Brigham City v. Stuart, the U.S. Supreme Court abrogated Mitchell to the extent that it allows for consideration of an officer's subjective intent in making a warrantless entry of a home potentially occupied by persons in need of emergency assistance. A warrantless entry under such circumstances does not run afoul of the Fourth Amendment "as long as the circumstances, viewed objectively, justify [the] action." (Emphasis in original).

In State v. Peterson, the court held that "temporary care of minor children left without adult supervision by police requires police to care for the children until responsibility for their care and custody is undertaken by a responsible adult. . . . The absence of responsible adult supervision of children is an exigent circumstance justifying a warrantless entry."

In Burk v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals adopted the lead taken by several other jurisdictions and held that "a reasonable belief that minors are consuming alcohol in a residence constitutes an exigent circumstance . . . ." The court cited as the basis for its ruling, public safety concerns as well as the likelihood that any evidence tending to show the crime of serving alcohol to minors would likely be destroyed if officers were forced to seek a warrant.

In Thompson v. Louisiana, the United States Supreme Court, in a 1984 per curiam opinion, held that a search was unlawful which had been conducted by two members of a homicide unit 35 minutes after officers arrived and found a corpse and an unconscious person who had attempted suicide. The homicide investigators conducted an exploratory search for about two hours. The first officers had already searched the premises for other victims and suspects. There was time to secure a warrant before the search.

Likewise, in Ortega v. State, the Wyoming Supreme Court upheld a murder scene check to determine the condition of the victim. In the process they observed blood stains. Although later overruled, the court held that the evanescent character of the blood justified a warrantless seizure.

Nevertheless, in Overman v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court held that officers who were called to the defendant's apartment where his former girlfriend had been shot and where the defendant consented to their entering had a right to "seize and secure possible evidence in plain view while investigating the scene." This right was said to include the right to seize a telephone tape recorder from the defendant's bedroom.

In People v. Greene, the court held that exigent circumstances existed justifying a warrantless entry where there was a " 'hang-up' call to 911, and the failure of a real person to answer an instant return call placed by the 911 system." Likewise, the 11th Circuit has held that where exigent circumstances demand an immediate response because of the possibility of danger to human life, a limited warrantless intrusion into a home may be justified by officers responding to a 911 call.

Likewise, in Hatten v. State, the court approved a murder scene warrantless search of the defendant's home and yard three to six hours after the police first arrived.

See section 4-56, infra, on scope and intensity of a search. See Annotation, "Belief That Burglary is in Progress or Has Been Recently Committed As Exigent Circumstances Justifying Warrantless Search of Premises," 64 A. L. R. 5th 637 (1998).

§ 4-30 Warrantless searches—Officer in hot pursuit

In Warden v. Hayden, the United States Supreme Court recognized the hot-pursuit exception to the warrant requirement. This case, which is typical of the hot-pursuit exception, involved a fleeing robber who entered a certain house. The police were informed of the robbery, knocked at the house, were admitted, and searched the entire house. Hayden was found in an upstairs bedroom feigning sleep, and he was arrested. Meanwhile, an officer discovered a shotgun and pistol in the adjoining bathroom, while another policeman found a jacket and trousers of the kind worn by the robber in a washing machine in the basement.

The Supreme Court affirmed the warrantless search, stating that under the exigencies of the situation, the search was imperative. "The Fourth Amendment does not require police officers to delay in the course of an investigation if to do so would gravely endanger their lives or the lives of others." Where speed is essential, a thorough search for persons and weapons is permissible to insure that the police can gain control of all weapons which can be used against them or to effect an escape.

In Welsh v. Wisconsin, the United States Supreme Court concluded that there was no "hot pursuit" where "there was no immediate or continuous pursuit of the . . . [defendant] from the scene of a crime."

In Georgia, the hot-pursuit exception was held to be applicable when officers, after a robbery, obtained an automobile license number which was traced to the defendant's wife and immediately proceeded to the defendant's residence where the defendant and the automobile were searched. In Darby v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals recognized that to establish the hot pursuit exception to the warrant requirement, "[t]he critical elements that need to be satisfied . . . are (1) continuity of pursuit, and (2) immediacy of pursuit."

However, in the thought provoking Georgia case of Hamrick v. State, the court held that the doctrine of hot pursuit did not justify an arrest of a defendant in his home for a traffic violation (misdemeanor) where the circumstances did not make an immediate arrest necessary. See Welsh v. Wisconsin, supra, section 4-29, note 5 and accompanying text.

In the Fifth Circuit case of United States v. Kreimes, the court found that the warrantless search of a zippered piece of luggage was justified for the purpose of learning the identity of a person who fled from a truck which was found to be loaded with marijuana.

§ 4-31 Warrantless searches—Valid consent—General

A valid consent to a search eliminates an officer's need to obtain a warrant and the need for probable cause. However, a consent to search is not a consent to seize. Thus, an officer may only seize items which he has probable cause to believe are stolen or embezzled property, contraband, or instrumentalities or fruits of a crime. Likewise, consents have been strictly construed against the state; thus, it has been held that a consent to let an officer determine whether or not a key will fit a car is not a consent to a search of the car. It has been said that a consent to look inside a pick-up truck is not a consent to open a drawstring bag on the front seat. In United States v. Elliott, an officer asked the defendant if he could "look through the trunk [of a car] and see what you got in there? I don't want to look through each item." The officer also testified that he told the defendant he just wanted to see how things were packed. The defendant responded by releasing the trunk latch. The court held that this consent did not authorize the officer to conduct a thorough search of the contents of a bag located in the trunk. However, as pointed out in Caster v. State, a consent to a thorough search of everything found in a car is not limited "to a 'look inside' or 'in' the car and its contents." Thus, in Caster the court affirmed a finding that, because of the consent, an officer noticing a loose back seat was authorized to lift it and observe contraband.

It has been pointed out that "[c]onsent may be as limited as the consenter wishes. . . . The suspect is not required to call a halt when the search has gone beyond the scope of consent given; the burden remains on the [s]tate to show that the scope of the officer's search did not exceed the permission given." However, where a general consent to search is given, its validity should be regarded as continuing until the consent is revoked or otherwise withdrawn. Nonetheless, mere "acquiescence to a claim of lawful authority" will not suffice as consent to extend a Terry pat-down into a more intrusive search.

Where two or more officers undertake a warrantless search and one officer discovers contraband without actually knowing that one of the other officers has obtained a valid consent to search, the consent legitimized the search. In State v. Sutton, the court held that a valid written consent executed after a prior warrantless entry ratified the prior search.

The burden of proof is on the prosecution to show that the consent was, in fact, freely and voluntarily given. "The proper standard for a trial court's determination of whether there is consent to search is preponderance of the evidence," and it is not necessary for the judge to find beyond a reasonable doubt that consent was given. The same standard applies in determining the voluntariness of a consent to a search as pertains to confessions. Thus, a court looks to the totality of the surrounding circumstances.

In determining the question of voluntariness, the United States Supreme Court has considered such factors as the youth of the accused, his lack of education, failure to be informed of his constitutional rights, length of detention, prolonged nature of questioning, deprivation of food or sleep, and the psychological impact of these things on the accused. In Schneckloth v. Bustamonte, the United States Supreme Court held no single factor is controlling. In Rogers v. State, the court held that even where a person has been seized, if his "subsequent search was pursuant to a voluntary consent which was not a product of the illegal detention, the taint of that illegal detention would not require suppression of the evidence." In VonLinsowe v. State, the court held that where a defendant is being unlawfully detained, if the search was pursuant to a voluntary consent which was not a product of the illegal detention, the illegal detention would not require suppression of the evidence seized. "However, in order to eliminate any taint from an involuntary seizure or arrest, there must be proof both that the consent was voluntary and that it was not the product of the illegal detention. Proof of a voluntary consent alone is not sufficient. The relevant factors include temporal proximity of an illegal seizure and consent, intervening circumstances, and the purpose and flagrancy of the official misconduct."

In Bowers v. State, the defendant was stopped for "changing lanes without using a turn signal." There were no other vehicles in the area. After the defendant had been questioned in the cold for about 20 minutes, the defendant "consented" to a search of the car and contraband was found. The trial court denied a motion to suppress which the appellate court reversed. The court pointed out that a turn signal need not be given when the movement can be made with reasonable safety. There was no objective manifestation that the person being stopped was or was "about to be engaged in criminal activity." There was no significant lapse of time or intervening circumstances between the unlawful detention and the consent. "Therefore, . . . the consent was the product of the illegal detention. . . ." Likewise, in Bolton v. State, the Court of Appeals determined that the consent to search in that case was tainted by the police. If there is a lack of valid consent or a lack of exigent circumstances, any entry onto the subject premises is unreasonable. Thus any consent to search after an unwarranted entry or any evidence recovered in such a search would be considered tainted and thus subject to suppression.

In order to show a valid consent, it is not always essential for an officer to inform a person of his Fourth Amendment protections or his right to refuse to consent. However, a judge may "consider the absence of any attempt by . . . [an officer] to advise defendant of his constitutional rights . . ." in determining whether the State failed to satisfy its burden. In State v. Westmoreland, an officer, without articulable suspicion, asked the defendant and others if they would consent to be searched. The defendant asked if the officer had a search warrant. The officer replied that he did not need a warrant. The court pointed out that the answer was not true. It was held that when the evidence shows that a defendant must consent, "such evidence weighs heavily against a finding that [a] consent was voluntary."

If a suspect is given Miranda warnings and is informed that the results of a search may be used against him, the search is not considered the result of illegal coercion simply because there is no showing that he knew he could withhold his consent.

Where consent is obtained through coercion, it will not be deemed voluntary. In Bumper v. North Carolina, the consent to a search of a house by the defendant's grandmother was held to be involuntary where an officer falsely claimed to have a search warrant. Deception on the part of an officer may prevent a consent from being valid.

In State v. Smith, another North Carolina case, the Supreme Court of that state reversed the trial court and found no Fourth Amendment violation where officers without probable cause "proceed[ed] to the residence, knock[ed] on the door, and ask[ed] to be permitted inside. . . . [Inside] the officers inform[ed] the person that they . . . [are] investigating information that drugs are in the house. The officers then ask[ed] for [and received] . . . consent."

In Darby v. State, the court held that "[w]hen an officer represents to an accused that a warrant to search will be obtained if consent [to search] is refused and [the officer] does not have probable cause to secure the warrant, then the accused's consent is invalid." However, it has been held that deception on the part of an officer does not automatically prevent a consent from being valid, unless the method used offends due process. Thus, a consent to search is not invalid for the reason that the consent was given to an officer working outside his jurisdiction.

In State v. Sims, the Court of Appeals explained in the context of a warrantless search of an automobile that it is the unreasonable search and seizure which is prohibited by the Fourth Amendment. "The 'touchstone . . . is reasonableness' . . . [which] . . ., in turn, is measured in objective terms by examining the totality of the circumstances." Thus, "if the officer continues to detain the subject after the conclusion of the traffic stop and interrogates him to seek consent to search without reasonable suspicion of criminal activity, the officer has exceeded the scope of a permissible investigation of the initial traffic stop." Accordingly, what may begin as a reasonable setting in which to conduct a search may progress to one which, because of its "intensity and scope", violates the Fourth Amendment. The Court applied Sims in Padron v. State, to exclude contraband discovered during the search of a motor vehicle belonging to a Spanish-speaking couple whose proficiency in English was suspect. Admitting that he was acting only on a "hunch" when he requested leave to search the vehicle, the officer discovered cocaine in a suitcase in the trunk after the apparent protest of the driver that the search terminate. The officer did not present the couple with departmental consent to search forms printed in Spanish and did not request an interpreter until after the arrest was effected. The Court concluded that the officer never had a reasonable basis for conducting the search and that any "consent" obtained by the officer was the result of the coercive nature of the couple's detention during the search. Salmeron v. State, has since displaced Padron and the notice that an officer cannot question an individual on matters outside the scope of the reason for the stop. Instead, the court in Salmeron said the inquiry should be whether the police questioning unduly prolonged the detention initiated by the reason for the stop.

It has been held that the refusal of the defendant to consent to a search is not admissible since a defendant is not to be penalized for exercising a constitutional right.

See section 26-19, note 44, infra, on the validity of consent to warrantless searches as a condition of probation. Generally, see 2 LaFave, Search and Seizure, § 8.1 et seq. (West 1978). See section 3-11, supra, on extension of the Terry frisk. See section 4-2, supra, on admission because of misplaced confidence or deception. See section 5-10, infra, on statement made in presence of an acquaintance on the mistaken belief that the statement would not be revealed. See section 4-52, infra, on the nature of search of automobile permitted. See Goger, Daniel's Georgia Handbook on Criminal Evidence (2009 ed.), § 7–26, on the use which may be made of blood drawn from a driver under the implied consent statute.

§ 4-32 Warrantless searches—Valid consent by defendant

If the state seeks to justify a warrantless search on the theory that the defendant consented to the search, it "has the burden of proving that the consent was, in fact, freely and voluntarily given." In State v. Williams, the Georgia Court of Appeals pointed out that "although silence in the face of a request for permission to search may, when accompanied by other conduct, sometimes be interpreted as acquiescence, such 'acquiescence cannot . . . substitute for free consent.' "It has been held that if a search is "consented to" because the officer says he has a search warrant, the consent is not valid. In Murphy v. State, the court held that "[w]hen an officer represents to an accused that a warrant to search will be obtained if consent is refused, and does not have probable cause to secure a warrant, then the accused's consent is invalid." Likewise, a defendant who provides his consent to search after the police represent that they have the authority to enter and search the premises against the will of the defendant, if necessary, can still claim that the consent was not voluntary.

Some cases have treated a consent much like a confession and have concluded that if the consent was given because of an induced hope of reward, it is invalid. Also, it must be kept in mind that a person in police custody is in no position to refuse to comply with the demands of the officer. But generally, the validity of a defendant's consent to a search is determined by a totality of the circumstances. For example: (1) The fact that the defendant was in custody at the time the consent was given does not alone show that it was coerced. (2) The absence of proof that the defendant knew he could withhold his consent does not alone prevent the consent from being valid. (3) A threat to obtain a warrant does not alone invalidate the consent. However, all of these factors may be considered under the totality of the circumstances. In Setser v. State, the court held that "[a]lthough [a defendant's] consent may have been the product of his erroneous assumption, based on previous arrests, that the officers would proceed with a search anyway, such an erroneous assumption does not constitute coercion . . . and . . . [t]he consent was valid."

In Lane v. State, the court held that "[a] warrantless search may be upheld if the law enforcement officer conducting the search reasonably (albeit erroneously) believes the consent given was valid." (emphasis in original.)

In Ohio v. Robinette, the United States Supreme Court held that where a driver is stopped for a traffic offense, the failure of the officer to tell the driver that he was "free to go" did not alone prevent the driver's consent to search from being voluntary. The court emphasized (1) that the subjective thoughts of the officer are immaterial when he asks a driver to get out of the car if the officer was objectively justified in doing so; and (2) that the voluntariness of a consent "is a question of fact to be determined from all the circumstances."

Often the voluntariness of the defendant's consent turns on the meaning intended by his words, and it must be kept in mind that what may be a consent as to others may not always be regarded as a consent to law enforcement officers.

In Gonzales v. State, the Court of Appeals observed that once the investigation associated with a routine traffic stop has terminated, additional questioning or further searching of the vehicle must close in the absence of reasonable suspicion or valid consent. In this case, after stopping the defendants because of a partially obscured license plate, the officers continued questioning one of the defendants about whether there was any contraband in his car and searching the vehicle even after being told that the defendants would not consent to the search. The officer contended that his "reasonable suspicion" for the search was justified by the "nervousness" of the defendants. The Court ruled that "nervousness" without more is not sufficient to establish reasonable suspicion for detention and investigation for illicit drug activity.

In Aranda v. State, the court held that when there has been a general consent to a search of the person, this consent continues until it is either revoked or withdrawn and is not limited by a later statement of an officer that "it would not be 'a very detailed search,' it would be 'just a patdown of his outer clothing.' "

Acquiescence to apparent authority where the defendant is under arrest is not necessarily regarded as consent, and this seems to be particularly true if the defendant is under illegal arrest, or if an illegal search of one area has already taken place. The Eleventh Circuit has said "that the standard remains the same whether the defendant is in custody under arrest or merely stopped at the time of consent." A threat to arrest a defendant and all occupants of a house if a consent is not given may render the consent invalid.

A condition of a defendant's probation in a previous case that he submit himself, his premises, or motor vehicle to search by any law enforcement officer, and that any evidence seized is admissible against the defendant, was held in State v. Bethune to amount to a consent. In State v. Hall, the court affirmed the granting of a motion to suppress where a defendant was told that if he did not consent to a search of a car, the car would be impounded and he "would be arrested until they get a search warrant from the judge." See section 26-19, infra.

In a case from another jurisdiction, the court held that where a defendant refused to permit a search of his car, it was error to admit testimony of this exercise of his Fourth Amendment rights.

In the Texas case of Brown v. State, the court held that when a defendant placed a 911 call from her home, to which police were summoned, and stated that a crime had been committed by a third person, the caller impliedly consented to a search of the premises reasonably related to the routine investigation of the offense.

In the interesting Florida case of Preces v. State, the court held that there was no Fourth Amendment violation where undercover officers posing as potential buyers of marijuana were invited into the defendant's home and given an opportunity to inspect contraband, which they did.

In Pupo v. State, the court pointed out that to the extent the driver of a car had no authority to consent to a search, he clearly lacked standing to complain that the search violated the Fourth Amendment.

In Beasley v. State, the defendant consented to a urine test after he was told that the purpose of the results of the test were to be used in connection with the defendant's request for a bond. After the defendant tested positive for cocaine, he was charged with possession of cocaine. The court concluded that the consent was not voluntary since he had not been informed that he might be supplying evidence against himself in an independent criminal prosecution. However, in Gadson v. State, the defendant was arrested for assaulting a victim. He was given his Miranda rights and was asked for a sample of blood. He consented and signed a form consenting to give his blood without a search warrant and stating that anything found could be used as evidence in any court. The appellate court affirmed the admission of DNA evidence based on the blood in view of the defendant's freely and voluntarily given consent with "no limits on the scope of his consent." See Goger, Daniel's Georgia Handbook on Criminal Evidence (2009 ed.), § 7–26, on DNA examination of blood taken from driver under implied consent.

In Cole v. State, the court concluded that the defendant's consent to search his automobile was voluntary following a valid traffic stop made because of an improper lane change. After stopping the vehicle, the officer detected the smell of marijuana and requested permission to search the vehicle. The officer did admit that he might have stated that if the defendant did not consent, he would get a drug dog. The court ruled that the State did not have to affirmatively show that the officer did not make the statement. Rather, it is "up to the trial court to consider the weight to be given the possibility that it was made."

In Fincher v. State, the Court of Appeals noted that under appropriate circumstances the State may prove that consent to search given by the defendant or by an authorized third party after a search will serve to validate an otherwise illegal search.

See section 26-19, infra, on validity of consent to search as a condition of probation. See Annotation, "When is Consent Voluntarily Given so as to Justify Search Conducted on Basis of That Consent—Supreme Court Cases," 148 A. L. R. Fed. 271 (1998).

§ 4-33 Warrantless searches—Valid consent by third person

In Illinois v. Rodriguez, the United States Supreme Court held that concerning the validity of a consent to search by a third person, the "consent to enter must 'be judged against an objective standard: would the facts available to the officer at the moment . . . warrant a man of reasonable caution in the belief that the consenting party had authority over the premises?' . . . If not, then warrantless entry without further inquiry is unlawful unless authority actually exists." Thus, "a warrantless search based on unauthorized consent could nonetheless be upheld if the law enforcement officer conducting the search reasonably (albeit erroneously) believed the consent given was valid."

A person may consent to a search if he possesses "common authority over or other sufficient relationship to the premises or effects sought to be inspected."

Common authority means "mutual use of the property by persons generally having joint access or control for most purposes, so that it is reasonable to recognize that any of the co-inhabitants has the right to permit the inspection in his own right and that the others have assumed the risk that one of their number might permit the common area to be searched." Thus, in Atkins v. State, the court held that the defendant's 17–year-old brother had sufficient authority to give a valid consent.

In Park v. State, officers went to the defendant's apartment and asked her 24–year-old daughter if she would mind looking around to see if she could find certain documents. The daughter consented. She found some of the documents which were given to the officers. The court did not regard this as a search by the officers and held the documents admissible.

In Davis v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court considered a case in which the defendant's ten-year-old stepson called 911 to report drugs in his home. The child had a key to the house and called his mother as soon as he got in from school. His mother came in from work about 4:30 p.m. He was not permitted to invite anyone into the house or to go outside during this period of about 1–½ hours. On the afternoon in question, he found what he believed to be drugs in his parents' bedroom. In making the call, the child acted on advice he received in a drug abuse class at school. In his call, he stated he would like to get some help for his parents. When the deputy arrived, he followed the child into the house and into the defendant's bedroom where the child obtained a mirror with white powder and a razor blade on it and pulled a bag of marijuana and "rolling papers" from a nightstand. The deputy saw a " 'marijuana joint' in an ashtray." The defendant contended that his stepson lacked authority to consent. The trial judge denied the motion to suppress. The Georgia Supreme Court held that the motion to suppress should have been granted. The court identified the following factors which should be considered in determining the validity of such a search: (1) "whether the minor lived on the premises; [2] whether the minor had a right of access to the premises and the right to invite others thereto; [3] whether the minor was of an age at which he or she could be expected to exercise at least minimal discretion; and [4] whether officers acted reasonably in believing that the minor had sufficient control over the premises to give a valid consent to search."

The court then emphasized the importance of examining "a child's mental maturity and his ability to understand the circumstances . . . and the consequences of his actions. . . . The younger a child the less likely that he or she can be said to have the minimal discretion required. . . ." The court concluded that based on the foregoing criteria, the child involved did not have authority to validly consent, the circumstances did not justify a finding of present danger to the child, nor were there exigent circumstances. Lastly, the court pointed out the facts of this case did not warrant affirmance under the "independent source" or "inevitable discovery exception." See section 2-27, supra, on the independent source exception, and section 2-28, supra, on the inevitable discovery exception. In 1997, Georgia enacted O.C.G.A. § 16–7–21, which provides that a minor may not permit a lawful entry if the "parent or guardian has previously given notice that such entry is forbidden or notice to depart." See Annotation, "Admissibility of Evidence Discovered in Search of Adult Defendant's Property or Residence Authorized by Defendant's Minor Child—State Cases," 51 A. L. R. 5th 425 (1997). Also see Annotation, "Admissibility of Evidence Discovered in Search of Adult Defendant's Property or Residence Authorized by Defendant's Minor Relative," 152 A. L. R. Fed. 475 (1999) and Annotation, "Admissibility of Evidence Discovered in Search of a Defendant's Property or Residence Authorized by Defendant's Spouse (resident or non-resident)—State Cases," 65 A. L. R. 5th (1999). However, the 1999 case of Rainwater v. State, the court, relying on Davis, said a 15–year-old gave valid consent to search her home.

It has been held that a father may consent to the search of his son's car which is parked on the father's premises. In Fears v. State, the court said that when the defendant left a bag at his sister's house, he assumed the risk that she might consent to a search of the bag and her consent was valid.

There have been cases involving all kinds of factual situations relating to third party consents. Some of the more significant situations will be mentioned here; others are referred to in the footnotes. Generally, a spouse or roommate can consent to a search of common premises. In order for the consent of a third party to be valid, that party must possess "common authority over or other sufficient relationship to the premises or effects sought to be inspected." Hence, the mere fact that a third person was present in a house does not mean that the third person could validly consent to a search of the house. However, in Dover v. State, the court held that where a husband had given his mother-in-law a key to his house and said she was welcome at any time, she had authority to enter the house in the absence of the owner and to consent to a search of the house when the circumstances reasonably indicated it might be necessary in the interest of the householders or safeguarding the house. The owner of a car may turn over to officers luggage of an acquaintance which has been placed in the automobile. However, in United States v. Welch, the court held that the consent of a male to search a rental car did not authorize the search of a purse found in the trunk which belonged to his female companion. If the owner of a car is present and the driver consents to a search, the driver's consent has been considered sufficient. An employer may give a valid consent to a search of the employer's truck which is driven by an employee. In United States v. Jenkins, the Court concluded that a driver of a rig has apparent authority to consent to a search of the trailer. On the other hand, a hotel clerk cannot validly consent to the search of a guest's room until it is vacated; a landlord cannot validly consent to the search of his tenant's quarters; and a nurse cannot consent to a search of a patient's clothing. See Annotation, "Admissibility of Evidence Discovered in Warrantless Search of Rental Property Authorized by Lessor of Property—State Cases," 61 A. L. R. 5th 149 (1998).

In Browning v. State, the court said, "An officer's belief that a third party has authority to consent to the search of another person's property should not only be based on information previously obtained in his investigation, but should also be based on the facts and circumstances existent at the time of the search."

In determining whether a consent given by a third party is voluntary, the "totality of circumstances" test is applicable, but it is not always necessary for the prosecution to establish that the person who consented knew that he had a right to refuse to consent.

An interesting question posed to the Georgia Court of Appeals was the validity of a consent to search given by one occupant to a premises where another occupant, also present at the time, had already refused such access to the police. In Randolph v. State, the court concluded that in a case involving a married couple, one spouse could not waive the other's right to privacy by allowing a police search in their residence after the other spouse had refused to permit the search. The court's decision was upheld by the Supreme Court of Georgia and the U.S. Supreme Court granted certiorari in order to resolve a split of authority among the Federal Courts of Appeal. In Georgia v. Randolph, the U.S. Supreme Court affirmed the judgment of the Supreme Court of Georgia, making clear, however, that their decision is strictly limited to those situations involving a physically present co-occupant objector. Randolph should not affect the capacity of the police to protect victims of domestic violence. For example, if the consenting occupant inside the dwelling indicates that he or she is in need of police protection, then police entry is justified regardless of the other occupant's refusal to consent.

However, in Preston v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals held that police could not arrest the defendant at his home and then initiate a search of the home consented to by a live-in girlfriend that was not incident to the arrest without first informing the defendant the basis of the search and giving him an opportunity to object.

In State v. Kuhnhausen, the appellate court affirmed the grant of the defendant's motion to suppress evidence seized in a warrantless search of a mobile home shared by the defendant and his brother. Though the defendant's brother had consented to the search, the mobile home had been permanently divided with the construction of a wall and there was no interior access between the units. The court held that "one individual cannot waive the Fourth Amendment rights of another individual on their independent, separate, private property."

See Annotation, "Admissibility of Evidence Discovered in Search of Defendant's Property or Residence Authorized by Defendant's Adult Relative Other Than Spouse—State Cases," 55 A. L. R. 5th 125 (1998) (this annotation is almost 300 pages long); Annotation, "Admissibility of Evidence Discovered in Search of Defendant's Property or Residence Authorized by Defendant's Adult Relative Other Than Spouse," 160 A. L. R. Fed. 165 (2000); and Annotation, "Admissibility of Evidence Discovered in Search of Defendant's Property or Residence Authorized by One, Other Than Relative, Who is Co–Tenant or Common Resident With Defendant—State Cases," 68 A. L. R. 5th 343 (1999).

§ 4-34 Warrantless searches—Airport searches

The frequency of aircraft hijackings in the past has led to the adoption of measures to deal with the critical time when passengers board an airplane.

Federal Aviation Administration regulations require the presence of armed officers throughout the screening of departing passengers. Also, searches may be conducted in critical preboarding areas even if the passenger does not meet the FAA "profile" of a potential hijacker or otherwise appear suspicious. "[S]earch in an airport gate area or security checkpoint . . . [does] not require probable cause or even reasonable suspicion, but instead 'mere suspicion of possible illegal activity.' "Once commenced, a consent search may continue until the officers, in their professional judgment, conclude that no harm will result from the passenger boarding the plane.

The use of metal-detecting devices called magnetometers has been held to constitute a search under the Fourth Amendment. Georgia courts have approved the use of such devices as reasonable and have upheld the validity of the search or frisk based upon the magnetometer reading.

In some cases there has been an attempt to justify airport searches on the theory that a person traveling by airplane consents to airport security procedures. However, most cases seem to have rejected the implied consent theory, since such a "consent" is not freely and voluntarily given. "To make one choose between flying to one's destination and exercising one's constitutional right . . . in many situations [is] a form of coercion." Nevertheless, in State v. Rosof, the Georgia Court of Appeals held that persons "presenting themselves at a security check-point thereby consent automatically to a search" if there is a sign informing persons entering the area that they will be subject to search. Likewise, it has been said that when a "passenger presents himself at an airport security check-point, he has consented to the screening of his luggage by the X-ray machine." Most of the more recent cases have justified such security measures on the theory that although initially there is not enough probable cause to justify a search, if the passenger activates a magnetometer and follow-up procedures do not satisfy the officer, there is at least probable cause for a frisk. The courts have not been impressed with the distinction that a typical frisk situation is designed to protect the officer, whereas in the airport context the purpose of the frisk is to protect the passengers once the plane has departed, and it has been pointed out that an airport search is "not to be condemned as violating the Fourth Amendment simply because it does not precisely fit into one of the previously recognized categories for dispensing with a search warrant."

In State v. Crisanti, the court held that once a person who is subject to an investigatory stop admits a weapon is present, officers are privileged to search the area to uncover that weapon, and pointed out that the reasonableness of the action of officers is to be measured by the "foresight of the policeman on the scene. . . ."

In the 1980 case of Shapiro v. State, the Florida Supreme Court concluded that a passenger had no reasonable expectation of privacy which prevented his being searched for weapons or other devices which could be used in hijackings. Therefore, the court concluded, the Fourth Amendment did not apply.

The right to search without a warrant at an airport applies only to searches of passengers and the luggage they carry on board. In Georgia, it has been held that where an airline employee on his own initiative searches checked luggage which accidentally sprang open, the search is a private search not covered by the protection of the Fourth Amendment.

The search by Drug Enforcement Administration officers for drugs on passengers arriving in airports from other points in the United States, or the search of passengers arriving from foreign countries and passing through customs, are situations beyond the scope of this section.

Generally, on scope of a search and seizure, see section 4-56, infra. Also see section 3-4, supra, on drug courier profile and section 4-29, supra, on exigent circumstances. Generally, on airport searches, see 68 Am. Jur. 2d Searches and Seizures § 59 (1973), and 3 LaFave, Search and Seizure 327, § 10.6 (West 1978).

§ 4-35 Warrantless searches—Courthouses and public buildings

In the South Carolina case of State v. Shelton, the trial judge received reliable information that a party in a pending action carried a gun and had threatened one of the attorneys in the case. The trial judge ordered the party searched. The appellate court said:

"A trial judge has the inherent power to preserve order in his court and to see that justice is not obstructed by any person or persons. He has the authority to take such measures as appear reasonably necessary to secure orderly proceedings and to preserve the security of those participating in the trial or lawfully attending the proceedings. The exercise of this authority by the trial judge is not inhibited by the guarantees of the Fourth Amendment. Therefore, the Fourth Amendment protection against unreasonable searches and seizures is inapplicable to a courtroom in the exercise of the trial judge's authority and duty to preserve security and order."

However, generally a court does not know the identity of a person who is armed. Hence, where there are threats or have been acts of violence, magnetometers, or metal detecting devices, may be used to screen persons entering a courthouse.

In McMorris v. Alioto, the court in effect approved the requirement that persons entering a courthouse must pass through a metal detector. If the detector indicated the presence of metal, the person could empty his pockets and pass through the detector again. If the detector was activated again, the person was frisked before being permitted to enter. Briefcases and articles capable of concealing weapons were also subject to inspection. The court pointed out that any person could leave the courthouse without a further search or questioning if he activated the metal detector, and concluded that there was sufficient freedom from compulsion to meet the requirements of the Fourth Amendment.

In some cases, even more severe or intensive means of searching have been used. These security measures are sometimes said to be justified on a consent theory or on a theory of the inherent power of the court to maintain order.

See 3 LaFave, Search and Seizure, § 10.7(a) (West 1978); 1 Ringel, Searches and Seizures, Arrests and Confessions, § 16.3 (Clark Boardman 1979); Annotation, "Validity, Under Federal Constitution, of Search Conducted as Condition of Entering Public Building," 53 A. L. R. Fed. 888 (1981).

§ 4-36 Warrantless searches—Places of recreation and entertainment

Several cases have arisen involving the search of persons entering a stadium or some other such facility. These cases have arisen where spectators were required to submit to a search for drugs, alcohol, or weapons as a prerequisite to the right to enter. Justification of these checks or searches has generally been sought by drawing an analogy between such checks and airport searches. However, thus far the analysis has been rejected because (1) there is no showing of public necessity; (2) the intensity required of such a search, if it is to be effective, is intolerable; and (3) the searches have been used on a selective basis.

For the foregoing reasons such searches have been held unconstitutional if they are a result of government action.

See 1 Ringel, Searches and Seizures, Arrests and Confessions, § 16.4 (Clark Boardman 1979); 1 LaFave, Search and Seizure, § 10.7(a) (West 1978); Annotation, "Validity, Under Federal Constitution, of Search Conducted as Condition of Entering Public Building," 53 A. L. R. Fed. 888 (1981).

§ 4-37 Warrantless searches—Abandoned property

The United States Supreme Court has held that the Fourth Amendment does not apply to abandoned property.

Thus, if property has been abandoned it may be seized by officers without a warrant. Momentarily divesting oneself of contraband inside an automobile does not constitute abandonment. "The question of abandonment for Fourth Amendment purposes does not turn on strict property concepts but on whether the accused has relinquished his interest in the property to the extent that he no longer has a reasonable expectation of privacy . . . at the time of the search." "Abandonment is primarily a question of intent, and intent may be inferred from words spoken, acts done, and other objective facts. All relevant circumstances existing at the time of the alleged abandonment should be considered. Police pursuit or the existence of a police investigation does not of itself render abandonment involuntary." If a defendant abandons an automobile after being chased by police, he may not object to the search. In Williams v. State, the defendant's car "was found over 100 yards from the nearest home on land not belonging to the defendant: it was down a deserted field road, the tag and battery had been removed, and the vehicle was covered with freshly cut bushes and debris." The court said that the issue of abandonment is one of fact and will not be disturbed by an appellate court if there is any evidence to support it. Here there was adequate evidence to support a finding of abandonment. "In order to determine whether property has been abandoned, we must ask: Did the complaining party retain a legitimate expectation of privacy in the article allegedly abandoned?"

In Berger v. State, the court held that when a briefcase was left unlocked in the lobby of a hotel, an officer could open it and look in it to determine who the owner is. In Ramsey v. State, the court held that where a defendant denied ownership or any interest in a briefcase, this amounted to an abandonment of the briefcase and its contents and justified a warrantless search.

When a person drops or throws contraband away while he is being followed or approached by an officer, the property is treated as having been abandoned. This abandonment situation, in some parts of the country, has led to what has been commonly referred to as the "dropsy" cases and the "perjury routine" in which officers have been accused of routinely testifying that a defendant dropped the drugs when he saw the officer approaching. However, if the officer is attempting to make an illegal arrest which causes the defendant to dispose of the contraband, the property is not treated as having been abandoned. Likewise, where officers illegally stop a person and as a result of the stop the person abandons contraband, this is not regarded as voluntary abandonment and the contraband has been held not admissible.

However, if "a defendant is in a state of flight when he discards or abandons property . . . his being pursued does not result in the 'seizure' of property he abandoned." Hence, when a defendant is in a state of flight when he discards contraband, and has not submitted to any show of authority by the police, the contraband is "not discovered as a result of an illegal search or seizure, regardless of whether the police had probable cause to stop . . . [the defendant's] vehicle."

The case of Abel v. United States exemplifies an abandonment situation. In Abel, the defendant was arrested in his hotel room. After he had been taken away, an officer with the consent of the hotel manager searched the wastepaper basket in the room and discovered incriminating evidence. The court held the items had been abandoned and were thus admissible. However, a tenant who is evicted retains a reasonable expectation of privacy and an officer has no right to sift through his possessions before moving them onto the street.

Several cases involving the search of garbage cans placed on the street have held that the items in question were abandoned. See section 14-78, infra, on expectation of privacy. Likewise, it has been held that substances obtained from the feces of a hospitalized drug suspect are admissible. However, where personal property such as a wallet is merely lost and not abandoned, the owner does maintain an expectation of privacy, albeit a somewhat diluted one. Addressing the issue for the first time, the Court of Appeals in Wolf v. State, held that a person's expectations of privacy in their personal effects, does not vanish simply because the item is lost or mislaid. It is, however, diminished to the extent that police may examine the contents thereof in order to find the rightful owner. See Annotation, "Searches and Seizures: Reasonable Expectation of Privacy in Contents of Garbage or Trash Receptacle," 62 A. L. R. 5th 1 (1998).

In addition to personal property, the doctrine of abandonment also applies to real estate. In Bloodworth v. State, the defendant physically moved out of a house, but he retained possession until the day after the warrantless search. The court said that strict property concepts did not apply and the question was whether or not he had relinquished his interest in the property to such an extent that he no longer had a reasonable expectation of privacy. Therefore, the court concluded that the evidence authorized a finding that the premises had been abandoned.

In Smith v. State, a search was upheld on the theory of abandonment where the defendant was temporarily living elsewhere, the rent had not been paid for several months, the owner had initiated proceedings to take possession of the premises, the water had been turned off and the telephone disconnected several months before the search, and the house was said to be uninhabitable. In Hollingsworth v. State, the court upheld the warrantless search of an apparently vacant house which had been condemned by the city.

In United States v. Tolbert, the court held that the definition of the word "abandonment" has a traditional concept in property law, but the same word may have a different meaning under the Fourth Amendment. The court then concluded that the defendant had no expectation of privacy in a checked suitcase left in an air terminal where the defendant vociferously denied owning the suitcase. See sections 14-74 to 14-78, infra, on standing and expectation of privacy. See Annotation, "Search and Seizure: What Constitutes Abandonment of Personal Property Within Rule That Search and Seizure of Abandoned Property Is Not Unreasonable—Modern Cases," 40 A. L. R. 4th 382 (1985).

§ 4-38 Warrantless searches—Plain view—General

In a sense the plain view doctrine or rule is not an exception to the warrant requirement for a search. This is true in that articles discovered as a result of "plain view" are not discovered as a result of a search. No warrant is required since no search is conducted. Thus, the plain view doctrine is a seizure doctrine, not a search doctrine. However, absent exigent circumstances, an officer has no right to seize contraband unless he has a legal right to go where the contraband is located.

In Texas v. Brown, four Justices of the United States Supreme Court said that " '[p]lain view' is perhaps better understood, . . . not as an independent 'exception' to the warrant clause but simply as an extension of whatever the prior justification for the officer's 'access to an object' may be. The principle is grounded on the recognition that when a police officer has observed an object in 'plain view' the owner's remaining interests in the object are merely those of possession and ownership. . . . Likewise, it reflects the fact that requiring police to obtain a warrant once they have obtained a first-hand perception of contraband, stolen property or incriminating evidence generally would be a 'needless inconvenience,' . . . which might involve danger to the police and public."

The "plain view" exception to the warrant requirement is based on the theory that the discovery of the particular incriminating evidence is not the result of a search. In Coolidge v. New Hampshire, the Court said that in order for the plain view exception to apply, three requirements must be met: (1) the object must be inadvertently discovered, (2) the officer discovering the object must have a legal right to be where he is at the time of the discovery, and (3) it must be immediately apparent that the seized item is stolen property, contraband, or other fruits or evidence of a crime. However, in the 1990 case of Horton v. California, the United States Supreme Court held that the "inadvertent discovery requirement" of the plain view rule is no longer required.

In reading the cases on "plain view," it becomes readily apparent that these words in the Fourth Amendment context do not mean what they would seem to mean in lay English. It has been suggested that " '[o]pen view' is a better term to describe the non-intrusional visual observation from a vantage point outside a constitutionally protected area. The 'plain view doctrine' of Coolidge 'refers exclusively to the legal justification—the reasonableness—for the seizure of evidence . . . in the course of a constitutional search already in progress or in the course of an otherwise justifiable intrusion into a Constitutionally protected area. . . .' Because an 'open view' encompasses that which is readily observable or clearly visible from an observation point which is not within a constitutionally protected confine, this sighting of evidence needs no further justification for a seizure."

See section 4-22, supra, on property which may be seized when a warrant is executed. See section 4-40, infra, on enhanced vision of officer by the use of a light or binoculars. See section 4-42, infra, on aerial view of premises. See section 3-10, supra, on identification of a substance by feel.

§ 4-39 Warrantless searches—Plain view—Inadvertent discovery

In the 1990 case of Horton v. California, the United States Supreme Court held that "the absence of inadvertence" does not prevent a seizure from being valid under the plain view doctrine. The court pointed out that (1) "evenhanded law enforcement is best achieved by the application of objective standards of conduct, rather than standards that depend upon the subjective state of mind of the officer." (2) The inadvertence requirement is not required to prevent a "specific warrant" from being converted into a general warrant.

In Nichols v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals followed Horton. However, in the 2006 case of Mauge v. State, the Court of Appeals listed inadvertent discovery as one of three requirements under the plain view doctrine.

For Georgia law before Horton, see State v. Scott and Whittington v. State.

§ 4-40 Warrantless searches—Plain view—Right of officer to be where he was at time of discovery

The officer must have a right to be where he is at the time he sees the item. Thus, looking into a motel window from a parking lot was held not objectionable because there existed no reasonable expectation of privacy, but if an officer goes on private property without a warrant and peers in a window and thus obtains probable cause for an arrest, the arrest and search incident to it are illegal. However, in Pickens v. State, the court held that the Fourth Amendment is not violated where an officer goes on private property only to the extent of knocking on outer doors, even if the officer does not have an articulable suspicion. In State v. O'Bryant, pursuant to an anonymous tip of possible drug dealing, officers went to the defendant's residence without a warrant to speak with the defendant. There was no response to their knock at the front door and the officers walked to the side of the house, knocked at a basement door and received no response. They noticed a Toyota truck parked in the driveway in which one of the officers had seen marijuana roaches in the ashtray on a prior occasion. At this time they saw through a tinted window what appeared to be a plastic bag of marijuana. One of the officers obtained a search warrant for the vehicle and the house. The search of the house yielded 20 pounds of marijuana. The appellate court affirmed the granting of the motion to suppress, pointing out that the officers had no right to be where they were when they looked into the Toyota.

It has been held in some jurisdictions that the use of a telescope to watch a defendant in his apartment was illegal and information so obtained was inadmissible. In Patterson v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals held that it was proper for officers to use binoculars to watch a defendant harvest marijuana growing in a field. Also, such surveillance is proper under the open fields exception, which is discussed in the next section, and it is not to be compared with looking in a home.

The plain view doctrine does not apply to objects found while searching furniture or wastebaskets, nor will it justify an exploratory search from one object to another until incriminating evidence is found.

Despite the lesser expectation of privacy in a motor vehicle, it has been held that an officer has no authority to stick his head inside a windowless cargo van parked in a public place. The officer had found the sliding door open from 15 to 18 inches.

The plain view doctrine does not mean that the human senses may never be assisted in any way. In United States v. Lee, the United States Supreme Court held that the plain view doctrine was not violated where a search light was directed on a boat, revealing a number of cans of alcohol. The court also drew an analogy between the use of the search light and the use of field glasses and said that their use was constitutionally proper. Generally, courts have held that the use of a flashlight to see an object did not violate the concept of the plain view doctrine, particularly when related to automobiles. Also, the use of a flashlight in looking in an unlighted garage through an open door has been upheld. In Kyllo v. United States, the United States Supreme Court held that the warrantless use of a thermal imaging device to scan the home of the defendant in connection with an investigation involving an indoor marijuana farm was improper.

In the unusual Eleventh Circuit case of United States v. Sentovich, the court concluded that probable cause to obtain a search warrant could be based, in part, on the assertion of a DEA agent that he could smell marijuana inside of a closed suitcase at an airport.

In Lo-Ji Sales, Inc. v. New York, the Court said that "there is no basis for the notion that [where] a retail store invites the public to enter, it consents to wholesale searches and seizures that do not conform to Fourth Amendment guarantees."

In Kilpatrick v. State, an officer received a tip that the defendants had marijuana growing at their residence. He stated that the tip was insufficient to obtain a search warrant. He said he drove to the farm of Ken Kilpatrick's father to talk with the father about the tip. He entered a private road, drove by the father's home without stopping, drove down the road about one-half mile to the trailer in which the defendants lived, and saw marijuana growing outside the trailer. He then went back to get another officer, drove back to the trailer, and arrested Ken Kilpatrick, who consented to a search of the trailer where additional marijuana was found. The court held that the seizure of growing marijuana was not justified under the plain view doctrine since the defendants had a reasonable expectation of privacy at the trailer. The court also concluded that the consent to the search of the trailer was tainted by the illegal seizure of the growing marijuana and the illegal arrest.

In Merriman v. State, pursuant to an anonymous call that marijuana was growing in the defendant's backyard, officers went to the defendant's house and found the yard enclosed partly by a high brick wall and partly by a wooden fence about eight feet tall. They moved through a heavily wooded area behind the wooden fence and, looking through cracks in the fence, they saw growing marijuana. The seizure was affirmed.

See sections 4-31 and 4-32, supra, on inviting an undercover officer into a house to sell him contraband. See section 4-42, infra, on warrantless searches of open fields and on aircraft surveillance. See section 4-57, infra, on "second search" and a controlled delivery. See section 14-74, infra, on expectations of privacy and standing. See Annotation, "Permissibility and Sufficiency of Warrantless Use of Thermal Imager or Forward Looking Infra–Red Radar (F.L.I.R.)," 78 A. L. R. 5th 309 (2000).

§ 4-41 Warrantless searches—Plain view—Illegality of seized items immediately apparent

In State v. David, the Georgia Supreme Court pointed out that "[a]n officer's observation of . . . contraband from outside the apartment and his recognition of it as contraband, standing alone . . . [does] not authorize the officer to make a warrantless entry into the apartment to arrest the occupants and seize the material." For the plain view doctrine to authorize seizure, the officer must enter the home by consent or there must be exigent circumstances.

It must be immediately apparent to the officer that the object seized is subject to seizure. However, in State v. Field, the court held that where an officer sees suspicious items and he moves nothing but merely takes a closer look, this meets the requirements of immediate apparency of the plain view rule. In State v. Sharer, the Georgia Court of Appeals upheld the seizure of a brown bottle, two to three inches in height, with a white cap and no label of any sort. The bottle was opened and found to contain yellow capsules and blue pills. The bottle was found in plain view on the floor of an automobile. A further check of the car pursuant to a warrant led to the discovery of more bottles containing pills and capsules. The court concluded that having "lawfully discovered the pill bottles, the officers had probable cause to conclude from their location and appearance and the circumstances of their discovery that they contained contraband."

However, in Stone v. State, officers approached a truck and saw a brown paper bag on the floorboard. The bag had "enough torn places in it for the officers to see 'some white tablets, some white looking powder and some brownish material,' in plastic bags inside." One officer, who had been a policeman for six years, "had a suspicion" there were drugs in the bag. The trained officer testified that "to his personal knowledge what he observed, 'was not any controlled substance or was not anything that appeared to be a controlled substance.' "The court affirmed the holding of the trial judge that "the incriminating nature of the evidence" was not immediately apparent and that the seizure and search was not valid.

In Texas v. Brown, the United States Supreme Court considered the "immediately apparent" requirement of the plain view rule. Here a police officer stopped Brown at a driver's license checkpoint. The officer asked for his license, shined his flashlight into the car and saw an opaque party balloon, knotted near the tip, fall from Brown's hand to the seat. The officer was aware that drugs were frequently placed in such balloons. The officer then noticed small plastic vials, loose white powder and an open bag of party balloons in the glove compartment. Brown said he did not have a license with him and got out of the car as requested. The officer picked up the balloon which had fallen. The balloon seemed to have a powdery substance in the tied off portion. Brown was informed that he was under arrest, and the car was inventoried on the scene. A motion to suppress was denied by the trial judge. The Texas Court of Criminal Appeals reversed because the officer did not "know that 'incriminating evidence was before him when he seized the balloon.' "In a plurality opinion, the Supreme Court reversed. Chief Justice Burger and Justices Rehnquist, White, and O'Connor disregarded Coolidge v. New Hampshire as binding precedent and the opinion seems to go out of its way to point this out. The opinion says that "if, while lawfully engaged in an activity in a particular place, police officers perceive a suspicious object they may seize it immediately. . . . This rule merely reflects an application of the Fourth Amendment's central requirement of reasonableness to the law governing seizures of property. . . . [I]t is plain that . . . [the officer] possessed probable cause to believe that the balloon . . . contained an illicit substance." Justices Powell and Blackmun concurred in the judgment, saying that if probable cause must be shown to justify a seizure, it existed in this case, but they disagreed with the criticism of Coolidge. Justices Stevens, Brennan, and Marshall concurred in the judgment but said that the court failed to deal adequately with the search of the balloon as opposed to its seizure.

However, in Arizona v. Hicks, the United States Supreme Court held that "immediately apparent" means the officer must have probable cause to believe that the object is subject to seizure. Thus, while there is nothing to prevent an officer from recording serial numbers which may be easily seen, an officer may not move an article or turn it over to see the serial number unless there is probable cause where such moving of equipment is outside the scope of the exigency that justified the warrantless entry. However, in Downey v. State, the trial court was affirmed in denying a motion to suppress where officers conducted a search with the consent of the owner which was granted in connection with the execution of an arrest warrant for her son. During the search, one officer saw the stock of a rifle in a styrofoam gun box in the attic. He noted the serial number and handed the rifle down to be "cleared." The officer then went to his patrol car to check his notes from a previous burglary. The weapon was determined to be stolen.

In Brown v. State, the court recognized that "if the police see a person in possession of a highly suspicious object . . . which because of other circumstances is reasonably suspected to be contraband, and then observe that person make an apparent attempt to conceal that object from police view, probable cause is then present."

In Whittington v. State, officers were executing a search warrant for marijuana. In the attic they found a pillow case sewn together at both ends. They opened it and found 79 pieces of silverware of differing patterns. One of the officers said he recognized some of it as being of the same pattern as some which had been stolen. However, the owner was unable to describe the patterns which he said had been stolen. The court concluded that all of these facts, including the location, added up to probable cause to believe the silverware was stolen; and the seizure was, therefore, valid. Also, the court pointed out that "[i]t is not necessary under the law that the officer know with certainty that the item is stolen [or contraband] at the time of the seizure, only that there be probable cause to believe that this is the case." In Mozier v. State, a search warrant was issued to search for items taken from the victim, and where the affidavit stated that she had been beaten, the court upheld the seizure of brass knuckles.

In United States v. Jacobsen, the Supreme Court held that the DEA's field test of a white powder, discovered by an employee of a private freight carrier, was not a search within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment because it was sui generis. Thus, the motion to suppress was not valid.

See section 4-51, notes 2 and 7, infra, on "plain smell." See section 3-10, supra, notes 7 through 16, on objects identified by feel during a frisk. See section 4-29, supra, on exigent circumstances justifying seizure of contraband seen at a home.

§ 4-42 Warrantless searches—Open fields

Writing for the Court, in 1924, Justice Holmes held, in Hester v. United States, that the Fourth Amendment protects individuals in their "persons, houses, papers and effects" and its protection does not extend to open fields. Thus, it has been held that no search warrant is necessary for a search of an open field or orchard, or a beach, or some other such area. In Oliver v. United States, the Supreme Court seems to say the open fields doctrine applies to all land outside the curtilage regardless of how remote the land is and regardless of the efforts of the property owner to keep others out. The court said "that the term 'open fields' may include any unoccupied or undeveloped area outside of the curtilage. An open field need be neither 'open' nor a 'field' as those terms are used in common speech. . . . [A] thickly wooded area . . . may be an open field as that term is used in construing the Fourth Amendment."

In United States v. Dunn, the Court said that "the extent of the curtilage is determined by factors that bear upon whether an individual reasonably may expect that the area in question should be treated as the home itself. . . . [T]he central component of this inquiry [is] . . . whether the area harbors the 'intimate activity associated with the 'sanctity of a man's home and the privacies of life' . . . [C]urtilage questions should be resolved with particular reference to four factors: [1] the proximity of the area claimed to be curtilage to the home, [2] whether the area is included within an enclosure surrounding the home, [3] the nature of the uses to which the area is put, and [4] the steps taken by the resident to protect the area from observation by people passing by." The court then concluded that a barn was not located within the curtilage where it was located about 50 yards from a fence which surrounded the house.

Even prior to Oliver, the term "open field" was not limited to unfenced land. It has been applied to land posted with no trespassing signs and has not been limited to what is in plain view.

However, the area within the curtilage of a farm dwelling, as well as any building in that location, is protected. It has been held that a shed on a farm, located 45 to 60 yards from the house, is protected as being within the curtilage. However, a field separated by fence and some other objects has been found not to be within the curtilage even though it was only 35 feet from the residence. Likewise, the backyard of the house in which the defendant lives in a city is not within the open field doctrine, but is regarded as being within the curtilage of the house. However, the curtilage concept does not prevent an officer from going to the front door of a house by the same route which would be used by "any guest, deliveryman, postal employee, or other caller." In State v. Lyons, the Georgia Court of Appeals held that when, pursuant to a complaint, an officer went to the front door of a house which he reasonably believed to be occupied and he could get no response, he could enter the backyard even though fenced to reach the back door. The court distinguished the case from one where the officer entered the backyard for the purpose of conducting a warrantless search. In Olson v. State, the court treated an unoccupied abandoned house and its "curtilage" pursuant to the open fields doctrine. See sections § 4-2 and 4-19, supra.

In Dow Chemical Co. v. United States, the United States Supreme Court held that the open areas of an industrial complex are not analogous to the curtilage of a dwelling. The court found that aerial photographing of the complex from a plane in public navigable airspace was not a violation of the Fourth Amendment. Thus, the Court does not extend the coverage of the Fourth Amendment curtilage of an industrial complex to the extent of the protection of the curtilage of the home, but it still enjoys a greater protection than the true open field. See sections § 4-2 and 4-19, supra, on curtilage.

In California v. Ciraolo, decided the same day as Dow Chemical, the Court held that aerial naked-eye observation, from an altitude of 1,000 feet, of the fenced curtilage of a home did not violate the Fourth Amendment because there is no reasonable expectation of privacy within the curtilage of what could be seen by the naked eye from the navigable air space. Hence, the information obtained from these observations could be used to obtain a search warrant for the search and seizure of marijuana growing in the fenced yard.

In Florida v. Riley, the United States Supreme Court concluded that "surveillance of the interior of a partially covered greenhouse in a residential backyard from the vantage point of a helicopter located 400 feet above the greenhouse [does not constitute] a 'search' for which a warrant is required under the Fourth Amendment. . . ."

In Thomas v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals considered a greenhouse located in a heavily wooded area on a two acre tract about 35 yards from a mobile home in which the defendant lived. The trial court concluded that the greenhouse was not within the curtilage of the house. The pilot of a Georgia State Patrol helicopter had just left a patch of marijuana in the area and was still operating at an altitude of 100 to 150 feet. He saw heavy green plants in the greenhouse but could not identify them. When he passed over the area again, he could see several trays of suspected marijuana on the outside of the property. The pilot radioed the information to deputies on the ground nearby. The deputies knocked on the door of the mobile home. When they received no response, they went to the greenhouse. No one else was present at the greenhouse, but they saw what appeared to be marijuana growing in trays outside the greenhouse and hundreds of marijuana plants inside. Based on the above information, a search warrant was obtained and a search conducted. The appellate court relied on the open fields doctrine and affirmed the denial of the motion to suppress.

In Katz v. United States, the United States Supreme Court emphasized that the Fourth Amendment protected persons and not places, and held that in determining whether the Fourth Amendment had been violated, the question was whether or not the officer's conduct "violated the privacy upon which [the defendant] justifiably relied." Prior to Oliver, some courts applied Katz to open fields cases. However, Georgia and a number of other jurisdictions have always followed Hester.

Generally, warrantless aerial observations have not been regarded as violative of the Fourth Amendment because it is said that no reasonable expectation of privacy is violated.

See section § 4-38 et seq., supra, on plain view warrantless searches. See Annotation, "Admissibility in Evidence of Aerial Photographs," 85 A. L. R. 5th 671 (2001).

§ 4-43 Warrantless searches—Jails, prisons, probationers, and inmates

A person on probation, like all other persons, has a right to be free from unreasonable searches and seizures. His probationary status is not an automatic exception to the warrant requirement.

The defendant's status as a probationer, however, is a circumstance to be considered in determining whether a search by a probation officer is reasonable. The Georgia Court of Appeals concluded that a warrantless search of a probationer is reasonable if, under all the circumstances, the probation officer acts reasonably to effectuate the legitimate operation of the probation supervisory process. Cases from some other jurisdictions have perhaps more strictly limited the Fourth Amendment protection of inmates and probationers.

In Griffin v. Wisconsin, the United States Supreme Court considered a state statute which authorized a warrantless search of a probationer's home by a probation officer where there are "reasonable grounds." The court held the statute to be constitutional and pointed out that although the Fourth Amendment requires that all home searches be reasonable, probationers and parolees "do not enjoy the 'absolute liberty to which every citizen is entitled, but only . . . conditional liberty properly dependent on observance of special 'restrictions.' . . . These restrictions are meant to assure that probation serves as a period of genuine rehabilitation and that the community is not harmed by probationers being at large.' "As a result, in Fox v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court has held that "[a]t a minimum, when a probationer has not consented to a search, a warrantless search of a probationer's home must be based upon reasonable grounds to believe that the probationer has contraband in the home or is engaged in some criminal activity there." Nevertheless, a waiver of Fourth Amendment rights may be valid if it has been negotiated through the plea bargaining process. However, if a defendant did not agree to the condition of probation, a waiver of Fourth Amendments rights is not valid. But in Johnson v. State, the court concluded that the defendant "impliedly consented" to a waiver of his Fourth Amendment rights where the defendant was specifically informed of the waiver at sentencing in the presence of counsel and his counsel did not object. In Woody v. State, the court held that where a defendant agrees to consent as a condition of probation, it is valid. In Samson v. California, the United States Supreme Court upheld the validity of a state statute that required all parolees to consent to a search of their premises when requested by law enforcement officers "with or without a search warrant and with or without cause." However, the waiver of Fourth Amendment rights provided as a condition of probation or parole cannot be used after the fact to justify a warrantless search by officers who were not aware of the waiver.

In Howard v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals held that corrections officials have authority to condition a visit to a correctional institution on the willingness of the visitor to submit to a search for contraband or other items prohibited by O.C.G.A. § 42–5–15. The same case also held that where a warning sign has been placed at an entrance way stating that vehicles passing through the "guard line" of the prison are subject to a search, prison officials also have authority to search a vehicle of an employee parked inside the "guard line."

In Hudson v. Palmer, the United States Supreme Court held that "society is not prepared to recognize as legitimate any subjective expectation of privacy that a prisoner might have in his prison cell and that, accordingly, the Fourth Amendment proscription against unreasonable searches does not apply within the confines of a prison cell. The recognition of privacy rights for prisoners in their individual cells simply cannot be reconciled with the concept of incarceration and the needs and objectives of penal institutions." However, prisoners must "be accorded those rights not fundamentally inconsistent with imprisonment itself or incompatible with the objectives of incarceration."

In State v. Henderson, the court rejected the state's contention that a valid search warrant was not required before searching the defendant's cell, finding that when a search of a cell of a pretrial detainee is "conducted by representatives of the prosecution solely for the purpose of uncovering incriminating evidence which could be used against the detainee at trial, rather than out of concern for any of the legitimate prison objectives . . . , the pre-trial detainee retains a limited but legitimate expectation of privacy that he would be protected in such circumstances from an unreasonable search. . . ."

In Franklin v. State, the court recognized the right of officials to censor letters written by a defendant during pre-trial confinement as an aid to maintenance of discipline in the confinement facility. The court also concluded that an incriminating letter written by a defendant while incarcerated was admissible. In Thomas v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court held that "[f]or security and maintenance purposes, jail officials must have access to the cells and personal effects of all prisoners. . . . Letters found as a result of these searches . . . [are] not within the scope of the Fourth Amendment and . . . [are] therefore admissible."

In Block v. Rutherford, the United States Supreme Court held that an inmate in a jail has no due process right to be present during irregular "shake down" searches of cells.

However, in discussing the search of inmates' body cavities, the Court of Appeals in McCullough v. State stated that, while inmates have a decreased expectation of privacy and that body cavity searches may normally be conducted without a warrant, such searches must still be conducted in a reasonable manner. In order to justify such searches, the government "must show that a legitimate penological need necessitated the search, that the need could not have been satisfied by a more narrow means, and that the search and any consequent seizure were conducted in a reasonable manner." See section 4-56, infra, on scope and intensity of search.

See section 4-57, infra, on second search. See section 5-22, infra, on non-testimonial evidence under the United States Constitution. See section 26-19, infra, on the validity of consent to warrantless searches as a condition of probation. See section 14-78, infra, on expectation of privacy, and section 4-56, infra, on scope and intensity of a search. See Annotations, "Validity, Under Fourth Amendment, of Warrantless Search of Parolee or His Property by Parole Officer," 32 A. L. R. Fed. 155 (1977); "Fourth Amendment as Protecting Prisoner Against Unreasonable Searches and Seizures," 32 A. L. R. Fed. 601 (1977); "Censorship and Evidentiary Use of Unconvicted Prisoners' Mail," 52 A. L. R. 3d 548 (1973); "Censorship of Convicted Prisoners' 'Nonlegal' Mail," 47 A. L. R. 3d 1192 (1973).

§ 4-44 Warrantless searches—Border searches

A search at a border incident to the entrance of a person into the United States is not protected by the Fourth Amendment; hence, there is no warrant requirement for such searches. "Travelers may be . . . stopped in crossing an international boundary, because of national self-protection reasonably requiring one entering the country to identify himself as entitled to come in, and his belongings as effects which may be lawfully brought in."

Rules applying to border searches are important in Georgia since an airport at which passengers arrive after a non-stop flight from outside the country is "the functional equivalent to a border" of the United States. A search by customs agents of passengers at such an airport is not limited by the Fourth Amendment. Thus, a person and his baggage arriving at a customs area may be searched without the slightest suspicion even after the passenger has cleared the customs area.

There is authority which indicates that the defendant must be kept under constant surveillance from the time he leaves the customs area until he is searched in order to protect the privacy of the person and to ensure that any unlawful items found on him were not obtained in this country. However, the validity of a search removed from the customs area depends upon the totality of the circumstances, including the amount of time which has elapsed, the distance, and the extent of surveillance. See Annotation, "Validity of Warrantless Search Under Extended Border Doctrine," 102 A. L. R. Fed. 269 (1991).

While border searches are not controlled by the Fourth Amendment, the nature and extent of the search by custom officials is limited. Mere suspicion alone will not justify certain types of searches. If a customs official wishes to have a person disrobe, a real suspicion justifying the search must exist. It has been held that if an examination of body cavities is made, there must be a clear indication that contraband will be found. In United States v. Ek, the court said, "As a search becomes more intrusive, it must be justified by a corresponding higher level of suspicion of wrongdoing."

On April 16, 1984, the Eleventh Circuit handed down at least seven opinions involving the scope and intensity permitted in border searches in this Circuit. In United States v. Vega–Barvo, a border crossing case, the court held that a strip search requires a particularized "reasonable suspicion." This standard is met when "a person behaves in an articulably suspicious manner." "To determine the level of intrusiveness of a search we must focus on the indignity of the search. . . . [P]ersonal indignity suffered by the individual searched controls the level of suspicion required to make the search reasonable. . . . [T]hree factors . . . contribute to personal indignity . . . : (1) physical contact between the searcher and the person searched; (2) exposure of intimate body parts; and (3) use of force." The court then concluded that requiring a person to submit to a warrantless but properly taken x-ray at a hospital is no more intrusive than a strip search. The facts of the case justify a finding of reasonable suspicion that the defendant was a "mule" to carry cocaine in her digestive tract. In United States v. Mosquera–Ramirez, the court upheld the warrantless detention of 12 hours until the defendant discharged the contents of his stomach where there was reasonable suspicion and the defendant refused to consent to an x-ray examination. Likewise, in United States v. Montoya de Hernandez, a similar case, the United States Supreme Court upheld an incommunicado detention of 16 hours to await the defendant's bowel movement. Thereafter, a rectal examination was conducted pursuant to court order. In United States v. Pino, the court said that in order to conduct a rectal search "the facts must be sufficient to raise the level of required suspicion in the minds of experts . . . and . . . the review should not be an ad hoc determination of whether those facts would arouse the suspicion of the court, or an inexperienced person. . . . What is necessary are facts . . . which would cause these inspectors to reasonably believe that contraband was being carried internally and would be revealed in a rectal search: an articulable, particularized suspicion as to the person, and a particularized suspicion as to the location of the drugs."

The statutory provision for border searches does not provide for warrantless searches of residences, but only of people and vehicles. Hence, the Fifth Circuit has found that a warrantless search of the motel room of a person who had just entered the country was invalid. However, in United States v. Richards, the Fifth Circuit held that the border search exception permits the warrantless search of a piece of international mail, even after its delivery to the addressee, if there has been continuous surveillance of the mail and reasonable suspicion exists to believe that it contains contraband.

The Eleventh Circuit in United States v. Chemaly declined to decide whether the Fourth Amendment applied to passengers leaving the country. However, the court held that a warrant is required to search a person leaving for alleged currency violations under 31 U. S. C. § 5317.

See section 3-13, supra, on retention of inanimate objects without probable cause and section 4-45, infra, on search of incoming international mail. See section 3-5, supra, on stops and searches of vessels.

§ 4-45 Warrantless searches—Administrative searches

Border searches, airport searches, searches of prisoners, and perhaps parolees and probationers, may all be considered as a kind of administrative search. They have been discussed before and will not be considered further in this section.

In Camara v. Municipal Court, the United States Supreme Court considered a "safety inspection" of a dwelling by an employee of the Department of Health. Camara refused to permit a warrantless search and was convicted of violating an ordinance requiring occupants to submit to such inspections. The court concluded that in the absence of consent, a search warrant was required before an occupant had to submit to such an inspection. However, the Court also pointed out that a different kind of probable cause or a lesser degree of probable cause was required in the case of such an administrative search than that which is required in the traditional criminal search warrant. The court said that the probable cause required for such an administrative "area warrant" "must exist if reasonable legislative or administrative standards for conducting an area inspection are satisfied with respect to a particular dwelling. Such standards, which will vary with the municipal program being enforced, may be based upon the passage of time, the nature of the building (e.g., a multi-family apartment house), or the condition of the entire area, but they will not necessarily depend upon specific knowledge of the condition of the particular dwelling."

However, in Wyman v. James, the United States Supreme Court held that a home visit by a social worker to a family receiving Aid to Families with Dependent Children money was not a search in the traditional criminal law context of the Fourth Amendment; even if the visit had some characteristics of a search, it was reasonable, and no search warrant was required.

In Illinois v. Krull, the United States Supreme Court held that the exclusionary rule did not apply where officers, in good faith, relied on a statute authorizing a warrantless administrative search which was later held to violate the Fourth Amendment. See Michigan v. DeFillippo, discussed in section 3-2, supra. However, in Yingsum Au v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court applied the exclusionary rule where an officer relied on an ordinance of the City of Marietta in conducting a search and the court found the ordinance in violation of the Fourth Amendment.

In connection with the search of business premises the United States Supreme Court held in United States v. Biswell that when a federal treasury agent requests entry into a locked storeroom of a federally licensed firearms dealer for the purpose of inspecting firearms and ammunition, he has a right to conduct an inspection without first obtaining a search warrant. The court emphasized the broad authority which has historically been recognized in relation to dealers in alcohol and firearms. "When a dealer chooses to engage in this pervasively regulated business and to accept a federal license, he does so with the knowledge that his business records, firearms, and ammunition will be subject to effective inspection." Similarly, in Donovan v. Dewey, the Court held that an inspector acting under the Federal Mine Safety and Health Act could inspect a mine to insure compliance with health and safety standards without first obtaining a search warrant. The court discussed problems of mine safety and pointed out that the Act notifies operators that inspections will be conducted on a regular basis.

However, in Marshall v. Barlow's, Inc., the United States Supreme Court held that an inspector working pursuant to the Occupational Safety and Health Act (OSHA) had no authority to conduct a warrantless inspection of the private areas of an ordinary business against which no complaints had been filed; but the Court again pointed out that probable "cause in the criminal law sense is not required" to obtain an administrative search warrant. Probable cause justifying an administrative search warrant may be based not only on specific evidence of an existing violation but also on a showing that "reasonable legislative or administrative standards for conducting an . . . inspection are satisfied with respect to a particular [establishment]."

In the fire investigations field, in Michigan v. Tyler, the Court held "that an entry to fight a fire requires no warrant, and that once in the building, officials may remain there for a reasonable time to investigate the cause of the blaze." However, a fire may be so devastating that no reasonable expectation of privacy interest remains. If the building is "totally consumed by the fire," there is no violation of the Fourth Amendment by a later warrantless search.

Administrative decisions involving tax levies were involved in G. M. Leasing Corp. v. United States. After determining that the corporation was the alter ego of a delinquent taxpayer, agents, acting without a warrant, seized several automobiles of the corporation from public streets, parking lots, and other open areas. The agents also went to the corporation's office in a cottage-type building and made a forced entry. No seizure was made. However, two days later they again entered the office without a warrant and seized books, records and other property. The Supreme Court concluded that the seizure of the automobiles did not violate the Constitution. However, the warrantless search and seizure of the articles from the office violated the Fourth Amendment since no exigent circumstances existed.

The search of incoming international mail was involved in United States v. Ramsey. In this case, a customs inspector found eight letter-size airmail envelopes in the same mail bag from Thailand. All eight envelopes appeared to have been addressed on the same typewriter. All were bulky and weighed from 3 to 6 times as much as normal international mail. He opened the envelopes without a warrant and found them to contain heroin.

The court concluded that the inspector had "reasonable cause to suspect" that the envelopes contained merchandise or contraband. Thus, the Fourth Amendment did not prohibit the action taken by the inspector because (a) border searches without probable cause and a warrant are reasonable within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment; (b) the inclusion of international mail within the border search exception does not represent any "extension" of that doctrine; (c) the border search exception is not based on exigent circumstances but is a longstanding historically recognized exception to the Fourth Amendment's general requirement that a warrant must be obtained; and (d) the opening of international mail under the guidelines of the statute, when the customs official has reason to believe the mail contains something other than correspondence, does not impermissibly chill free speech under the First Amendment. See section 3-1, supra, on factory surveys to locate illegal aliens.

However, in New York v. Burger, the United States Supreme Court pointed out that the expectation of privacy is greater in a home than in commercial premises and that there is no expectation of privacy in "[c]ertain industries [which] have a history of governmental oversight." Therefore, a warrant was not necessary for officers to conduct an inspection of a junkyard. The Supreme Court has applied this rule in the case of liquor dealers, firearms in a pawnshop, and mines.

See 3 LaFave, Search and Seizure, § 10.1 et seq. (West 1978); 1 Ringel, Searches and Seizures, Arrests and Confessions § 14.1 et seq. (Clark Boardman 1979); 68 Am. Jur. 2d Searches and Seizures § 15; Annotation, "Fourth Amendment's Prohibition of Unreasonable Search and Seizure as Applied to Administrative Inspections of Private Property," 69 L.Ed.2d 1078 (1982). See Annotation, "State and local administrative inspection of and administrative warrants to search pharmacies," 29 A. L. R. 4th 264 (1984). See O.C.G.A. § 2–2–11 on agricultural inspection warrants.

§ 4-46 Warrantless searches—Vehicles—Overview of some United States Supreme Court cases

In Carroll v. United States, the defendant was driving a car from Detroit, to Grand Rapids, Michigan. Agents recognized his car, personally knew Carroll dealt in illegal liquor, and had seen the car on that highway before. The agents also knew the car had been used in the illegal liquor business, and because Detroit is located on an international boundary it was one of the most active centers for introducing illegal liquors into the country. These factors combined gave the agents reasonable cause to believe the defendant was carrying illegal liquor.

Because of this, the warrantless stop, search, and seizure was valid, since it was not reasonably practical to get a search warrant for a moving vehicle. In Maryland v. Dyson, the court reaffirmed Carroll and pointed out that the automobile exception provides that an officer may search a car without a warrant if he has probable cause to believe it contains contraband even if there are no exigent circumstances preventing the officer from getting a search warrant.

In Chambers v. Maroney, a service station attendant was robbed. The robbers and the vehicle they drove were described in a police broadcast. Within an hour, and within two miles of the station, a car and occupants were sighted and stopped by an officer. The occupants were arrested and the car was driven to the police station where it was searched without a warrant and incriminating evidence discovered. The court, in holding the search valid, pointed out that the validity of the search was not dependent on the right to arrest but was dependent on the reasonable cause the seizing officer has for his belief that the contents of the auto offend the law. Since there was probable cause to search where the car was stopped, it could also be searched after it had been towed to the police station.

In Coolidge v. New Hampshire, the court concluded that where Coolidge was arrested in his house there was no right to search his automobile parked in his drive as an incident to the arrest. Also, there was no right to search the vehicle based on probable cause since there were no exigent circumstances. The defendant was in custody. All the members of his immediate family were elsewhere, and guards had been placed at his home. The offense he was thought to have committed had taken place over four weeks before. The court also said, "The word 'automobile' is not a talisman in whose presence the Fourth Amendment fades away and disappears." Likewise, the search may not be justified under the plain view doctrine since its discovery was not inadvertent and there were no exigent circumstances.

§ 4-47 Warrantless searches—Vehicles—General

While the Fourth Amendment limitations apply to vehicles, warrantless examinations of automobiles have been upheld in circumstances in which a search of a home or office would not have been validated. The courts have recognized Fourth Amendment distinctions between homes and automobiles. The following factors have been given as reasons for a somewhat different application of the Fourth Amendment to vehicle searches: (1) The mobility of motor vehicles, as a matter of necessity, prevents rigorous enforcement of the warrant requirement; (2) an individual's expectation of privacy is less in an automobile; (3) automobiles are frequently subject to governmental regulations, such as those relating to licensing and inspection; and (4) the contents of impounded vehicles are routinely inventoried to protect the property of the owner, protect the officers against claims for lost or stolen property, and protect the police from potential danger.

Despite the foregoing considerations, the requirement of a search warrant for a vehicle has been said to be the general rule, and where there is a search without a warrant, the burden is on the government to show the search falls within one of the exceptions to the Fourth Amendment requirement of a warrant. Generally, the following exceptions or limitations may apply to the rule requiring a warrant:

(1) Search incident to a valid arrest.

(2) Where there is probable cause to search.

(3) Where the car is impounded or placed in storage.

(4) Where there is consent to the search.

(5) Search of a car at or near a border of the United States.

(6) Search of abandoned vehicle.

These exceptions to the warrant requirement will be discussed as listed above. Consent searches have been discussed earlier and border searches have been referred to previously.

It should be pointed out that where a defendant is arrested in a stolen automobile, he is said to have no standing or expectation of privacy which will enable him to object to an illegal search of the vehicle.

Also, the United States Supreme Court in Cardwell v. Lewis found that the owner of a car had no expectation of privacy in the exterior of his car. Here the defendant was suspected of having used his automobile to push the victim's vehicle over an embankment. The court said, " 'What a person knowingly exposes to the public, even in his own home or office, is not a subject of Fourth Amendment protection' . . . With the 'search' limited to the examination of the tire on the wheel and the taking of paint scrapings from the exterior of the vehicle left in the public parking lot, we fail to comprehend what expectation of privacy was infringed."

In Illinois v. Caballes, the United States Supreme Court held that the warrantless use of a drug-sniffing dog during a lawful traffic stop does not violate the defendant's legitimate privacy interests where the use of the dog does not impermissibly extend the traffic stop. In so holding, the Court distinguished Kyllo v. United States, stating, "The legitimate expectation that information about perfectly lawful activity will remain private is categorically distinguishable from respondent's hopes or expectations concerning the nondetection of contraband in the trunk of his car." As such, "[a] dog sniff conducted during a concededly lawful traffic stop that reveals no information other than the location of a substance that no individual has any right to possess, does not violate the Fourth Amendment."

See Annotation, "Validity, Under Federal Constitution, of Warrantless Search of Motor Vehicle—Supreme Court Cases," 66 L.Ed.2d 882 (1982). See section 14-78, infra, on examples of expectation of privacy.

§ 4-48 Warrantless searches—Vehicles—Incident to valid arrest

In the vehicle field it is frequently difficult to determine whether a search which was found to be valid by appellate courts was permitted on the theory that the search was incident to a valid arrest or because there was probable cause to conduct the search. Of course, both theories may apply in a given case. The two concepts have been confused and at times improperly lumped together, or used interchangeably. Yet they are different and much of the confusion which exists in the area of automobile searches has resulted from the failure to clearly separate the two concepts.

In Chambers v. Maroney, the United States Supreme Court said "that the search of an auto on probable cause proceeds on a theory wholly different from that justifying the search incident to an arrest: 'The right to search and the validity of the seizure are not dependent on the right to arrest. They are dependent on the reasonable cause the seizing officer has for belief that the contents of the automobile offend against the law.' "

In 1925 it was held that a search incident to an arrest is limited to the immediate area where the defendant is at the time of the arrest, and is to be made, for the most part, contemporaneously with the arrest. The purpose of a search incident to an arrest is to locate weapons and evidence related to the offense for which the arrest is made. The officer has a right, for his own personal safety and the safety of others, to locate weapons which might be used by the defendant in order to escape or to wound or kill an officer or other person. Likewise, the officer has a right to locate and preserve any evidence of the crime for which the defendant is arrested so as to prevent the defendant from destroying such evidence.

In New York v. Belton, the Court emphasized the need for a "straight forward rule" from a federal constitutional standpoint so that "a court will apply a settled principle to a recurring factual situation [so] that a person [can] . . . know the scope of his constitutional protection, . . . [and so] a policeman [can] know the scope of his authority." This was later referred to as a "bright line rule." The court then held "that when a policeman has made a lawful custodial arrest of the occupant of an automobile, he may, as a contemporaneous incident of that arrest, search the passenger compartment of that automobile." This right to search also applies to containers located in the passenger compartment. In Glasco v. Commonwealth, the Supreme Court of Virginia held that when a defendant was a "recent occupant" of a stopped car, officers may, under Belton, search the passenger compartment incident to an arrest even if the defendant had walked away from the vehicle at the time of the arrest.

The right to search the passenger compartment incident to a valid arrest is not lost at the time the defendant is placed in a police car and when the contents are no longer in the control of the defendant. The vehicle rule has been held applicable to a small airplane, a ship, a motor boat, and a wagon. In New York v. Belton, in a footnote, the Court said, " 'Container' here denotes any object capable of holding another object. It thus includes closed or open glove compartments, consoles, or other receptacles located anywhere within the passenger compartment, as well as luggage, boxes, bags, clothing, and the like. Our holding encompasses only the interior of the passenger compartment of an automobile and does not encompass the trunk." In Boyd v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals held that under the Belton rule officers could search an open overnight bag in the open bed of a pickup when the officers arrested the occupants of the truck.

However, in Knowles v. Iowa, the United States Supreme Court refused to extend the bright line rule allowing a search incident to an arrest in a case in which the driver was stopped for speeding. The court held a state statute unconstitutional which provided "that the issuance of a citation in lieu of arrest 'does not affect the officer's authority to conduct an otherwise lawful search.' "The state supreme court had "interpreted this provision as providing authority to officers to conduct a full-blown search of an automobile and driver in those cases where police elect not to make a custodial arrest and instead issue a citation. . . ." The United States Supreme Court pointed out that neither of "the two historical rationales for the 'search incident to arrest' exception: (1) the need to disarm the suspect in order to take him into custody, and (2) the need to preserve evidence for later use at trial" justified a search in this case.

In State v. Escobar, the Georgia Court of Appeals affirmed the granting of a motion to suppress where there had been a valid arrest, a search of the interior of a van, and then the removal of a misaligned piece of molding from the outside of the vehicle. After the removal of the molding, with the aid of a flashlight and through a crack about an inch wide, officers "observed yellow and brown wrapped material. The compartment was later accessed by drilling into the vehicle, and eighteen individually wrapped kilogram packages of cocaine were recovered." It was the removal of the van's body molding that was outside the parameters of a legal search and thus illegal.

It has been held that the right to search containers found in the passenger compartment as an incident to a lawful arrest does not apply when the search occurred some five hours after the arrest. However, the United States Supreme Court by per curiam order vacated that judgment.

In State v. Massenburg, the North Carolina court held that under Belton a locked glove compartment may be searched incident to an arrest. In the Seventh Circuit case of United States v. Veras, the court held that under Belton an officer has a right to search a hidden compartment located between the top of the back seat and the rear window.

In 1977, the United States Supreme Court held that when a driver is stopped for driving a vehicle with an expired license plate, the officer may order the driver to step out of the automobile before he asks the driver for his driver's license. Apparently this rule will be applied to all cases where a defendant is stopped for a traffic violation. However, as pointed out in the chapter on stop-and-frisk, supra, an officer generally has no authority to make a stop of a vehicle unless he at least has a reasonable articulable suspicion that a traffic violation has occurred or that an occupant is otherwise subject to seizure.

However, where an officer stops a motorist for speeding and it is "the standard procedure when he arrested someone for a traffic violation . . . to issue the driver a standard citation and offer him the choice of leaving his driver's license with the [officer] . . . in lieu of bond or proceeding to the sheriff's office to make [a] . . . bond," the officer may not take the driver into custody and impound the car so as to make an inventory search. But in Dixon v. State, the court held that when a driver is arrested for speeding and having no proof of insurance or a driver's license, the passenger compartment may be validly searched even if it is later determined that the defendant had a valid license.

Of course, if there is a valid custodial arrest, the officer has the right to search the defendant. If there is a valid custodial arrest of a defendant in an automobile, as an incident of the arrest, the officer may search the passenger compartment of the car as set out above even after the defendant is removed from the immediate area of the automobile or even driven away by the police. In Gooden v. State, the court pointed out that the Belton rule does not apply in Georgia "where there is some necessity for the police to take custody of the vehicle and conduct an inventory search for the protection of the police department and the defendant."

In order to justify a search of an automobile as incident to an arrest, the initial arrest must be valid. There is no right to search an automobile as an incident of a valid arrest after it has been moved to another location. Unlike a search incident to a valid arrest, if there is probable cause to search the car at the scene of the arrest, then the search may be delayed until the defendant and the automobile have been taken to another location. However, where a defendant is arrested in his home and his car is parked on his drive, there is no right as an incident to the arrest to take the car to the police station and search it without a warrant. Likewise, where a defendant is arrested and found in possession of parking-meter keys, a search of his legally parked automobile a half-block away is not incident to the arrest. In State v. Bell, the Court of Appeals affirmed the trial court's order granting a motion to suppress evidence seized from the defendant's auto after the defendant had been arrested and charged with the offense of consuming alcohol in the vicinity of a liquor store in violation of a municipal ordinance. The court ruled that the seizure could not properly be characterized as a search incident to arrest because: the defendant had left his vehicle on his own initiative; the arrest was in no way related to the operation of the motor vehicle; and, the arresting officer's safety was never in jeopardy. In State v. Lejeune, the Supreme Court in reversing a trial court's order denying a motion to suppress based upon the "automobile exception" to the general requirement of a warrant for a search observed: "the 'automobile exception' cases do not hold that a search warrant is never needed to search a car. There is an automobile exception to the search warrant requirement, not an exemption." (emphasis in original). However, in a case where a driver is stopped for a defective taillight and then arrested for driving under the influence, the court held that the officer had the right to search the trunk of the car, not as an incident to the arrest, but because of facts giving the officer probable cause for searching the car for marijuana such as the odor of marijuana, a passenger being seen trying to throw something out of the car, and other facts.

In addition to a search incident to an arrest, the Georgia courts have recognized the limited right of officers to momentarily detain a citizen for a routine license check though there is no probable cause for an arrest. During a license check, probable cause for an arrest may be discovered by the officer. However, such license checks are "not [to] be used as a subterfuge to detain citizens for the purpose of searching their automobiles when they are under no founded suspicion." Roadblocks to check licenses are regarded as preventive therapy to determine if drivers meet the legislative determination of fitness to drive. See section 3-9, supra, on roadblocks. Nevertheless, an officer has no right to a Terry frisk of the driver of a vehicle simply because the officer is suspicious or because the defendant acts in a suspicious manner. Moreover, it has been held that even when there is a right to conduct a Terry frisk, if the occupants get out of the car and the officers are between the occupants and vehicle, there is no justification for one of the officers sticking his head in the vehicle to check for weapons.

In State v. Watts, in discussing the search of an auto, the court said that to establish probable cause for the issuance of a warrant by a magistrate or to establish exigent circumstances justifying a search without a warrant three elements are essential: "[1] that there is reason to accept the informer's reliability; [2] that the facts are sufficient to show how the informer obtained his information or that the criminal activity is described in such detail as to negate its being a mere rumor; and [3] that the information is current, not stale."

See section 2-11, supra, on probable cause to arrest without a warrant for an offense committed in the presence of an officer; sections 4-26 and 4-27, supra, on general searches incident to an arrest; and section 4-15, supra. In connection with the search of suitcases in a vehicle driven by a defendant at the time of his arrest, see sections 4-26 and 4-27, supra. See section 4-49, infra, on search of an automobile based on probable cause and section 3-11, supra, on frisk of a vehicle. See Annotation, "Validity, Under Federal Constitution, of Warrantless Search of Motor Vehicle—Supreme Court Cases," 66 L.Ed.2d 882, 887 (1982).

§ 4-49 Warrantless searches—Vehicles—Probable cause—General

In Carroll v. United States, the United States Supreme Court held that officers may search a stopped automobile without a warrant if there is probable cause to believe that contraband or other evidence of crime is within the vehicle and it is not practicable to secure a warrant. Thus, in the case of a motor vehicle, if there is probable cause to believe that it contains evidence which is seizable and there are exigent circumstances, an officer may conduct a warrantless search. In the 1996 case of Pennsylvania v. Labron, the United States Supreme Court held that a search of an automobile based on probable cause does not require exigent or unforeseen circumstances. " '[R]eady mobility' [amounts to] an exigency sufficient to excuse failure to obtain a search warrant. . . . If a car is readily mobile and probable cause exists to believe it contains contraband, the Fourth Amendment thus permits police to search the vehicle without more." The United States Supreme Court, in Maryland v. Dyson in 1999, upheld the stopping of a vehicle and a warrantless search of a vehicle based on probable cause even though there was sufficient time after the informant's tip to obtain a warrant and it would not have been significantly difficult to get a warrant. This has been said to be true because of the mobility of automobiles. A vehicle can quickly be moved out of the jurisdiction in which a warrant is obtained. However, the same rule has been applied to an automobile which has been rendered immobile as a result of a collision. The Carroll rule has been held to be applicable to an airplane.

In Chambers v. Maroney, the United States Supreme Court held that if there is probable cause to search the vehicle where it is stopped or located, the search may be delayed until the automobile is moved to another location. In California v. Carney, the Court applied the Carroll rule to an operable motor home on a public parking lot, and in United States v. Hamilton, the Ninth Circuit applied the Carroll rule to a motor home parked in a private drive.

It would be unreasonable to authorize officers to stop every automobile on the chance of finding contraband. In order to stop and search a car on a public highway, there must be probable cause for believing that the vehicle contains contraband. The "probable cause determination must be based on objective facts that could justify the issuance of a warrant by a magistrate and not merely on subjective good faith of the police officers." In addition, where the initial action of the police is improper, e.g., stopping a motorist without some objective basis for suspicion of wrongdoing, an intervening legitimate ground for stopping the driver, e.g., resisting arrest, may serve to purge the taint of an otherwise illegal stop and justify the use of any evidence seized in connection therewith.

In Colorado v. Bannister, the United States Supreme Court held that where there was probable cause to believe that articles appearing in plain view in an automobile were stolen property, the officer may seize the items without a search warrant. Also, in People v. Superior Court of Orange County, the California Court of Appeals held that officers may search a vehicle if they have probable cause to believe that a vehicle contains evidence of a crime, because no exigent circumstances need be shown aside from the mobility of the car. In Michigan v. Thomas, the United States Supreme Court held that a second search could be conducted by officers, without a search warrant, even after the vehicle had been immobilized by being in police custody. In Boggs v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals held that where an officer has "probable cause to believe that contraband was contained somewhere in appellant's automobile, he was authorized to conduct a search of its contents, including the locked strongbox." In California v. Acevedo, the United States Supreme Court pointed out that "[t]o the extent that the Chadwick–Sanders rule protects privacy, its protection is minimal. . . . Sanders was explicitly undermined in Ross. [See section 4-52, infra.] . . . [I]t is better to adopt one clear-cut rule to govern automobile searches and eliminate the warrant requirement for closed containers set forth in Sanders. . . 'Probable cause to believe that a container placed in the trunk of [an automobile] contains contraband or evidence does not justify a search of the entire [vehicle].' . . . In the case before us, the police had probable cause to believe that the paper bag in the automobile's trunk contained marijuana. That probable cause now allows a warrantless search of the paper bag. . . . The police may search an automobile and the containers within it where they have probable cause to believe contraband or evidence is contained."

There must be at least as much probable cause for a vehicular search without a warrant as would be required to obtain a search warrant from a magistrate. In Love v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals said, "An automobile search may be conducted without a warrant provided it is based on facts that would justify the issuance of a warrant." The facts known to the officers involved must be such as would lead a prudent man in the same circumstances to believe that contraband is illegally possessed in a vehicle or that tools or fruits of a crime are there. In McKinney v. State, the court held that exigent circumstances were not necessary to justify the warrantless search of an automobile. However, exigent circumstances plus a general inarticulable suspicion are not sufficient. The presence or absence of probable cause is to be determined from the totality of circumstances. The fact that it is the usual practice among officers to search stopped cars will not render a search valid.

The doctrine of collective knowledge of officers conducting a common investigation applies to the search of an automobile just as it applies to an arrest. See section 2-11, supra. Thus, the Georgia Court of Appeals, in Parker v. State, stated that especially "when an officer is operating under the exigent circumstances required for a warrantless search of a car, we cannot require a police officer to radio to another officer all the information he has about a suspect, the source of his information, and the background of his informant in order that the receiving officer may make an independent determination as to whether he has probable cause to stop and search the automobile in question. . . . [The] searching officer need not personally be aware of all the facts which would support a probable cause determination so long as it can be established by evidence that the searching officer's actions were the end result of a chain of information-sharing; one link of which is an officer in possession of the 'information requisite to support an independent judicial assessment of probable cause.' " However, in Duke v. State, the Court of Appeals acknowledged in response to a motion to suppress that the state was entitled to rely on the collective knowledge of law enforcement to satisfy the probable cause element to a warrantless search of an auto and its driver. However, while the arresting officer was acting appropriately by performing a stop and search, after receiving orders from his dispatch to stop a specific vehicle believed to be involved in drug activity, the Court nonetheless suppressed the evidence because the State failed to show the source of the information provided over the police radio or any reason for the order to make the stop. See sections 2-11, 3-2, 3-7, and 4-9, supra, on collective knowledge establishing an articulable suspicion.

See section 2-11, supra, on probable cause to arrest and section 4-7, supra, on probable cause to obtain a search warrant. See section 4-52, infra, on nature of search permitted. Also see section 4-29, supra, on exigent circumstances. Generally, see Annotation, "Validity, Under Federal Constitution, of Warrantless Search of Motor Vehicle—Supreme Court Cases," 66 L.Ed.2d 882, 889 (1982).

§ 4-50 Warrantless searches—Vehicles—Circumstances not amounting to probable cause

The following situations illustrate cases in which the Georgia Court of Appeals determined that probable cause to search a vehicle did not exist where (1) the police were notified by campus police from the local college to be on the lookout for a car fitting the description of a defendant's vehicle because of a campus traffic violation; (2) an officer recognized a driver as one he believed to possess marijuana and observed a cigarette paper in the car; (3) marijuana could not be seized from a car where an officer's most favorable testimony to the state was that he saw, through the window of the automobile and through the open aperture of the unlit glove compartment, a bag containing a substance he believed was contraband; (4) officers observed a man in a car who matched the description of a person who had reportedly recently retrieved a plastic bag from under some leaves, they had no right to search the man's car, even though they smelled alcohol from within the automobile; (5) an officer observed the passing of a paper bag from one car to another late at night, the car to which the bag is passed pulls away with its lights off, and, on stopping the vehicle, there is a paper sack which the officer partially sees behind the passenger seat; the officer asked, "What's in the paper bag?" and the driver said, "What paper bag?"; (6) there is no probable cause to search a car, which was not seen violating any law, but which was seen in a commercial district in the early morning hours approximately 500 yards from a place officers later learned had been burglarized; (7) likewise, the observation of black suspects near a Cadillac in the driveway of a residence in a "white" neighborhood and their shortly driving away did not constitute probable cause for an arrest for burglary; (8) officers had probable cause to search the defendant's car and the defendant was arrested a number of miles away from the car, there were found to be no exigent circumstances justifying a warrantless search where officers could have obtained a search warrant; and, (9) the "mere entry and exit of a house where drugs had been found six months earlier does not rise to the level of reasonable, articulable suspicion of a drug purchase" and hence would not provide the probable cause to stop the motor vehicle which took the defendant to and from the house.

§ 4-51 Warrantless searches—Vehicles—Circumstances amounting to probable cause

The observation by police officers of an object passed out of a car in exchange for money has been held to establish probable cause where the officers had reliable information that the car was being used to transport drugs. Where a car sped off when officers approached and officers noted the odor of marijuana when the car was stopped, there was probable cause to search the automobile. In State v. Folk, the court held that "a trained police officer's perception of the odor of burning marijuana, provided his ability to identify that odor is placed into evidence, constitutes sufficient probable cause to support the warrantless search of a vehicle," and pointed out that the court has previously found "the 'alert' of a trained narcotics dog, standing alone, sufficient to provide probable cause for the search of a vehicle."

In Pittman v. State, the court concluded that there was probable cause and exigent circumstances justifying a search of a car, including its trunk. Exigent circumstances seem clear. However, the report of the case fails to indicate how the known reliable informant obtained the information he furnished to the officer. The informant stated that the defendant was going to meet a black female at the Gulf station on Riverside Drive in the next few minutes and that the defendant would have a quantity of cocaine and be alone in a late model Oldsmobile Toronado. The officer went to the location, and the defendant arrived within five minutes alone in a car as described. The defendant walked behind the station and returned with a black female. The defendant looked around "apparently to see if the area was clear." Both persons got in the defendant's car and drove off. The officer stopped the car and searched it. The court pointed to "the detailed nature of his tip, and the corroboration of his information" as establishing probable cause.

Where a rape occurred in a red and white car in a rural area and such a vehicle was found with blood both on the inside and outside, a search of the car was held valid. After a high-speed chase, the arrest of a murder suspect has been held to constitute probable cause to search the interior of the car. However, it has been held that there is no probable cause to search a vehicle simply because an officer smells the odor of marijuana smoke.

§ 4-52 Warrantless searches—Vehicles—Nature of search permitted

It has been held in Georgia that where a car is speeding, the driver appears to be intoxicated, the odor of marijuana smoke is detected, a passenger is found to have marijuana, and the driver passes an alcohol intoximeter test, there is probable cause to search "every part of the vehicle and its contents that may conceal . . . contraband."

In United States v. Ross, officers received information from a reliable informant that a described person was selling narcotics and kept the contraband in the trunk of a car at a certain location. After locating the automobile, the officers left the area and returned about five minutes later. They observed the vehicle being driven away and stopped it. The interior of the car was searched, and one of the officers looked into the trunk, where he found a closed brown paper bag. He opened the bag and found glassine bags containing a white powder. Ross was charged with possession of heroin with intent to distribute. The officer also found a leather zipped pouch in the trunk. The Supreme Court held that the warrantless search of the bag and the pouch was valid. The court stated:

"A lawful search of fixed premises generally extends to the entire area in which the object of the search may be found and is not limited by the possibility that separate acts of entry or opening may be required to complete the search. Thus, a warrant that authorizes an officer to search a home for illegal weapons also provides authority to open closets, chests, drawers, and containers in which the weapon might be found. A warrant to open a footlocker to search for marijuana would also authorize the opening of packages found inside. A warrant to search a vehicle would support a search of every part of the vehicle that might contain the object of the search. When a legitimate search is under way, and when its purpose and its limits have been precisely defined, nice distinctions between closets, drawers, and containers, in the case of a home, or between glove compartments, upholstered seats, trunks, and wrapped packages, in the case of a vehicle, must give way to the interest in the prompt and efficient completion of the task at hand.

"This rule applies equally to all containers. . . .

"The scope of a warrantless search based on probable cause is no narrower—and no broader—than the scope of a search authorized by a warrant supported by probable cause. Only the prior approval of the magistrate is waived; the search otherwise is as the magistrate could authorize.

"The scope of a warrantless search of an automobile thus is not defined by the nature of the container in which the contraband is secreted. Rather, it is defined by the object of the search and the places in which there is probable cause to believe that it may be found. Just as probable cause to believe that a stolen lawnmower may be found in a garage will not support a warrant to search an upstairs bedroom, probable cause to believe that undocumented aliens are being transported in a van will not justify a warrantless search of a suitcase. Probable cause to believe that a container placed in the trunk of a taxi contains contraband or evidence does not justify a search of the entire cab. . . .

"The Fourth Amendment proscribes all unreasonable searches and seizures, and it is a cardinal principle that 'searches conducted outside the judicial process, without prior approval by judge or magistrate, are per se unreasonable under the Fourth Amendment—subject only to a few specifically established and well-delineated exceptions.' . . .

"The exception recognized in Carroll is unquestionably one that is 'specifically established and well-delineated.' We hold that the scope of the warrantless search authorized by that exception is no broader and no narrower than a magistrate could legitimately authorize by warrant. If probable cause justifies the search of a lawfully stopped vehicle, it justifies the search of every part of the vehicle and its contents that may conceal the object of the search."

In United States v. Johns, the United States Supreme Court held that where there is probable cause to search a vehicle and probable cause to search a package taken from the vehicle, it is not necessary to obtain a search warrant in order to search the package removed from the vehicle three days after its seizure.

The United States Supreme Court in California v. Acevedo held that where there is probable cause to search a vehicle for contraband and there is probable cause to search a paper bag or container found in the vehicle, officers may search the bag. Acevedo is discussed in section 4-49, supra. In Wyoming v. Houghton, the United States Supreme Court held that where probable cause exists to believe a vehicle contains contraband, the officer has a right to search any container large enough to conceal the object in the vehicle regardless of whether the container belongs to the driver or a passenger.

In Florida v. Jimeno, the Court held that a consent to search a vehicle included a consent to search a folded brown bag found on the floorboard. In United States v. Jaras, the Fifth Circuit held that the consent of a motorist to a search of the car he was driving did not amount to a consent to search suitcases in the trunk which were identified as belonging to a passenger, and the passenger's silence did not amount to a consent.

See sections 4-26 and 4-27, supra, on searches of articles around arrestee. Also see section 4-48, supra, on searches incident to the arrest of a driver of a vehicle, and section 4-53, infra, on searches of occupants of vehicles. See section 3-11, supra, on frisk of a motor vehicle. See section 4-29, supra, on exigent circumstances justifying a warrantless search.

§ 4-53 Warrantless searches—Vehicles—Search of occupants

Generally, it has been held that a passenger in an automobile may not be searched simply because the driver is stopped for speeding or for possession of contraband. However, in Pennsylvania v. Mimms, the Supreme Court held that where a driver is stopped for driving with an expired license plate, the officer may order him to get out of the car before looking at his driver's license. The dissenting opinion concludes that this case means a passenger in any vehicle stopped for a traffic violation may be ordered to get out of the car, but the majority opinion does not mention this. By mere presence in an automobile, a person does not lose his Fourth Amendment protection from search of his person. However, it has been held that if an officer alone is making an arrest for driving without a license and recognizes the passengers in the automobile as suspects in a recent crime, he may frisk them where there is a substantial risk of possible danger to his safety. It is not necessary that the officer be frightened by the threat of danger if he is aware of sufficient specific facts to suggest that he is in danger. In Arizona v. Johnson, the United States Supreme Court clarified the issue of whether police needed an articulable suspicion that the passenger in a vehicle stopped by the police has committed a crime before being subjected to a search. The court concluded that once the police detain the passenger by asking him or her to step out of the car, the passenger may be subject to search provided only that the police have reason to believe the passenger is armed.

Where a driver is arrested and there is probable cause to believe that evidence pertaining to the crime is in the automobile, the police officer may require the passengers to get out so that he may safely and effectively search the vehicle, and to prevent them from destroying the evidence. However, where defendants are stopped driving a stolen car and there is probable cause to arrest them, they may be searched incident to their arrests, like any one else who is arrested.

Pursuant to Belton, discussed in section 4-48, supra, a California court has held that where an occupant of an automobile is arrested, officers may search containers in the passenger compartment which belong to occupants who have not been arrested.

See sections 4-48 and 4-49, supra, on automobile searches. Also see sections 4-26 and 4-27, supra, on searches incident to an arrest. See section 14-76, infra, on standing of a passenger to challenge use of evidence seized following the search of a motor vehicle.

§ 4-54 Warrantless searches—Vehicles—Abandonment

Abandoned vehicles may generally be searched without a warrant. Sometimes such a warrantless search is said to be valid because the owner has no standing or expectation of privacy.

Strictly speaking, the question of whether or not a vehicle can be searched should probably turn on whether the owner had a reasonable expectation of privacy in the vehicle under all the circumstances existing. It has also been found that an automobile may be temporarily abandoned. A vehicle may be abandoned if it is given to another person. Also, a vehicle may be abandoned by leaving it at a service station for an unreasonable period of time. More commonly, a vehicle is deemed to have been abandoned when it has been chased by police, and after a wreck the driver flees.

§ 4-55 Warrantless searches—Vehicles—Inventory search after impound, put in storage, or condemned

In South Dakota v. Opperman, the United States Supreme Court held that, from a federal constitutional standpoint, a locked automobile impounded for a parking violation may be inventoried even if it has to be unlocked, and evidence discovered in the glove compartment during the process is admissible in evidence against the owner if the police department has a standard procedure of inventorying the contents of such vehicles.

In Colorado v. Bertine, the United States Supreme Court held that the Fourth Amendment does not prevent the "inventory search" of a closed container in the passenger compartment of an automobile which had been impounded, even if some less intrusive method might achieve the purpose of the inventory provided the inventory was carried out in compliance with standard police procedures. The court emphasized the importance of a "single familiar standard . . . to guide police officers."

In Florida v. Wells, the United States Supreme Court considered a case in which the defendant was arrested for driving under the influence of alcohol. Pursuant to permission, during an inventory search the officers found two marijuana cigarettes in the vehicle and a locked suitcase in the trunk. The suitcase contained a large amount of marijuana. The highway patrol had no policy on opening closed containers. Based on this, the Florida court suppressed evidence of the contraband found in the locked suitcase. In affirming, the United States Supreme Court pointed out that "[a] police officer may be allowed sufficient latitude to determine whether a particular container should or should not be opened in light of the nature of the search and characteristics of the container itself. Thus, while policies of opening all containers or of opening no containers are unquestionably permissible, it would be equally permissible, for example, to allow the opening of closed containers whose contents officers determine they are unable to ascertain from examining the containers exteriors. The allowance of the exercise of judgment based on concerns related to the purposes of an inventory search does not violate the Fourth Amendment." In Martin v. State, the court held that "[w]hether there was a department inventory policy and whether the officer knew it, if there was one, is not determinative of the issue although the existence of a policy would be relevant. . . . Justification of such a search, however, is premised upon the validity of the impoundment."

In State v. Evans, the Georgia Court of Appeals held that pursuant to standard procedure, an officer may unlock the trunk of an automobile and inventory an unlocked container found within even in the absence of probable cause. In Michigan v. Thomas, the United States Supreme Court upheld the search of an air vent under the dash after an earlier inventory search had disclosed contraband in the glove compartment. The court emphasized that the right to make a probable cause search is not lost by the impoundment of the vehicle.

Where there is such a standard policy, there is the right to inventory an impounded vehicle for the purpose of (1) protecting the owner's property while he is in custody or elsewhere; (2) protecting the officer against claims of the owner for alleged missing property; (3) protecting the public and the police from illegal weapons which might be contained in the car; and (4) determining whether the vehicle has been stolen. In Pierce v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals said, "[i]nventory searches have two purposes: [1] to protect the vehicle and the property in it, and [2] to safeguard the police or other officers from claims of lost possessions." In conducting such an inventory, an officer may presumably check all areas of the automobile which he has reasonable probable cause to believe might contain any of the items to be inventoried. These areas normally include an inspection of the glove compartment, the trunk, the top of the seats, under the front seat and the floor of the automobile. In Whatley v. State, the court upheld an inventory conducted under the hood of a vehicle and said the areas examined need only be related to the purposes set out in Opperman. Of course, if in conducting such an inventory the officer finds contraband or stolen property, he may seize it. However, an inventory of the contents may not be used as a pretext for an investigatory police search. In State v. Lowe, the court pointed out that an impoundment "is valid only if there is some necessity for the police to take charge of [the car]. . . . In each instance, the ultimate test for the validity of the police's conduct is whether, under the circumstances then confronting the police, their conduct was reasonable within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment. . . . The existence of a department policy is relevant but not determinative:" of the right to impound and inventory.

If the impoundment is not valid, the inventory or search is not valid. Thus, where the owner of an automobile is arrested a half block away from his legally parked automobile and there is nothing to indicate the police intended to impound the car, the police may not search the car for the purpose of discovering fruits of the crime for which the defendant was arrested. Likewise, it has been held that where a defendant is arrested for speeding and driving under the influence while driving a borrowed car and the defendant asks that a passenger be permitted to return the car to the owner at a designated address, it is improper for the officer to have the vehicle impounded without seeking instructions from the owner. Where an owner makes his own arrangements to have his car towed away, an arresting officer has no right to conduct an inventory search of the vehicle.

It has been held that where an officer arrests the driver of an automobile for being drunk in a private parking lot owned by the driver, the officer has no right to call a wrecker and inventory the contents of the car. Likewise, officers have no right to impound a vehicle parked in a shopping mall where the owner is arrested. It has been held that where a defendant meets an undercover agent in a parking lot of a night club and goes into the building and comes back with a large amount of marijuana which is placed in the agent's car and the defendant is arrested, there is no right to impound and inventory the defendant's car. But where a defendant is arrested and separated from his automobile which is parked on a yellow curb and is obstructing traffic, the car can be impounded and inventoried. Likewise, where a driver is arrested driving under the influence and his car is impounded and inventoried, marijuana found in the trunk is admissible.

However, in Mooney v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court, in 1979, in a murder case said that the validity of a seizure and an inventory search is not dependent "upon the absolute necessity for the police to take charge of property to preserve it." The court cited with approval the case of United States v. Gravitt, in which police arrested men and seized and inventoried their car, which was parked at a motel. Their rent had been paid for two days beyond the time of the seizure of the car. However, officers had reason to expect that the detention would last much longer than two days. The court concluded that the car might have been stolen from the parking lot or some of the contents might have been taken; thus, it was convenient and reasonable for the car to be taken immediately after the arrest.

Nevertheless, in Strobhert v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals reversed the denial of a motion to suppress. Here the defendant was arrested for possession of beer in a park. The defendant was standing by his lawfully parked car when arrested. The vehicle belonged to a member of his family. The defendant had a friend with him when he was arrested. The court held that while an absolute necessity to impound is not required, "a seizure must still be reasonable under the circumstances. . . . [Here] the impoundment was not reasonably necessary. . . . [T]he officer . . . did not even inquire into whether the companion could be trusted with the vehicle. The officer also had not asked about nor given appellant the opportunity to make alternative arrangements for the removal of the vehicle. . . ." There is no right of impoundment "when a driver is arrested and a reliable friend is present who may be authorized and capable of removing the vehicle or where the arrestee expresses some preference for a private towing service." In Reed v. State, a passenger was allowed to drive the vehicle from the place of the defendant's arrest to the sheriff's office. A check gave officers no reason to think the van had been stolen. The court reversed the trial judge after making a finding that the impoundment had not been reasonably necessary. But where a passenger in an automobile tells the arresting officer that he does not have any identification, the officer may assume that the passenger does not have a driver's license and impound the vehicle without offering to let him take it.

In Florida, a court held that an automobile slightly damaged in an accident may not be inventoried by officers simply because the owner is arrested, if the defendant has a friend who is willing to take charge of the vehicle. However, if a vehicle does not have a valid inspection sticker or proper lights (if arrest is at night), it would be unlawful for it to be operated by anyone; hence, officers are not obligated to let a friend of the arrested driver take the car. Likewise, if a car does not have a "valid license plate and current revalidation sticker, if required," it is illegal to operate such a vehicle and it may be impounded. An officer has no right to make an inventory search of a badly wrecked automobile if the driver is not under arrest and has a wrecker of his choice come to tow the car away.

It has been held that if a vehicle is lawfully seized for forfeiture or condemnation, it may apparently be "searched" without a warrant and not simply subjected to an "inventory" of its contents. In Florida v. White, the United States Supreme Court held that if officers have probable cause to believe a vehicle is subject to civil forfeiture, the officers may seize the vehicle if it is located in a public place.

Also, if there is probable cause to arrest a driver, the passenger compartment of a vehicle may be searched before the vehicle is impounded. See section 4-48, supra, on search of a vehicle incident to a valid arrest.

If a defendant fails to raise the issue of impoundment in a motion to suppress, there is no burden on the state to prove that the impoundment was proper.

In State v. Haddock, the court held that the trial judge "erred as a matter of law in granting . . . [a] motion to suppress" because the state failed to produce the impound inventory sheet.

See section 4-49, supra, on probable cause and exigent circumstances justifying a search.

§ 4-56 Scope and intensity of search

The validity of the scope of a search depends, generally, upon the reasonableness of the search in light of its purpose. A search which is initially valid may violate the Fourth Amendment because of "its intolerable intensity and scope." The "scope of [a] search must be 'strictly tied to and justified by' the circumstances which rendered its initiation permissible." Some of the limits of a search as they apply under the various circumstances have been discussed in those sections which deal with the particular situations.

In United States v. Irizarry, the First Circuit pointed out that the officers had no authority to search the space adjacent to an open ceiling tile in a motel bathroom after the occupant of the room had been arrested outside the motel room and then taken back inside after a crowd began to gather. The government contended that Chimel v. California did not apply because of exigent circumstances and probable cause to believe that the defendant possessed a pistol and contraband in the room. However, the Court concluded that there were no exigent circumstances after the defendant had been arrested. Hence, there was sufficient time to get a search warrant.

Even when officers are executing a valid search warrant, this does not mean that they may conduct an intensive examination of all parts of the premises described in the warrant. They may only look where the items described in the warrant might be. Thus, if an officer is executing a search warrant for a stolen television set, he has no right to rummage through desk drawers of other places too small to contain a television set. "The same meticulous investigation which would be appropriate in a search for two small canceled checks could not be considered reasonable where agents are seeking a stolen automobile or an illegal still."

Officers are justified in staying on premises only as long as it is necessary to conduct a reasonable search. A search warrant does not confer on the officer executing it the authority to make an unreasonable search. The officer must not exceed his authority and should be considerate of the comfort, convenience and feelings of the occupants. Officers are obligated to avoid unnecessary damage to the premises and to terminate the search as soon as the object of the search has been discovered.

Where officers, following information received from a reliable source, used a drug detection dog to sniff out marijuana in the defendant's suitcases at an airline terminal in a public area, the search was held to be reasonable. In State v. Montford, the court held that where there is a reasonable suspicion that a vehicle contains illegal drugs, an officer is authorized to walk a drug dog around the vehicle to see if the dog alerts for drugs. If "the dog alerted for drugs, that factor, combined with the factors prompting the use of the drug dog . . . established probable cause . . . authorizing the . . . search of [the car's] interior." However, it has also been held that a police officer has no right to take a trained dog into the baggage room, an area not open to the public, to sniff all the baggage in a general exploratory search or "fishing expedition."

Where officers make a warrantless entry in a search of a person believed to require immediate aid and they find a body, they may make a prompt warrantless search of the area to determine if there are other victims present or if the killer is still present. Likewise, officers may make a protective "sweep" of a house in which a body is discovered. See section 4-27, supra, on protective sweeps.

The courts seem to apply a rule of reason in determining the quantity of material which may be validly seized even where the search is legal. Thus, the seizure of the entire contents of a cabin or all of the defendant's files has been held unreasonable.

An inventory of an impounded or forfeited automobile is limited to (1) inventorying the owner's personal articles in the vehicle, (2) searching for illegal weapons, and (3) looking for evidence of ownership of the vehicle. In the case of a search of an automobile based on reasonable probable cause to believe that contraband or stolen property is in a vehicle, an officer may search any part of the automobile where it is reasonable to believe such articles might be concealed.

Except in the case of a border search, strip searches have been limited by Rochin v. California. In Rochin, the United States Supreme Court condemned the use of a stomach pump to forcibly seize swallowed narcotics by saying that such conduct "shocks the conscience." Strip searches of traffic offenders and misdemeanants are usually regarded as invalid. Officers generally have more authority to conduct strip searches of suspects of more serious offenses, and offenses associated with weapons or contraband, but even in these more serious cases, there still seems to be no general constitutional right to conduct a search of body cavities. In Merriweather v. State, the court affirmed the use of "a Heimlich Maneuver" to expel contraband from defendant's mouth. The court said that "[a]lthough forceful extraction of contraband from a criminal suspect implicates the Fourth Amendment and should be avoided whenever possible, a criminal suspect does not have a right to destroy evidence and 'the police are authorized to use reasonable but not excessive force in preventing the destruction or concealment of evidence.' "

However, in Bell v. Wolfish, the United States Supreme Court found no Fourth Amendment violation in requiring that a prisoner, after conviction, be required to submit to strip searches and to expose body cavities for visual inspection after each contact visit with a person from outside the institution and persons in jails and prisons. See section 4-43, supra, on search of probationers and inmates.

See section 3-13, supra, on retention of inanimate objects and section § 4-38 et seq., supra, on plain view. See section 4-26, supra, on search incident to a lawful arrest. See sections 5-22 and 5-23, infra, on the use of surgery on the human body to obtain evidence. See section 4-44, supra, on border searches. See section 4-31, supra, on consent. See Annotation, "Propriety of Search Involving Removal of Natural Substance or Foreign Object From Body by Actual or Threatened Force," 66 A. L. R. Fed. 119 (1984). See Annotation, "Validity, Under Federal Constitution, of Regulations, Rules, or Statutes Allowing Drug Testing of Students," 87 A. L. R. Fed. 148 (1988). See Annotation, "Federal and State Constitutions as Protecting Against Unreasonable Searches and Seizures," 85 A. L. R. 5th 261 (2001).

§ 4-57 Second search

The validity of an initial search, pursuant to a warrant or under an exception to the warrant requirement, generally will not sustain a later search of the same area unless a new warrant is obtained, or unless there again exists a right to search without a warrant. Thus, it has been held that where a prisoner is booked in jail and thoroughly searched, officers may not conduct a warrantless search several days later of his civilian clothes which were placed in the property room at the time of his arrest. However, generally a search of a person and his effects at the time of arrest does not prevent a search at the time the defendant reaches the station house.

In People v. Richards, the court held that a defendant has no reasonable expectation of privacy in items which were inventoried by police at the time of his processing. The item involved was a necklace which the defendant had at the time of his arrest. The Illinois Supreme Court pointed out that the necklace was not in any kind of container and that there was only a "second inspection" of it in order to give the victim of a theft an opportunity to see if she could identify the necklace as the one taken from her. The court concluded that there was no violation of the Fourth Amendment in such a "second inspection." In Williams v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court arrived at the same conclusion without considering expectation of privacy.

Likewise, in Florida v. Meyers, the United States Supreme Court held that where a vehicle has been impounded by officers at the time the defendant was arrested, a second warrantless search some eight hours later is valid even though the car has been retained in a locked secured area.

In Michigan v. Tyler, the United States Supreme Court held that the warrantless entry and inspection of fire marshals of a burning building is proper under the emergency exception to the warrant requirement. Also, their return some four hours later (after daylight) was treated as a continuation of their earlier investigation. However, a still later return and investigation required a search warrant. See section 4-45, supra, on administrative searches.

One exception to the second search doctrine is that which applies in the case of a controlled delivery. In Illinois v. Andreas, the United States Supreme Court held that where contraband is lawfully found in a sealed container and it is resealed by officers and delivered to the addressee under police supervision and there is "no substantial likelihood . . . that the contents of the shipping container were changed during . . . [a] gap in surveillance," it is not necessary for officers to obtain a warrant before seizing and again opening and searching the container. This is said to be true because there is no expectation of privacy in the contents of the container after it is first opened and found to contain contraband. "The simple act of resealing the container to make a controlled delivery does not operate to revive or restore the lawfully invaded privacy rights."

In State v. Fultz, the Georgia Court of Appeals, in a warrant situation and without citing Andreas, arrived at the same conclusion in reversing the grant of a motion to suppress. The trial court had concluded that there had not been a "controlled buy," apparently because the "purchaser" had not been searched before the "buy." The appellate court's reversal was actually based on the failure of the trial court to give sufficient deference to the magistrate's determination of probable cause. See section 4-7, supra, on probable cause.

In State v. Johnston, the manager of a mini-warehouse discovered that the locking device on a unit leased to the defendant had been cut. The manager opened the door and discovered several bags of pills. He recognized the pills as Quaalude, took a number of pills, closed the door, and called officers. When the officers arrived, the manager gave the officer the pills and told him what he had found. The officer then searched the unit. The court sustained the warrantless search on the theory that the defendant had no expectation of privacy after the manager had seen the pills.

See section 4-43, supra, on searches of prisoners and probationers. See section 4-20, supra, on obtaining a second search warrant. See section 4-26, supra, on search and/or seizure of clothing worn at time of arrest.

§ 4-58 Electronic surveillance—General

In Osborn v. United States, Berger v. New York, and Katz v. United States, the United States Supreme Court has shown that when appropriate procedural safeguards are met, a narrowly written statute providing for a system of electronic surveillance does not constitute an unreasonable search and seizure under the Fourth Amendment. The appropriate procedural safeguards required include (1) that an order permitting the surveillance (or an order renewing a previous order) be obtained from a neutral and detached judicial officer; (2) that the applicant show, with the particularity required of a search warrant, that there is probable cause that a crime has been or is being committed and that the defendant is responsible; (3) that the surveillance which is authorized be limited in time and scope to the investigation at hand, so as not to become a series of intrusions, searches, and seizures pursuant to a single showing of probable cause; (4) that the statute overcome the lack of notice by requiring a showing of exigent circumstances as a precondition to the judicial authorization; and (5) that the order be executed and the warrant returned with a dispatch. Of course, no prior judicial authorization is necessary where one party to the communication consents to the monitoring.

O.C.G.A. § 16–11–64.3 was enacted in 2000, providing for application process of an investigation warrant in an emergency situation. Specifically, it must be shown to the Attorney General or a district attorney with jurisdiction that the situation involves "the immediate danger of death or serious physical injury . . . [requiring] the immediate interception . . ." and that "[t]here are grounds upon which [a] . . . warrant pursuant to O.C.G.A. § 16–11–64 could be issued." Additionally, the Code section prevents the subsequent use of evidence obtained if the application is denied or the procurement is terminated prior to a warrant being issued.

In Whatley v. State, the court pointed out that "[t]he standard of probable cause for a wiretap authorization is the same as the standard for a regular search warrant."

All forms of electronic surveillance must be conducted pursuant to the Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act (Title III) of 1968, as well as to the provisions of O.C.G.A. §§ 16–11–60 through 16–11–69, where those provisions are applicable. See Annotation, "Who May Apply or Authorize Application For Order to Intercept Wire or Oral Communications Under Title III of Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968 (18 U.S.C.A. §§ 2510, et seq.)," 169 A. L. R. Fed 169 (2001).

In Porter v. State, tapes of wiretapped conversations were made from February 20 to March 7; however, these tapes were not delivered to the superior court for sealing until March 28. The appellate court held that the defendants' motion to suppress the contents of the tapes should have been granted since the tapes were not submitted to the court for sealing immediately after the recording occurred as is required by 18 U.S.C.A. § 2518(8)(a).

In King v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court held that the harmless error rule did not apply where a trial judge failed to place a judicial seal on tapes which had been made pursuant to a wiretap order. The court pointed out that 18 U.S.C.A. § 2518(8) requires such a seal or a satisfactory explanation for its absence and the absence thereof prevents admissibility of the tapes.

But in Williams v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court held that failure to comply with O.C.G.A. § 16–11–64(b)(5) and (b)(6) did not require suppression of evidence unless the violation would result in prejudice to the defendant. However, the court concluded that violations that affect the quality or quantity of the evidence or the gathering or safeguarding of the evidence may require suppression.

The electronic "devices" regulated by O.C.G.A. § 16–11–60 et seq. include any instrument or apparatus used for overhearing, recording, intercepting, or transmitting sounds, or for observing, photographing, videotaping, recording, and transmitting visual images. A "surveillance warrant" may be issued for an act which endangers the security of the United States or the security of Georgia, or for a person who is committing or has committed the crime of treason, insurrection, rebellion, espionage, sabotage, or any felony involving bodily harm, or any crime involving arson, kidnapping, narcotics, dangerous drugs, or importing, manufacturing, delivering, distributing, dispensing, administering, selling or possessing with intent to distribute marijuana or any controlled substance, or burglary, prostitution, theft, blackmail, extortion, bribery, gambling, racketeering, or any felony involving alcoholic beverage laws or auto theft. In Porter v. State, the court pointed out that a warrant allowing wire interception must contain a statutory minimization provision.

The applicant for an electronic surveillance warrant must be the Attorney General or District Attorney having prosecutorial jurisdiction of a crime. Likewise, the issuing magistrate must be a Superior Court judge having jurisdiction of the crime. In Evans v. State, the court affirmed a superior court judge in Fulton County authorizing wiretaps of telephones in other counties. Under the system used, an inductor coil was placed in each county where each such telephone was located. Here the actual "listening post" was in Fulton County and the court concluded that the inductor coil was not a "device used to overhear, record or intercept . . ." within the meaning of the statute.

However, generally under both state and federal law a party to a telephone conversation may permit a third person to listen to the conversation without the knowledge of the other person, and an informant may conceal a radio transmitter or recorder and carry on a conversation without the knowledge of the other person. See Goger, Daniel's Georgia Handbook on Criminal Evidence (2009 ed.), § 9–16. In United States v. Yonn, the Eleventh Circuit applied the same rule to the warrantless planting of an electronic monitoring device in the defendant's motel room by government agents. The informer reserved the room for the defendant at his request. The device was then used to monitor the conversation between the defendant and the informer. In Smith v. State, the Court of Appeals ruled that consent to the monitoring of an inmate's phone calls may be implied where the institution in which the inmate is confined has a published policy which states that inmates' phone calls are monitored. Proof of such a policy or practice may consist of: lectures which describe the policy to inmates; written notices near the phones used by the inmates; manuals regarding such procedures which are provided to inmates; or recorded messages played on the prison phones before communication can begin.

In the 1992 case of Salmon v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals held that under Georgia law as it then existed there was no prohibition against the interception of a cellular telephone conversation and that cellular telephone users had no justifiable expectation of privacy. However, in 1993 the Legislature enacted O.C.G.A. § 16–11–66.1, which has the effect of reversing Salmon. Under this statute, it is unlawful to intentionally intercept a cellular telephone conversation.

In the Georgia case of Uhler v. State, the court held that it is not necessary to make a written application in order to have the telephone company assist the state by tracing the "call-forwarding" process since this did not involve the interception of electric signals from the telephone lines.

In United States v. Torres, the Seventh Circuit held that Title III was not violated by a video surveillance or by surveillance of other than oral communications.

To be "aggrieved" under Georgia law and suppress the result of a wiretap, "the violation must have occurred on the movants' premises or the unlawfully heard conversation must have been of the movants themselves."

In State v. Anderson, the court considered O.C.G.A. § 16–11–64(b)(8) and held that one condition of the statute is "that there shall be no publication of the information obtained 'other than that necessary and essential to the preparation of and actual prosecution for the crime specified in the warrant.' . . . Any violation of this nonpublication rule renders the wiretap an invasion of privacy and causes the 'evidence and information to be inadmissible in any criminal prosecution.' "

In Williams v. State, the court held as follows: (1) A failure to return the pen register warrant within 30 days of issuance, as required by O.C.G.A. § 16–11–64(b)(6), was not a basis for suppressing intercepted communications from the defendant's telephone because the defendant had no standing to complain of non-compliance with the statutory procedural safeguards when the pen register warrant was actually placed on his mother's telephone. (2) An application for a wiretap on the defendant's telephone did not have to show that conventional investigation techniques had been tried and failed, or were unlikely to be successful, because the purpose of this statute (18 U. S. C. § 2518(1)(c)) "is not to foreclose electronic surveillance until every other imaginable method of investigation has been unsuccessfully attempted, but simply to inform the issuing judge of the difficulties involved in the use of conventional techniques." (3) Although 18 U. S. C. § 2518(5) "requires an investigation warrant to contain a provision that the wiretap shall be conducted in such a way as to minimize the interception of communications unrelated to the investigation . . . ," it is sufficient if the issuing judge instructed the "district attorney, law enforcement officers, and agents [that they were] forbidden to record any conversations or discussions which [were] personal and private in nature or not specified in [the] warrant."

"Minor factual inaccuracies [in an affidavit] which are only peripherally relevant to the showing" of probable cause will not void a warrant for a wiretap.

The exclusionary rule generally applies to any information obtained in violation of Georgia law. In Jordan v. State, the court pointed out the difference between the United States and Georgia statutes regarding use of evidence obtained as a result of an illegal wiretap. 18 U. S. C. § 2515 provides that "no part of the contents of such [illegal] communication and no evidence derived therefrom may be received in evidence in any trial. . . ." (Emphasis in original.) However, O.C.G.A. § 16–11–67 does not contain any language precluding derivative evidence.

It is not reversible error for the trial judge to refuse to exclude spectators at a motion to suppress and conduct a closed hearing unless "the party seeking to close the hearing . . . advance[s] an over-riding interest that [he] is likely to be prejudiced. . . . [T]he closure must be no broader than necessary to protect that interest." See section 17-2, infra.

The exclusionary rule also applies to a violation of 18 U. S. C. § 2518(10)(a). This provision of the statute provides in part as follows:

"(10)(a) Any aggrieved person . . . may move to suppress the contents of any wire or oral communication intercepted pursuant to this chapter, or evidence derived therefrom, on the grounds that—

"(i) the communication was unlawfully intercepted;

"(ii) the order of authorization or approval under which it was intercepted is insufficient on its face; or

"(iii) the interception was not made in conformity with the order of authorization or approval.

"Such motion shall be made before the trial, hearing, or proceeding unless there was no opportunity to make such motion or the person was not aware of the grounds of the motion. . . ."

In addition to the foregoing, Georgia has a statute (O.C.G.A. § 16–11–62) prohibiting anyone from secretly intercepting a telephone call. O.C.G.A. § 16–11–67 provides that "[n]o evidence obtained [in violation of O.C.G.A. § 16–11–62] shall be admissible . . . except to prove" a violation of said statute. In Jordan v. State, the court implies (1) that an improper wiretap by a private individual "without the preknowledge and acquiescence of law enforcement authorities" will not prevent the use by the state of derivative evidence, and (2) the fruit of the poisonous tree doctrine and the inevitable discovery rule do not apply where there was no illegal conduct by state agents.

In Barlow v. Barlow, the court held that Georgia's wiretapping statutes apply to cordless telephone conversations.

See section 4-2, supra, on protected areas and interests. Generally, see Kurtz, Criminal Offenses and Defenses in Georgia (4th ed.), pp. 934–937, and see Goger, Daniel's Georgia Criminal Trial Practice Forms (6th ed.), § 14–196 et seq., on motion to suppress based on electronic surveillance. See Goger, Daniel's Georgia Handbook on Criminal Evidence (2009 ed.), § 9–16, on sound recordings and § 9–14 on method and location of surveillance. See section 4-2, supra, on pen registers and section 4-7, supra, on probable cause affidavits based on illegal wiretaps.

§ 4-59 Results of illegal search

The material contained in this section is in summary form. The exclusionary rule is treated in far greater depth in section 2-24 et seq., supra.

Generally, if a search or seizure is illegal, the articles obtained are not admissible in evidence in the prosecution's case in chief against a person who has standing to object to the search or seizure. However, the aggrieved party must make a timely motion to suppress the evidence. The person who conducts an illegal search or seizure may be liable in damages to the aggrieved person. Pursuant to O.C.G.A. § 17–5–30(a) "[a] defendant aggrieved by an unlawful search and seizure may move the court for the return of property, the possession of which is not otherwise unlawful and to suppress as evidence anything so obtained &dashl;" Because the code section applies only to a criminal defendant, a party to an administrative investigative proceeding can not rely upon it as authority for the recovery of evidence improperly seized by a state agency or its suppression in any future proceeding.

Evidence obtained in an illegal search and seizure can be used for purposes of impeachment of the aggrieved party if he testifies to facts contrary to those existing in the search or seizure. Likewise, illegally obtained evidence may be used to impeach a defendant's false testimony obtained in response to proper cross-examination which was reasonably suggested by the defendant's direct examination. Also, the exclusionary rule does not generally apply to civil proceedings.

In Georgia, the exclusionary rule is based not only on federal constitutional requirements as interpreted in Mapp v. Ohio, but also on statutory law.

Generally, the exclusionary rule, from a federal constitutional standpoint, applies only to governmental employees and does not apply to searches by private citizens. However, a joint operation of a credit card company and law enforcement officers has been held to be limited by the Fourth Amendment, and officers may not evade the requirements of the Fourth Amendment by the use of a private person to do what the officer could not do.

In United States v. McGreevy, Petrie was a full-time police officer who worked the midnight shift. He also worked for Federal Express about six hours a week doing security work and acting as liaison between the company and law enforcement agencies. He was called by the Federal Express station manager in regard to a suspicious package. He opened the package and found contraband. The court concluded that he was not acting under color of state law when he opened the package.

In Goodwin v. State, an off-duty police officer, while working security on private property, was instructed by his employer to stop all cars entering the premises. In doing so, he smelled alcohol on the breath of a driver and notified the police, who subsequently arrested the defendant. The court held that the defendant's claim that the initial stop lacked articulable suspicion and was not justified was without merit since the officer was "acting in his capacity as a hotel security officer and not attempting to search for incriminating evidence."

In United States v. Miller, the Ninth Circuit held that there are two critical factors to be considered in determining whether a private person was acting as an agent of the government in conducting a search: "(1) whether the government knew of or acquiesced in the intrusive conduct, and (2) whether the party performing the search intended to assist law enforcement efforts or to further his own ends." The court then concluded that a theft victim was not acting as an agent or instrumentality of law enforcement even though officers had asked the victim to help them identify the property stolen, agreed to his plan to enter the suspect's property for that purpose, and to some extent provided protection for him.

In State v. Lovig, the court said that the test is whether the private person, "in light of all circumstances of the case must be regarded as having acted as an 'instrument' or agent" of the government when he produced the evidence. In this regard, two cases worth comparing are Cook v. State and Pruitt v. State. In Cook, a statement made by the defendant to his father, who was also an F.B.I. agent, did not require suppression since, at the time it was made, the defendant's father was not acting in his capacity as a law enforcement officer but rather as a parent offering comfort to a troubled son. In Pruitt, the court ruled that evidence seized by a police officer father from his son's motor vehicle should have been suppressed since, under the totality of the circumstances, it never appeared that the police officer subordinated his official status to that of his parental status.

In State v. Young, the court considered a motion to suppress marijuana found by the assistant principal of a school on the person of a student. In refusing to uphold the suppression motion, the court concluded that persons conducting searches are to be divided into three groups: (1) searches by private persons, (2) searches by agents of the state, and (3) searches by law enforcement agents. The court said that searches by the second class of persons are not subject to the exclusionary rule, and that a principal or assistant principal of a school fits into this category.

Statements obtained by school officials acting in concert with or at the direction of police authorities may also be subject to exclusion. Whether the school officials were acting in such a capacity must be determined on a case by case basis by viewing the totality of the circumstances.

However, in New Jersey v. T. L. O., the United States Supreme Court considered the validity of a search of a pupil by a public school official. The court found that the Fourth Amendment does apply to school officials, and that such officials act as representatives of the state, but that this conclusion does not mean probable cause is required for a search. The court concluded that under the Fourth Amendment a lesser standard of reasonableness is appropriate for school children. Thus, "the legality of a search of a student should depend simply on the reasonableness, under all the circumstances, of the search." There must be "reasonable grounds for suspecting that the search will turn up evidence that the student has violated or is violating either the law or the rules of the school." (Emphasis added.) "[T]he measures adopted [must be] reasonably related to the objective of the search and not excessively intrusive in the light of the age and sex of the student and the nature of the infraction."

In the 1987 case of O'Connor v. Ortega, the United States Supreme Court cited and relied on T. L. O. Ortega was a physician and psychiatrist who was Chief of Professional Education at a state hospital. Five of the Justices concluded that the state did not have probable cause to obtain a warrant to conduct a search of his desk or filing cabinet, where the search was reasonably limited in scope and was initiated for work-related non-investigative reasons. "In contrast to law enforcement officials, . . . public employers are not enforcers of the criminal law; instead, public employers have a direct and overriding interest in ensuring that the work of the agency is conducted in a proper and efficient manner. . . . Balanced against the substantial government interests in the efficient and proper operation of the workplace are the privacy interests of government employees in their place of work which, while not insubstantial, are far less than those found at home or in some other contexts. . . . '[S]pecial needs, beyond the normal need for law enforcement make the . . . probable-cause requirement impracticable. . . .' "

See section 4-56, supra, on drug tests of students. See section 14-74 et seq., infra, on the expectation of privacy. See an exhaustive annotation of over 250 pages entitled "Search Conducted by School Official or Teacher as Violation of Fourth Amendment or Equivalent State Constitutional Provision," 31 A. L. R. 5th 229 (1995). See section 2-26, supra, on erroneous information as constituting probable cause to arrest.

Chapter 5

Confessions And Self-Incrimination

§ 5-1 Confessions—Definition
§ 5-2 Admissions—Definition
§ 5-3 Admissibility—General
§ 5-4 —Voluntariness—General
§ 5-5 — —Hope of benefit
§ 5-6 — —Fear of injury
§ 5-7 — —Trickery
§ 5-8 —Confession of juvenile
§ 5-9 —Massiah and Escobedo—Pre-Miranda theories based on the Sixth Amendment
§ 5-10 —Right to counsel—The confusing relationship between the Fifth and Sixth Amendments
§ 5-11 Confessions and admissions—Miranda v. Arizona—General
§ 5-12 — —Custody
§ 5-13 — —Interrogation
§ 5-14 — —Warnings
§ 5-15 — — —Right to remain silent
§ 5-16 — — —Use in court of any statements
§ 5-17 — — —Right to have counsel present
§ 5-18 — — —Right to have counsel appointed
§ 5-19 — —Waiver—Right to remain silent
§ 5-20 — — —Right to counsel
§ 5-21 — —Duty to speak
§ 5-22 Nontestimonial evidence—Under United States Constitution
§ 5-23 —Under Georgia Constitution and Georgia law
§ 5-24 Statutes requiring incriminating acts
§ 5-25 Officers requiring incriminating acts
§ 5-26 Results of illegally obtained evidence

KeyCite®: Cases and other legal materials listed in KeyCite Scope can be researched through the KeyCite service on Westlaw®. Use KeyCite to check citations for form, parallel references, prior and later history, and comprehensive citator information, including citations to other decisions and secondary materials.

§ 5-1 Confessions—Definition

Historically in Georgia, a confession has been regarded as a voluntary admission of guilt of every essential element of the crime involved, without including any legal excuse or justification. In order to be admissible, the confession must be made "without being induced by another by the slightest hope of benefit or remotest fear of injury." A number of older cases have emphasized that a statement which constitutes a confession must be so comprehensive as to include every essential element of the crime.

However, in 1974, in Robinson v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court held that an inculpatory statement may amount to a confession even though the defendant does not admit all the essential elements of the crime. In distinguishing between admissions and confessions, the court said that "the true determinant is whether the statement is offered by the accused as exculpatory or inculpatory." In Robinson, the defendant was charged with rape. He gave a statement which made no mention of penetration and stated only that everything started getting "fuzzy." However, Robinson did not state that he abandoned his attempt to rape, and unlike the statement in Bloodworth v. State, the statement of Robinson was considered a confession. In Robinson, the attack in question upon the child was admitted subject to the memory lapse, without justification, and the statement is not one from which the jury could infer innocence. "The statement, taken as a whole, can only be thought to have been given by Robinson for the purpose of assuming responsibility for the crime charged" and constitutes a confession. Since the Robinson decision, the courts have reaffirmed the rule laid down in that case several times.

Even when reference is made to a statement of the defendant, it is not necessary for the trial judge to give a charge distinguishing between a confession and an admission when there is no mention of a confession.

Confessions may be oral, written or recorded. If oral, they need not be reduced to writing. A confession may be partly oral and partly in writing. It has been held that a written confession must be contained in a single document. However, in view of Robinson v. State, this rule may not still be applicable.

The admissibility of a confession is not destroyed solely because it includes other transactions. See Goger, Daniel's Georgia Handbook on Criminal Evidence (2009 ed.), § 4-48, on similar transactions, and § 4–58 on res gestae.

Where a hearing impaired person is legally arrested, if a qualified interpreter is not available one hour after the hearing impaired person has been taken into custody and a request has been forwarded to the Department of Human Resources, the arresting officer may interrogate or take a statement from the person, provided that "such interrogation and answers thereto shall be in writing and shall be preserved and turned over to the court" in the event the person is tried for the alleged offense. Additionally, an interpreter shall be provided and present during consultation between the hearing impaired person and the court appointed counsel. See Goger, Daniel's Georgia Handbook on Criminal Evidence (2009 ed.), § 6–6, on interpreters.

The trial court in Newman v. State suppressed the results of an interrogation where the police officers failed to comply with the provisions concerning the interrogation of deaf persons.

See section 5-2, infra, on admissions.

§ 5-2 Admissions—Definition

As pointed out in the last section, under present Georgia law, an "admission of the main fact, from which the essential elements of the criminal act may be inferred, amounts to an admission of the crime itself. If the main fact is admitted with a qualifying exclusion of a necessary ingredient of the crime charged, the crime is not confessed." Therefore, "a mere [admission] is made where the accused, though admitting to damaging circumstances, nonetheless attempts to deny responsibility for the crime charged by putting forward exculpatory or legally justifying facts. Thus . . . '[a] statement which includes facts or circumstances which show excuse or justification is not a confession of guilt even if it admits the main fact.' " For example, if a person is charged with burglary and he acknowledges that he entered the house, this is not a confession but it is an admission.

While it is sometimes difficult to distinguish between an admission and a confession, it is important for the trial judge to properly distinguish between the two when he instructs the jury. If the statement amounts to an admission and not a confession, it is error for the court to charge on confessions. However, a mere passing use of the word "confession" does not require a reversal even if the statement was an admission. The Georgia Supreme Court has said that "[i]f the trial judges would avoid the use of the word 'confession' in questionable cases and instead use the word 'admission' in each instance where they might otherwise use the word 'confession' or 'statement,' the entire problem would vanish." However, it has been held that the "quantum of evidence necessary to corroborate a confession is entirely for the jury to decide."

In Griggs v. State, the court concluded that under the facts of the case it was error to charge on a confession and on an incriminating statement and to let the jury determine which category the statement fell into. However, if a defendant does not admit that a statement is a confession, and if there is no request to charge on the need for corroboration of a confession, it is not error for the court to fail to so charge. An incriminating statement not amounting to a confession is an admission.

Under Miranda v. Arizona, both confessions and admissions are treated alike in determining their admissibility under the federal Constitution.

Where the state relies on a defendant's admission alone to establish an essential element of the case and the accused's inculpatory statement is coupled with exculpatory matter, the jury must consider both statements. However, this rule is inapplicable if there is other evidence contradicting the defendant's exculpatory statement.

See section 5-1, supra, on confessions. See section 10-2, infra, on admissions in pleadings in condemnation cases. See Goger, Daniel's Georgia Handbook on Criminal Evidence (2009 ed.), §§ 4–5 and 4-28, on the admissibility of admissions of a defendant.

§ 5-3 Admissibility—General

O.C.G.A. § 24–3–50 provides as follows:

"To make a confession admissible, it must have been made voluntarily, without being induced by another by the slightest hope of benefit or remotest fear of injury." Thus, according to this statute, there are three conditions which must exist before a pre-trial confession or admission is admissible in evidence at a criminal trial: (1) It must be made voluntarily. It must not be produced by or result from (2) "the slightest hope of benefit" or (3) the "remotest fear of injury." These essentials will be discussed in the following sections.

From a federal constitutional standpoint, the essential element of voluntariness is not to be regarded as being limited by the words "without being induced by another by the slightest hope of benefit or remotest fear of injury." Voluntariness based on a totality of all the surrounding facts and circumstances is an essential element of due process. In Wan v. United States, the United States Supreme Court said, "A confession is voluntary in law if, and only if, it was, in fact, voluntarily made."

O.C.G.A. § 24–3–53 provides as follows:

"All admissions shall be scanned with care, and confessions of guilt shall be received with great caution. A confession alone, uncorroborated by any other evidence, shall not justify a conviction." Blackstone wrote in the Eighteenth Century that confessions are regarded as "the weakest and most suspicious of all testimony; ever liable to be obtained by artifice, false hopes, promises of favour or menaces."

Despite the language of the statute, there is a line of Georgia cases stating that a "confession of guilt freely and voluntarily made by the accused, is direct evidence of the highest character and sufficient to authorize a conviction when corroborated by proof of the corpus delicti."

In McGowan v. State, the court held that the defendant has no standing to raise a question as to the violation of the witness' right not to be forced to give certain information. Also, a defendant "may not invoke another's privilege, even if the other is his co-defendant."

For motions to suppress statements, see Goger, Daniel's Georgia Criminal Trial Practice Forms (6th ed.), § 5–1 et seq. See Goger, Daniel's Georgia Handbook on Criminal Evidence (2009 ed.), §§ 1–22, 6–16, 6–36, and 8–9.

§ 5-4 Admissibility—Voluntariness—General

Today, as a result of Miranda v. Arizona, most litigation about confessions centers on the applicability of the Fifth Amendment. But until 1966, when Miranda was decided, the Court relied on other mechanisms for determining the validity of confessions. In the 1936 case Brown v. Mississippi, the United States Supreme Court gave the "voluntariness" test constitutional stature under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment in reversing the defendants' convictions that rested solely upon confessions extracted after they were severely beaten by police.

When determining voluntariness, the "totality of circumstances" that preceded the confession must be examined. In Payne v. Arkansas, the Court held that the defendant's confession was not "voluntary" because it came after he was held incommunicado for three days, was denied food for long periods of time, and was threatened by the chief of police that a lynch mob would get him if he did not confess.

In 1964, with the cases Massiah v. United States and Escobedo v. Illinois, the Supreme Court's focus shifted from "voluntariness" of confessions under the Due Process Clause to a defendant's right to "assistance of counsel" as provided by the Sixth Amendment. But, two years later, the Court decided Miranda, which made Fifth Amendment analysis the driving force behind inquiries into the admissibility of confessions.

However, the due process standard of voluntariness still applies, even where there is a Miranda violation in connection with a confession. If there is a Miranda violation, the statement obtained from the defendant is not admissible in the prosecution's case in chief. But the shield of "Miranda cannot be perverted into a license to use perjury" and a statement obtained from a defendant in violation of Miranda may be used to impeach an earlier statement made by the defendant during the trial if its "trustworthiness . . . satisfies legal standards." Similarly, Miranda does not require suppression of the physical fruits of a suspect's voluntary, but unwarned statements. However, in "any criminal trial the use against a defendant of his involuntary statement is a denial of due process." Of course, unless a confession or statement was given voluntarily, it fails to pass the Georgia statutory test.

In Colorado v. Connelly, the United States Supreme Court held that a confession cannot be held to be involuntary under the due process clause unless it is linked to coercion by government agents. The court then concluded that a confession was voluntary and hence admissible where the statement was made by the defendant because he thought he was being directed by God to confess.

In King v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court said voluntary "is practically synonymous with spontaneously, of his own free will; and not when overmastered by the will of another." But in a civil case it was held that an admission was not inadmissible simply because it was made after a polygraph examination.

Prolonged grilling prevents a confession from being voluntary. However, it has been held that the fact that a defendant is a drug addict and is undergoing withdrawal symptoms at the time of his confession does not alone make it involuntary. In Ryan v. State, the court held that "[t]he mere fact that a defendant was emotionally upset did not render [his statement] inadmissible." The giving of cigarettes and soft drinks to a suspect does not alone prevent a confession from being voluntarily given. In a dubious case, it has been held that if a defendant, while in a drunken stupor or asleep, makes an admission, the jury may determine whether or not it should be considered. In Shelby v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court affirmed a finding that a statement was freely and voluntarily given despite the fact that the defendant's blood alcohol level was .24 percent. A statement is not regarded as having been made involuntarily simply because the defendant was using drugs at the time it was given. In one case, however, where a defendant made a confession while in the hospital and under the influence of morphine, the statement was held to be involuntary. In Brown v. State, the court pointed out that "[i]lliteracy . . . 'does not dictate a determination that there has been no voluntary knowledgeable waiver.' " In Vance v. Bordenkircher, the court concluded that a confession in a murder case was voluntary even though given by a 15–year-old who had an I.Q. of 62 and a mental age of nine. In a similar case, Willis v. State, the court pointed out that "[a] mere showing that an accused . . . has a high blood alcohol level or may be suffering from some mental disability is not a sufficient basis to automatically exclude a statement." In Horton v. State, the court held that the fact officers did not inform the defendant she would be charged with murder until after she made a statement did not render the statement involuntary. In Oliver v. State, the court pointed out that the "mere showing that a person who confessed to a crime may have suffered from some mental disability is not a sufficient basis on which to exclude the statement." In a foreign case, the court held that a defendant has no right to introduce expert testimony showing that he was more likely to be induced to confess or more susceptible to being coerced. See Annotation, "Admissibility of Expert Testimony Regarding Reliability of Accused's Confession Where Accused Allegedly Suffered From Mental Disorder or Defect at Time of Confession," 82 A. L. R. 5th 591 (2000). Generally, see section 5-19, infra, on Miranda waivers.

It is not necessary for the trial judge to charge a jury on the necessity of voluntariness of a confession unless a timely written request has been filed.

Generally, a confession will be deemed admissible if, considering the totality of the circumstances, it was made voluntarily, "without being induced by hope of benefit or coerced by threats." However, in State v. Gardner, the Georgia Supreme Court held that a "confession made by one who is insane is not the product of 'a rational intellect and a free will,' and is, thus, not voluntarily made." Nevertheless, a person who is "mentally ill" may make a voluntary confession.

The United States Supreme Court held on non-constitutional grounds that a confession obtained during a delay in bringing a suspect before a magistrate rendered a confession inadmissible in McNabb v. United States and in Mallory v. United States. While most states have rejected the per se rule, some have followed it and Congress in 1968 in effect reversed these cases.

In Georgia, it has been held that a defendant who is arrested without a warrant is required to be presented before a magistrate within 48 hours or he must be released. However, it has been held that where the defendant is not presented before a magistrate within 48 hours after a warrantless arrest and a statement is obtained after the 48 hours, there is no right to a per se exclusion of the statement because the arrest is not necessarily violative of the federal Constitution and a violation of the Georgia statute does not automatically authorize a defendant to have the statement excluded. But see County of Riverside v. McLaughlin, which is discussed in section 11-1, infra. While there is no per se exclusion of such a statement, it must be remembered that where there is a warrantless arrest, the Fourth Amendment requires a probable cause determination "promptly after arrest." If a confession is obtained after a warrantless arrest but before a prompt probable cause hearing, it may be that it is subject to suppression as a violation of the Fourth Amendment. See section 2-24 et seq., supra, on the exclusionary rule.

In Arizona v. Fulminante, the United States Supreme Court held that the erroneous admission of a coerced confession can be harmless error.

See section 5-7, infra, on confessions obtained by trickery. See Annotation, "Admissibility of Confession as Affected by Delay in Arraignment of Prisoner," 19 A. L. R. 2d 1331 (1951). See Annotation, "Mental Subnormality of Accused as Affecting Voluntariness or Admissibility of Confession," 8 A. L. R. 4th 16 (1981). See also section 5-5, infra, on confessions obtained by a hope of benefit.

§ 5-5 Admissibility—Voluntariness—Hope of benefit

A confession which is obtained by a promise to confer a benefit on the suspect is involuntary and inadmissible. Where a confession is obtained by offering the defendant immunity, it is induced by a hope of reward and is inadmissible. Likewise, a promise to reduce or dismiss charges or recommend a relatively light sentence for the charge renders a confession involuntary. So, too, is a statement induced by the promise that the defendant would not be among those charged. A confession given to obtain the release from custody of the defendant's girlfriend has been held to be involuntary because of the circumstances surrounding the confession. This rule applies not only to full blown confessions, but to any sort of inculpatory admission or statement induced through "the slightest hope of benefit or the remotest fear of injury." In Starr v. State, for example, the court found on appeal that an incriminating statement made by the defendant during a taped interview with police investigators which placed him alone with the victim in a child molestation case should have been excluded at trial since it was induced by the hope of special considerations in the disposition of the case and was for that reason not made voluntarily. However, in Georgia it has been held that a confession obtained as a result of a promise of a collateral benefit is not excludable for that reason. See section 5-6, infra. Thus, in Burton v. State, the court held that an "officer's statement to the accused that substance abuse counseling was available was an offer of a collateral benefit which does not invalidate the [defendant's] statement."

An officer's promise to recommend a lighter punishment or statements to the effect that "everybody asks how cooperative has a suspect been with you" or that it would be better for him to make a confession have been regarded as holding out a hope of benefit. In Askea v. State, the court held that an investigator's statement to the defendant that his cooperation "would probably help him in court" impermissibly held out some hope of benefit. However, in Lyles v. State, the court pointed out that where a detective told the defendant he would let the district attorney know about his cooperation and this might result in a reduced sentence, no promises were made. Moreover, this defendant signed a form acknowledging that his statement was made without promise or hope of reward. Therefore, the Georgia Court of Appeals upheld the admissibility of the defendant's confession.

But a comment by an officer that it is always better to tell the truth does not invalidate a confession. If a defendant makes a confession implicating himself and others as a result of a plea bargain, but subsequently refuses to plead guilty and is tried, the confession is not admissible because it was given with the hope of benefit induced by another. However, in 1997 the Georgia Supreme Court in Carswell v. State held that an officer's agreement to tell the judge of the defendant's cooperation is not the kind of "hope of benefit" contemplated by O.C.G.A. § 24–3–50. Likewise, "[o]ffering to make known a suspect's confession to the district attorney and the trial judge is not an offer of benefit." In the same vein, a detective's suggestion made during the interrogation of a murder suspect that the suspect probably did not intend to murder the victim was not the equivalent of a hope of benefit, but mere routine police questioning designed to elicit a response from the suspect.

In Patrick v. State, the court held that a promise to keep a defendant out of Reidsville if he made a statement was not a promise of lighter punishment, was collateral in nature, and did not render a confession inadmissible. This was treated as being similar to a promise to inform the court of the defendant's cooperation. In Arline v. State, the court held that "the slightest hope of benefit" means "the hope of a lighter sentence." Where an officer tells a suspect that telling the truth "would probably help in court," this holds out some hope of reward.

However, in Tyler v. State, the court held that no hope of benefit was held out to the defendant where she was told that if she had anything to do with the crime, the best thing to do "was to go ahead and get it off her chest; that sometimes people did things for various reasons; . . . and whatever she told me I'd be willing to present it to the court." Also, where an officer tells a suspect that he will feel better if he confesses, this does not prevent the admission of a confession. In the questionable case of Johnson v. State, the court held that an agreement to put the defendant in a private cell, to seek psychiatric examination for the defendant, and to tell the judge of his cooperation, was held not to be the kind of hope of benefit which would keep a confession from being voluntary. In White v. State, the court held there was no "hope of benefit" where a defendant was to be transferred from a non-smoking jail to one where he could smoke. In Duke v. State, the court affirmed the admission of a statement where officers told defendant that if a third person committed the crime, then the defendant should tell the officers or risk being charged himself.

In Sizemore v. State, the court concluded that a defendant's statement was admissible when made to an officer who had "promised to let the defendant see his children [(the victims)] if he would make a statement."

In Dickey v. State, the court pointed out that the hope which prevents a confession from being admitted must be induced by someone other than the defendant. The fact that a defendant has a hope or fear which originates in the suspect's mind "from the seed of his own planting" will not result in the exclusion of his confession.

In Williams v. State, the court held that a statement was not the product of a "hope of reward" where defense counsel told the defendant that if the defendant made a statement, the district attorney might negotiate a sentence agreement. In State v. Todd, a majority of the appellate court reversed the trial court, which had held that an officer had induced the defendant's statement where the officer told the defendant that "if after we talk with you, we believe that probable cause doesn't exist, we are certainly not going to keep you arrested." The appellate court held that "this sort of mere truism, mere explanations of Todd's arrest and of the law, does not constitute an improper offer of some hope of benefit." Likewise, in Heard v. State, the court held that a confession was valid even though the defendant thought he could obtain a reduction in his bond if he confessed.

In Tyson v. State, the court indicated that implied promises based on a course of conduct with law enforcement officers over a number of years will not prevent a confession from being admissible.

See 1 Ringel, Searches and Seizures, Arrests and Confessions, § 25.2(c) (Clark Boardman 1979).

§ 5-6 Admissibility—Voluntariness—Fear of injury

A confession induced by fear on the part of the accused, as a result of a threat, is involuntary and not admissible. Thus, a confession made because of fear induced by torture is not admissible, and even advice by an officer to a suspect in custody, to the effect that if he knew anything he had better tell it, prevents a confession from being admissible.

In Anderson v. State, the appellate court held that the defendant's confession was not a result of a threat of injury or promise of benefit where the officer told the defendant that he was considering charging the defendant's girlfriend as an accessory to the crime. The court concluded that the officer's statement was a mere "truism" or recounting of facts.

In Lynumn v. Illinois, the Supreme Court held that an oral confession, which was made after the defendant had been told that "state financial aid for her infant children would be cut off, and her children taken away from her, if she did not 'cooperate,' " was involuntary. The court stated that "the confession cannot be deemed 'the product of a rational intellect and a free will.' " See section 5-5, supra.

In Garrity v. New Jersey, "police officers were investigated for allegedly fixing traffic tickets. The officers were informed that they could exercise their Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination if they wished, but doing so would cost them their jobs. . . . The [United States] Supreme Court held that the statements obtained under threat of removal from office cannot be used . . . ."

In State v. Aiken, the Georgia Supreme Court adopted the totality of circumstances test used in Garrity for determining whether a public employees statement was coerced through an implied or express threat of termination. The Court observed:

> Factors that a court may consider include those discussed in the foregoing cases, including whether the State actor made an overt threat to the defendant of the loss of his job if he did not speak with investigators or whether a statute, rule, or ordinance of which the defendant was aware provided that the defendant would lose his job for failing to answer questions. If no express threat is present, the court may examine whether the defendant subjectively believed that he could lose his job for failing to cooperate and whether, if so, that belief was reasonable given the State action involved. In determining whether the defendants belief was objectively reasonable, the court may examine whether the defendant was aware of any statutes, ordinances, manuals, or policies that required cooperation and provided generally, without specifying a penalty, that an employee could be subject to discipline for failing to cooperate. The court may also consider whether the investigator implicitly communicated any threat of dismissal either in written or oral form; whether, before the interrogation began, the defendant was told he was free to leave at any time; and whether the defendant was told he had the right to have a lawyer present. A trial court, of course, is free to consider any other factor that it determines is relevant to the determination of voluntariness. We conclude that the totality of the circumstances test is in keeping with the spirit of Garrity and with the discretion our courts have historically enjoyed in determining whether a defendants statement is voluntary.
>
> (citations and footnotes omitted).

However, in State v. Stinson, the Georgia Court of Appeals held that this rule does not apply where there is neither an overt threat to terminate employment nor a subjective belief by such public employee that he would be terminated if he failed to answer questions.

In Roberts v. State, the court held that advising a defendant of the evidence the state has against him does not constitute coercion.

§ 5-7 Admissibility—Voluntariness—Trickery

The general rule is that the confession of a suspect, if freely and voluntarily made, is not rendered inadmissible although it is induced by some trick, artifice or deception, unless the trickery amounts to a violation of due process. O.C.G.A. § 24–3–51 provides as follows:

"The fact that a confession has been made under a spiritual exhortation, a promise of secrecy, or a promise of collateral benefit shall not exclude it."

While Georgia also has a code section which provides that an admission obtained by fraud is not admissible, this section has not been held to apply in criminal cases.

In DeYoung v. State, the court held that "[c]onfessions are admissible though obtained by artifice, trick, or deception, so long as the means employed to procure them are not calculated to elicit an untrue statement. . . . That a confession is obtained by such means does not preclude a finding that the confession was freely and voluntarily given." However, in State v. Ritter, the Georgia Supreme Court pointed out "that use of trickery and deceit to obtain a confession does not render it inadmissible, so long as the means employed are not calculated to procure an untrue statement." This principle cannot be allowed to supersede the requirements of O.C.G.A. § 24–3–50, however. "Thus, while deceit may not on its own render a statement inadmissible (where not calculated to procure an untrue statement), we hold that in looking to the totality of the circumstances . . . the employment of deceit may result in the inadmissibility of a statement in those situations where the particular deception used, by constituting a 'slightest hope of benefit or remotest fear of injury' under O.C.G.A. § 24–3–50, has induced a party to confess, thereby rendering the confession involuntary." Therefore, the court concluded that a statement obtained from the defendant was not admissible where the defendant was told that the victim was awake when he was actually dead. Likewise, the Georgia Supreme Court held in Carswell v. State that the statement obtained from the defendant was not subject to suppression even though the investigator told the defendant they were speaking "off the record" when they were being recorded. However, in State v. Ritter the Georgia Supreme Court pointed out that "deceit may result in the inadmissibility of a statement . . . where the particular deception used, by constituting a 'slightest hope of benefit or remotest fear of injury' . . . has induced a party to confess, thereby rendering the confession involuntary."

In State v. Parks, the Court of Appeals rejected the notion that the defendant's statement was not voluntary where he agreed to follow police officers to the station for the purpose of being questioned and, while there, was interrogated in a room where the door could not, in fact, be locked. With respect to the officers' employment of trickery during the questioning of the defendant, the court observed that "the use of trickery or deception does not bear on the issue of whether [the defendant] was in custody or reasonably believed himself to be in custody. (Citations omitted). Rather, trickery may compromise the voluntariness of a statement if it constitutes 'the slightest hope of benefit or remotest fear of injury.' "

In Miranda v. Arizona, the Supreme Court said, "[A]ny evidence that the accused was threatened, tricked, or cajoled into a waiver will, of course, show that the defendant did not voluntarily waive his privilege." Technically this language refers to the waiver of Miranda rights and not to the voluntariness of the confession itself, but it may indicate the attitude of the Court toward trickery. However, the United States Supreme Court never seems to have indicated any particular kind of trickery which would alone render a confession inadmissible. It has been said that a confession is not rendered inadmissible because of trickery or deception "as long as the means employed are not calculated to produce an untrue statement." See section 5-10, infra, on right to counsel.

Generally, see 1 Ringel, Searches and Seizures, Arrests and Confessions, § 25.2(d) (Clark Boardman 1979).

§ 5-8 Admissibility—Confession of juvenile

A confession from a juvenile is "scanned with more care and received with greater caution" than that of an adult. The provisions of O.C.G.A. § 15–11–47 apply to a confession by a juvenile even when the juvenile is tried as an adult. This statute provides in part as follows:

"A person taking a child into custody, with all reasonable speed and without first taking the child elsewhere, shall: (1) Forthwith release without bond the child to the child's parents . . . ; (3) Bring the child immediately before the juvenile court or promptly contact a juvenile court intake officer. The intake officer shall determine if the child should be released or detained. Prior to an informal detention hearing, the child shall be placed in detention, if necessary, only in such places as are authorized by O.C.G.A. § 15–11–48; or (4) Bring the child who is suspected of committing a delinquent act before the superior court of the county where the delinquent act occurred if the act is an act over which the superior court has exclusive or concurrent jurisdiction. . . .

"The person taking a child into custody shall promptly give notice thereof, together with a statement of the reason for taking the child into custody, to a parent, guardian, or other custodian and to the court. Any temporary detention or questioning of the child necessary to comply with this Code section shall conform to the procedures and conditions prescribed by this article and rules of court."

O.C.G.A. § 15–11–7(b) provides in part that "[a]n extrajudicial statement obtained in the course of violation of this article or one which would be constitutionally inadmissible in a criminal proceeding shall not be used against such child." However, the statute "does not require that one or both parents, or other responsible adult, be present during the questioning of a minor."

These provisions apply to both juvenile court proceedings and criminal cases. However, a confession is not to be automatically excluded if the provisions of the Juvenile Code are not complied with. In Lattimore v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court pointed out that "the issue to be considered is whether there is a knowing and intelligent waiver by . . . [the defendant] of his constitutional rights in making the incriminating statements. . . . [If a defendant] knowingly and intelligently waived his constitutional rights . . . and voluntarily made the statement in question . . ." it is not error for the trial judge to deny a motion to suppress the statement. Thus, in Paxton v. State, the court pointed out that the requirements of O.C.G.A. § 15–11–47(a)(2) are to be construed as directory and not mandatory. The same case also holds that there is no requirement that "an accused juvenile . . . be advised that he has a right to have a parent, guardian or adult present during questioning."

In Marshall v. State, the court affirmed the trial judge's finding that a confession of a 14–year-old juvenile was admissible. The defendant, after being arrested for murder, was taken first to the police station for booking and to obtain hair samples, rather than being handled as provided in O.C.G.A. § 15–11–47. The court stated that this did not amount to a per se violation of the Juvenile Code. The juvenile was advised of his rights, and both he and his mother signed a waiver of rights form. After booking, he was taken to the Youth Development Center for detention. The court pointed out that there is no requirement that one or both parents be present during questioning. The admissibility of such a confession from a juvenile is dependent upon the totality of the circumstances.

There are nine criteria to be considered in determining whether the waiver was voluntarily and knowingly given: (1) age of the accused; (2) education of the accused; (3) knowledge of the accused as to both the substance of the charge and the nature of his rights to consult with an attorney and remain silent; (4) whether the accused is held incommunicado or allowed to consult with relatives, friends or an attorney; (5) whether the accused is interrogated before or after formal charges are filed; (6) methods used in interrogation; (7) length of interrogation; (8) whether vel non the accused refuses to voluntarily give statements on prior occasions; and (9) whether the accused repudiates an extrajudicial statement at a later date. Where it appears that a juvenile delegates to a parent or guardian the decision to proceed without counsel, any subsequent statement may be subject to suppression as not being knowing and voluntary.

Statements obtained by school officials acting in concert with or at the direction of police authorities may also be subject to exclusion. Whether the school officials were acting in such a capacity must be determined on a case by case basis by viewing the totality of the circumstances.

§ 5-9 Admissibility—Massiah and Escobedo—Pre-Miranda theories based on the Sixth Amendment

The inadmissibility of incriminating statements obtained simply because of the absence of counsel was perhaps first recognized in 1964 by the United States Supreme Court in Massiah v. United States. In Massiah the Court held that the Sixth Amendment guarantee of "the assistance of counsel" in all "criminal prosecutions" is violated where government agents "deliberately elicit" post-indictment statements from a suspect in the absence of counsel. The fact that Massiah was already indicted when his incriminating statements were made is important to the decision of that case, as well as future Sixth Amendment cases, because the Sixth Amendment right to counsel only attaches at the initiation of adversary criminal proceedings. Therefore, before this "critical period of the proceedings," a suspect in a criminal investigation has no Sixth Amendment right to counsel. However, while the state may not use such statements in its case in chief, it may use the statements to impeach a defendant who elects to testify at trial.

Five weeks after Massiah, the United States Supreme Court decided Escobedo v. Illinois. Escobedo was arrested for murder, questioned, and then released the same day. He had counsel at the time of the initial arrest, and was later re-arrested and questioned again. During the second questioning, which lasted four hours, Escobedo was not permitted to speak with his lawyer, despite repeated requests to do so by both Escobedo and his attorney who was present at the police station while Escobedo was being questioned. Although the interrogation here was conducted before Escobedo was indicted, the Court noted that "in the context of this case, that fact should make no difference." Writing for the Court, Justice Goldberg narrowly held that (1) where an investigation "has begun to focus on a particular suspect, [(2)] the suspect has been taken into policy custody, [(3)] the police carry out a process of interrogations that lends itself to eliciting incriminating statements, [(4)] the suspect has requested and been denied an opportunity to consult with his lawyer, and [(5)] the police have not effectively warned him of his absolute constitutional right to remain silent, the accused has been denied 'the Assistance of Counsel' in violation of the Sixth Amendment . . . ."

In Miranda v. Arizona, the Court effectively limited the Escobedo holding to its facts.

§ 5-10 Admissibility—Right to counsel—The confusing relationship between the Fifth and Sixth Amendments

The Fifth Amendment provides that "[n]o person . . . shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself." In Miranda v. Arizona, the United States Supreme Court interpreted the above quoted clause as providing a defendant with a right to have counsel present during custodial interrogation. The Sixth Amendment provides that "[i]n all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall . . . have the Assistance of Counsel for his defense." The Fifth Amendment refers to compulsion; the Sixth Amendment does not. Thus, there is an independent basis for the applicability of these two amendments. A statement or confession admissible under Miranda may be inadmissible under the Sixth Amendment. Thus, a voluntary statement made after the initiation of judicial proceedings by a defendant, either in custody or not in custody, in the absence of counsel may be inadmissible under the Sixth Amendment right to counsel. It is most difficult to generalize from the United States Supreme Court cases in this area; hence, the facts of each such case take on added significance.

In Brewer v. Williams, the defendant turned himself in in Davenport, Iowa, pursuant to telephone advice from his lawyer in Des Moines. He was booked in Davenport for abducting a 10–year-old girl in Des Moines. He was advised of his Miranda rights, conferred with a Davenport attorney, and was arraigned before a magistrate. The following day, officers from Des Moines drove the 160 miles to Davenport to get Williams. There was an express agreement that Williams was not to be questioned. On the way back, one of the officers talked with Williams extensively. The officer told Williams that they would be going back near the area where he thought the body had been disposed of and pointed out that the parents should be entitled to a Christian burial. It was snowing at the time and the officer said that after the snowstorm was over, they might not be able to find the body. Some time later Williams directed them to the body. The United States Supreme Court concluded that Williams' Sixth Amendment right to counsel had been violated and that, constitutionally, the case was indistinguishable from Massiah. Because adversary proceedings had begun against the defendant, he had a right to counsel when the officers interrogated him.

Rhode Island v. Innis was decided on the basis of whether or not there had been any custodial interrogation of the defendant. Innis had been arrested for a shotgun robbery. The defendant had been given Miranda warnings, and he said he wanted to talk with a lawyer. As he was being driven to the police station by two officers, one of the officers said to the other that there was a school for handicapped children in the area and a lot of children were running around. "God forbid one of them might find a weapon with shells . . . they might hurt themselves." The defendant interrupted the officers, stating that they should turn the car around and he would show them where the gun was located. The court concluded that the defendant volunteered the information and that it did not result from interrogation.

In United States v. Henry, the Court held that incriminating statements made to a cellmate, after the defendant was indicted, were in violation of the Sixth Amendment right to counsel. An FBI agent instructed the cellmate in advance to be alert to any statement made by the defendant, but not to initiate any conversation with the defendant and not to question him. The informer understood that he was to be paid if he furnished information.

In Henry, the Court distinguished Hoffa v. United States. Hoffa was convicted of endeavoring to bribe members of a jury who had tried him for an alleged earlier violation of the Taft–Hartley Act. A substantial part of the evidence against Hoffa was contributed by a paid informer named Partin, who testified to several incriminating statements made by Hoffa in his presence. The court concluded that (1) none of Hoffa's Fourth Amendment rights were violated because Partin was present by invitation and the conversations were knowingly carried on in his presence. All of Hoffa's statements were voluntary. The Fourth Amendment does not protect against the misplaced belief that Partin would not reveal the conversations; (2) Hoffa's Fifth Amendment rights were not violated because his incriminating statements were voluntary and not the product of coercion; (3) Hoffa's Sixth Amendment rights were not violated because the informer Partin was not present when Hoffa talked with his lawyer, and he could not complain that he was not taken into custody while the earlier trial was in progress even though the government had sufficient grounds for doing so.

In Henry, the Court said that in Hoffa there was no violation of the right to counsel by " 'deliberately eliciting incriminating statements.' . . . An accused speaking to a known government agent is typically aware that his statements may be used against him. . . . When the accused is in the company of a fellow inmate who is acting by prearrangement as a Government agent, the same cannot be said." The fact that Henry was incarcerated is also a factor because of the psychological inducement to reach for aid when a person is confined.

The Henry Court felt that Hoffa was different because, in Hoffa, the government used "incriminating statements from persons not in custody but suspected of criminal activity prior to the time charges [were] filed." In Kuhlmann v. Wilson, the United States Supreme Court held that the intentional placing of an informant in a cell with a defendant did not violate the Sixth Amendment where the informant does not take "some action, beyond merely listening, that was designed deliberately to elicit incriminating remarks." In Illinois v. Perkins, the United States Supreme Court held that Miranda warnings did not have to be given to an incarcerated suspect before an officer, posing as a fellow inmate, questioned the suspect.

The 1981 case of Estelle v. Smith should be considered. Smith was charged with murder. Apparently, defense counsel had been appointed to represent him. The trial judge, without notice to defense counsel, directed a psychiatric examination of Smith by a Dr. Grigson to determine Smith's competence to stand trial. Dr. Grigson was later called as a witness by the state to testify at the penalty stage of the bifurcated trial after Smith had been found guilty of murder. The psychiatrist testified that Smith was a severe sociopath and would continue his previous behavior. Smith was sentenced to death. The United States Supreme Court held that Smith's Sixth Amendment right to counsel was violated when he was sent to Dr. Grigson for evaluation, because defense counsel were not notified in advance that the psychiatric examination would encompass the issue of their client's future dangerousness, and Smith was denied his attorneys' assistance in making the decision of whether to submit to the examination and to what end the psychiatrist's findings could be used.

In Maine v. Moulton, the United States Supreme Court said that "the right to counsel granted by the Sixth and Fourteenth Amendments means at least that a person is entitled to the help of a lawyer at or after the time that judicial proceedings have been initiated against him." The court held that a recording of a conversation, made in the absence of counsel after the defendant had been indicted, between the defendant and a co-defendant who was a government informer, violated the Sixth Amendment.

However, in 1986, in Moran v. Burbine, the United States Supreme Court held that where a suspect was given Miranda warnings, and waived his right to remain silent, the waiver was not voided by (1) the failure of officers to inform suspect that counsel had been employed for him by a third person, or (2) in failing to inform suspect that counsel was attempting to reach him, or (3) by giving counsel misleading information regarding the officer's intention to interrogate the defendant. The court emphasized that the Sixth Amendment right to counsel did not apply until the initiation of adversary judicial proceedings, stating that Escobedo is now viewed not as a Sixth Amendment case but as a Fifth Amendment self-incrimination case. The court said that Miranda does not forbid such police deception relating to an attorney, and such conduct was not so offensive as to deprive the suspect of fundamental fairness guaranteed in the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

In Cahill v. Rushen, the Ninth Circuit held that a confession of the defendant after his conviction was not admissible when he was re-tried after obtaining a reversal of his earlier conviction. The defendant had told officers that the confession could not adversely affect him at that point, and he then confessed. The court concluded that there had been a denial of the defendant's right to counsel.

In Spence v. State, the court said that Georgia has limited the Massiah rule to post-indictment statements made outside the presence of counsel. In Baxter v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals found Henry not to apply where the defendant made incriminating statements to two fellow inmates, who had encouraged the statements in the hope of lenient treatment. Since lenient treatment had not been promised by the state, the inmates were not state agents. See Goger, Daniel's Georgia Handbook on Criminal Evidence (2009 ed.), § 6–3.

In United States v. Karr, the Ninth Circuit held that the Miranda warnings plus being told that formal judicial proceedings had begun against him is sufficient information to enable a defendant to waive his Sixth Amendment right to counsel. In Patterson v. Illinois, the United States Supreme Court considered a post indictment statement made to an officer in absence of counsel. The defendant knew what he was charged with, was given Miranda warnings and signed a Miranda waiver. The court rejected Patterson's argument that the Sixth Amendment right to counsel is superior to "the fifth amendment right." The court then pointed out "that whatever warnings suffice for Miranda purposes will also be sufficient in the context of post indictment questioning."

In Potter v. State, the defendant, after being properly given his Miranda warnings, gave a voluntary statement while in custody. While the defendant was being interrogated, the public defender's office was attempting to gain access to the defendant to determine whether he qualified for and wanted its representation. The court rejected the defendant's argument that his statement should not have been admitted at trial because of the public defender's actions. In addition to noting that defendant had signed written waivers of his rights and had not invoked his right to counsel, the court observed that "[n]o attorney, acting without consulting [the defendant], was empowered to invoke a right to counsel for him."

In Starks v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court considered the admissibility of a non-custodial statement made to a probation officer. The court concluded that if the statement was obtained after the defendant had asserted his Sixth Amendment right to counsel, and the conversation had been initiated by the officer, the statement was not admissible.

Generally, see 1 Ringel, Searches and Seizures, Arrests and Confessions, § 29.1 et seq. (Clark Boardman 1979). See section 5-13, infra, on interrogation.

§ 5-11 Confessions and admissions—Miranda v. Arizona—General

Much controversy has centered around Miranda v. Arizona, handed down in 1966. However, thus far the United States Supreme Court has declined to reverse Miranda although it has had ample opportunity to do so. In a persuasive opinion in 1999, United States v. Dickerson, the Fourth Circuit held that the rules set out in Miranda are not required by the United States Constitution and that the provisions of 18 U. S. C. § 3501 contain the test for admitting confessions in federal courts. However, Dickerson was reversed by the United States Supreme Court, which held that Miranda was an interpretation of the requirements of the Constitution.

In essence, Miranda holds the following:

(1) The warnings established by Miranda govern unless other equally effective methods are found.

(2) "Volunteered statements of any kind are not barred" by Miranda.

(3) The rules apply when an individual in custody is first subjected to police questioning.

(4) The prescribed warnings must be given regardless of the knowledge of the person in custody.

(5) An individual is free to exercise his right to remain silent if he indicates in any manner at any time prior to or during questioning that he wishes to remain silent. If he does, questioning must cease immediately.

(6) If a statement is obtained in the absence of counsel, the prosecution has the burden of demonstrating that the defendant knowingly and intelligently waived his privilege against self-incrimination. A waiver of the privilege cannot be inferred from silence after the Miranda warnings have been given nor from the fact that a confession was obtained.

(7) An accused may not be penalized for exercising his privilege against self-incrimination.

(8) Unless and until warnings and waivers are demonstrated by the prosecution, no evidence obtained as a result of a violation of Miranda is admissible in evidence. However, it seems that generally statements made by a defendant in the absence of Miranda warnings are admissible where the primary purpose of questioning was to save the life of a victim. Thus, in New York v. Quarles, the United States Supreme Court held that it was not necessary for an officer to give Miranda warnings to a suspect in custody before asking "where is the gun" because there were "overriding considerations of public safety" as measured by an objective standard. See Annotation on "public safety" exception to Miranda, 81 L.Ed.2d 990 (1986). See section 5-14, infra.

(9) The rules set forth in Miranda apply to both confessions and admissions.

The Miranda decision is not retroactive.

In United States v. Mesa, the Third Circuit held that a suspect barricaded in a motel room was not in custody when officers tried to talk him into a peaceful surrender. The fact that the motel was surrounded does not mean that the suspect was in custody.

In summary, it must be remembered that Miranda does not apply at all unless there are both (1) custody and (2) interrogation. If there is interrogation of an in-custody suspect, Miranda does apply. If Miranda is applicable, no statement obtained from a suspect is admissible unless both of the following requirements have been met: (1) The suspect must have been given adequate warnings, and (2) the suspect must have validly waived his right of silence.

If Miranda is applicable and there is a violation, the only result is the suppression of the in-custody statement and not a dismissal of the charges against the defendant.

§ 5-12 Confessions and admissions—Miranda v. Arizona—Custody

The necessity of giving the Miranda warnings exists only when an individual is questioned while in custody. According to Miranda, "custodial interrogation" means "questioning initiated by law enforcement officers after a person has been taken into custody or otherwise deprived of his freedom of action in any significant way." As a general rule, a person "who is the subject of a general on-the-scene investigation is not in custody," and neither the fact that the officer "would not have allowed any of the bystanders to leave until he had received some answers to his questions nor his conclusion that all of them were in his legal custody may be considered controlling on the issue of whether there had in fact been an official exercise of control or authority over the defendant amounting to an arrest." A person is not regarded as being in custody simply because he and other potential witnesses went to the jail, pursuant to request, and where they are called into an investigator's office individually for questioning. However, deprivation of freedom of action is an element to be considered in determining whether an individual is in custody. Thus, in Reinhardt v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court held that the defendant was in custody for Miranda purposes when he was questioned by officers in a hospital room.

In Stansbury v. California, the United States Supreme Court pointed out that Miranda warnings need only be given "where there has been such a restriction on a person's freedom as to render him 'in custody.' . . . [A] court must examine all of the circumstances surrounding the interrogation but 'the ultimate inquiry is simply whether there [was] a "formal arrest or restraint on freedom of movement." ' . . . [T]he initial determination of custody depends on the objective circumstances of the interrogation, not on the subjective views harbored by either the interrogating officers or the person being questioned. . . . [T]he only relevant inquiry is how a reasonable man in the suspect's shoes would have understood his situation. . . . [A] police officer's subjective view that the individual under questioning is a suspect, if undisclosed, does not bear upon the question [of] whether the individual is in custody for purposes of Miranda. "However, '[a]n officer's knowledge or beliefs may bear upon the custody issue if they are conveyed, by word or deed, to the individual being questioned . . . , [but] [t]hose beliefs are relevant only to the extent they would affect how a reasonable person in the position of the individual being questioned would gauge the breadth of his or her "freedom of action." ' "

In the 1995 United States Supreme Court case of Thompson v. Keohane, the Court concluded that two discrete inquiries are essential to a determination of "in custody for Miranda purposes: '[F]irst, what were the circumstances surrounding the interrogation; and second, given those circumstances, would a reasonable person have felt he or she was not at liberty to terminate the interrogation and leave. . . . [T]he court must apply an objective test. . . . The first inquiry . . . is distinctly factual. . . . The second inquiry . . . presents a 'mixed question of law and fact. . . .' " In State v. Brannan, the Georgia Court of Appeals said that in determining if a person is in custody, "we apply an objective standard and determine whether a reasonable person in his situation would have believed he was physically deprived of his freedom of action in a significant way." In Hadley v. State, the court pointed out that the factors to consider in determining whether or not a defendant was in custody "include: probable cause to arrest, substantive intent of the police, subjective belief of the defendant, and the focus of the investigation." In Johnson v. State, the court pointed out that the term "reasonable person" . . . "does not mean a person with a guilty conscience who knows as soon as they see the blue light that they will be arrested for matters known to them, but [which] are not as yet known to the police."

In Hodges v. State, the court cited Stansbury and held that there is no automatic need to Mirandize a person being questioned simply because the officer has probable cause to arrest.

In Berkemer v. McCarty, the United States Supreme Court pointed out that "detention of a motorist pursuant to a traffic stop is presumptively temporary and brief . . . [and] circumstances associated with the typical traffic stop are not such that the motorist feels completely at the mercy of the police. . . . In short, the atmosphere surrounding an ordinary traffic stop is substantially less 'police dominated' than that surrounding the kinds of interrogation at issue in Miranda. . . . [T]he usual traffic stop is more analogous to a so called 'Terry stop. . . .' "

In Crum v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals held that roadside questioning during the investigation of a routine traffic incident generally does not constitute a custodial situation. In State v. Pastorini, the court held that where an officer obtained the defendant's driver's license and insurance card while investigating an accident, and then administered field sobriety tests after observing signs of drunkenness, the defendant was not in custody as contemplated by Miranda until he was formally arrested. In Sutton v. State, the court pointed out that "an officer conducting a routine traffic stop may request and examine a driver's license and vehicle registration and run a computer check on the documents."

However, in State v. O'Donnell, the defendant was involved in a two car accident. The defendant left the scene and was almost immediately involved in a second accident, where he was arrested. An officer questioned him and had him perform field sobriety tests. The appellate court held that since the defendant was under arrest, "a Miranda warning must be given regardless of whether the questioning occurs in the context of a routine investigation of a traffic offense."

A Terry stop-and-frisk is regarded in Georgia as an investigative detention which does not in any significant way deprive a person of his freedom. Thus, questioning incident to a stop-and-frisk has been held not to amount to a custodial interrogation as contemplated by Miranda. See Goger, Daniel's Georgia Handbook on Criminal Evidence (2009 ed.), § 7–16.

In Quinn v. State, an officer with an arrest warrant for the defendant went to the defendant's house. "Before he placed defendant under arrest, the officer told defendant about the shooting incident, adding that he was 'not quite clear on everything that happened,' but that he did know that a 'shiny nickel weapon' was used. . . . Then he asked defendant if he owned a similar weapon. [The] [d]efendant replied that he did; he 'went inside,' brought the gun out and 'voluntarily' gave it to the officer." Thereupon, he was placed under arrest and then advised of his rights. The court affirmed the finding that there was no Miranda violation because he was not in custody until after the gun was handed to the officer.

The questioning of a person serving time for another crime is regarded as a custodial interrogation. In the absence of Miranda warnings or a valid waiver, any statement thus obtained is inadmissible. However, in Minnesota v. Murphy, the United States Supreme Court held that a defendant was not in custody at the time he made a confession to his probation officer in another case.

If a defendant, after an automobile collision, is found by the side of the road and questioned by the police, he is not regarded as being in custody at that time.

The Texas Court of Criminal Appeals has held that interrogation becomes custodial when the suspect admits committing the offense he is being questioned about.

In addition to Miranda warnings being required before a person in custody is questioned by police or representatives of the district attorney, the United States Supreme Court held in Estelle v. Smith that Miranda warnings have to be given before a psychiatric interview ordered by a trial judge on his own initiative where the defendant was being held for murder.

§ 5-13 Confessions and admissions—Miranda v. Arizona—Interrogation

Generally, on-the-scene questioning of citizens as to the facts surrounding a crime is not curtailed by Miranda. Routine police questioning not related to the investigation of the case does not amount to a custodial interrogation within the meaning of Miranda. An officer's question, "What are you doing here?" asked of a suspect who was apprehended at gunpoint is not an interrogation. The statement, volunteered by a defendant, "Well, you all got me," blurted out in a police car is admissible, even though not preceded by Miranda warnings. "Furthermore, a police officer's question, prompted by defendant's volunteered remark falls under the same exception."

A public safety exception to Miranda warnings is "not [dependent] upon the motivation for the individuals involved." This is a reversal of the holding in State v. Overby, which limited the exception to situations in which the sole purpose of questioning was for determining danger to persons at the scene.

Confessions which are volunteered are not affected by Miranda. In Beeks v. State, the defendant reported to the sheriff that a certain individual stole his car. While the defendant was in a car with two officers en route to report the theft, he made incriminating statements which were held voluntary and admissible.

The four cases making up the Miranda decision all involved action of law enforcement officials in attempting to get statements or confessions, and Miranda applies only to interrogations by law enforcement officers. The Georgia Supreme Court has held that questions asked by family members fall outside Miranda protection. In Cook v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court held that case by case analysis should be used when determining if the Miranda protections apply to the statements made by a child to a parent who is employed in law enforcement. Furthermore, the Georgia Court of Appeals has held that Miranda does not apply to the in-custody statement made to a caseworker of the Department of Family and Children Services in a cruelty to children case because the caseworker was not a law enforcement officer. Additionally, Miranda was held to be inapplicable in a situation where a private citizen was protecting his property. However, it has been pointed out that most of the courts considering the question have held that the requirements of Miranda apply to a statement obtained by a parole officer from questioning related to the parole function.

Once Miranda warnings are given and the suspect indicates his desire to remain silent, the questioning must cease. However, there is no blanket prohibition against subsequent questioning with the voluntariness of any later incriminating statement depending upon the facts of the individual case. However, in Edwards v. Arizona, the United States Supreme Court distinguished the right to remain silent from the right to counsel under the Fifth Amendment and held that "when an accused has invoked his right to have counsel present during custodial interrogation, a valid waiver of that right cannot be established by showing only that he responded to further police-initiated custodial interrogation even if he has been advised of his rights." See section 5-20, infra.

In Rhode Island v. Innis, the United States Supreme Court said that interrogation, as conceptualized in Mi- randa, "must reflect a measure of compulsion above and beyond that inherent in custody itself . . . Miranda safeguards come into play whenever a person in custody is subjected to either express questioning or its functional equivalent. . . . [Miranda applies] to any words or actions on the part of the police (other than those normally attendant to arrest and custody) that the police should know are reasonably likely to elicit an incriminating response from the suspect. . . . A practice that the police should know is reasonably likely to evoke an incriminating response from a suspect thus amounts to interrogation" even if no direct question is asked. See section 14-27, infra, on discovery of a defendant's statements while in custody. However, in the 1990 case of Illinois v. Perkins, the United States Supreme Court held that Miranda warnings do not have to be given by an undercover policeman, posing as an inmate, before he questions an inmate about a crime the officer is investigating.

In Carr v. State, two defendants were arrested and placed in a patrol car where a hidden recorder recorded the conversation between the defendants. The court found that this was not interrogation and that officers "do not interrogate a suspect simply by hoping that he will incriminate himself."

In Washington v. State, where the defendant indicated that he did not wish to talk and stated that the police did not have any evidence against him, the court held that there was no interrogation where an officer informed the defendant of the evidence against him and the defendant then decided to talk. However, in State v. Darby, the court ruled that telling a suspect that he could only tell "his side" of things if he first signed a Miranda waiver was improper. The court noted that the suspect should have been advised that "he could make a voluntary statement but that he could not be interrogated by the officers without first signing the waiver."

In Williams v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court concluded that there was nothing to suggest that a sheriff should have known that his conduct was "reasonably likely to elicit an incriminating response from Williams" in taking him "back to the location where the killing occurred while he was still intoxicated and disoriented."

In Johnson v. State, the defendant, who was in custody on unrelated charges, was brought to the interview room for questioning where he was shown a picture of the victim prior to being informed of his Miranda rights. He stated, "I guess I know why I'm here now. I didn't shoot that man. I never got out of the car." The appellate court affirmed the action of the trial judge in admitting this statement in evidence as voluntary.

In Shoemaker v. State, an officer asked the driver of a car some questions. Both passengers responded with explanations. The Georgia Court of Appeals concluded that the spontaneous declaration of a passenger was not a result of police questioning of the declarant and was admissible.

In Lazenby v. State, the court affirmed the denial of a motion to suppress statements the defendant made while the arresting officer was attempting to read him his Miranda rights.

In Pennsylvania v. Muniz, the defendant was arrested for driving under the influence. He was taken routinely to a booking center and told that his voice and actions would be taped. Without being given Miranda warnings, he was asked questions about his name, address, height, weight, eye color, date of birth and current age. He was also asked and was not able to give the date of his sixth birthday. The United States Supreme Court held that the defendant's response to the date of his sixth birthday was testimonial and not admissible. The other questions were not regarded as interrogation. The taping of the sobriety test and incriminating statements of the defendant during the test were held admissible. See section 2-22, supra, on booking.

In Georgia it has been held that routine questions to the defendant at the time of arrest, such as the defendant's name or date of birth, are not generally regarded as interrogation. In Edwards v. State, the court found that there was no interrogation when a booking officer obtains information such as name, address, telephone number, social security number, date and place of birth, employer, height, and weight.

See section 5-19, infra, on waiver and assertion of Miranda rights. See section 5-10, supra, on confessions made to a cellmate.

§ 5-14 Confessions and admissions—Miranda v. Arizona—Warnings

As pointed out in section 5-11, supra, if there is in-custody interrogation by law enforcement officers and the prosecution wishes to introduce into evidence a statement by a defendant, it must be shown (1) that the defendant was adequately warned and (2) that he knowingly and intelligently waived his right to remain silent and his right to presence of counsel at the time of the interrogation.

In Miranda, the Court summarized the warnings required as follows: Prior to any questioning, the person must be warned (1) that he has a right to remain silent, (2) that any statement he makes may be used as evidence against him, (3) that he has a right to the presence of an attorney, and (4) that if he cannot afford an attorney, one will be appointed for him prior to any questioning if he so desires. If the accused indicates in any manner at any stage of the process that he wishes to consult with an attorney, questioning must cease. Likewise, if the individual is alone and indicates in any manner that he does not wish to be interrogated, the police may not question him. The mere fact that he may have answered some questions or volunteered statements does not deprive him of the right to refrain from answering any further inquiries until he has consulted with an attorney and thereafter consents to further questioning.

However, in Duckworth v. Eagan, the United States Supreme Court held that the Miranda warnings were satisfactory even though they contained a statement that the officers had "no way of giving you a lawyer, but one will be appointed for you, if you wish, if and when you go to court."

Miranda warnings are commonly given by reading them from a card which has been prepared for this purpose. However, an officer may give the warnings from memory rather than reading them. Many officers in Georgia currently use a Miranda warning card which contains the following material:

"1. You have the right to remain silent.

"2. Anything you say can and will be used against you in a court of law.

"3. You have the right to talk to a lawyer and have him present with you while you are being questioned.

"4. If you cannot afford to hire a lawyer, one will be appointed to represent you before any questioning, if you wish."

On the card quoted from above, a fifth statement is included:

"5. You can decide at any time to exercise these rights and not answer any questions or make any statements."

The reverse side of the card contains the following:

"WAIVER

"After the warning and in order to secure a waiver, the following questions should be asked and an affirmative reply secured to each question.

"1. Do you understand each of these rights I have explained to you?

"2. Having these rights in mind, do you wish to talk to us now?"

All of the warnings as prescribed in Miranda must be given, not just a part of them. Number 5 as set out above is not required.

The pre-questioning warnings must be given in a clear manner and in language understandable to the suspect. However, a person under arrest may be given a document containing the warnings. If the accused reads the warnings and signs a statement saying he clearly understands them, the warnings are generally considered to have been satisfactorily given even if the defendant later testifies that he did not comprehend all of the words.

In the opinion in In the Interest of D. T. C., the court pointed out that the "facts that D. T. C. has an I.Q. of 64, has an intellectual deficiency and may be mentally retarded do not automatically invalidate his waiver of Miranda rights." In Coppock v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court held that "the fact that an individual may be moderately retarded is not sufficient to exclude . . . [his] statement."

Despite the broad language of Miranda, a number of courts have held that the need to give the prescribed warnings does not apply for routine traffic violations. Some of these courts have found an absence of the required custody, while others have regarded questions asked a driver as a limited on-the-scene investigation rather than an interrogation. However, if an officer determines that a driver should be arrested, Miranda warnings must be given. In the 1984 case of Berkemer v. McCarty, the United States Supreme Court held that Miranda safeguards must be complied with whenever there is custodial interrogation, regardless of the severity of the offense. However, the Court also pointed out that a routine traffic stop does not ordinarily amount to custody under Miranda. See section 5-12, supra, on traffic violations.

In Foster v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court held that statements made by officers to the defendant that his confession "was not going to hurt 'a thing' and that it would be 'as much for your benefit as ours . . .' " is not consistent with warnings required by Miranda.

It seems that in emergency situations, at least when there is not time to give Miranda warnings, questions asked to protect the safety of a person or persons are not prohibited by Miranda. See section 5-11, supra.

Generally, it is not necessary to inform a suspect of the nature of the offense with which he is being charged.

Although Miranda warnings must be given before questioning begins, it has been held that it is not necessary to repeat the warnings prior to a later session of interrogation if the interrogations are continuing in nature and separated by only a short time span. Where one investigating officer replaces another, a suspect who has been provided his rights and signed a waiver need not be given additional warnings where the lapse between the questioning was brief. In McSears v. State, the defendant was given Miranda warnings in connection with one case. Later during the interview, without Miranda warnings being given again, the defendant made a statement about another case. He was tried for the second case. The appellate court affirmed the admissibility of the admissions made during the interview relating to the second case. It has also been pointed out that if full warnings are given a defendant, at subsequent questionings it is not necessary that they be preceded by the complete warning if the defendant is reminded that he was previously advised of his rights. Where a defendant's attorney informs an officer that his client wishes to make a statement, there is no need to give the Miranda warnings. On the other hand, the United States Supreme Court has held inadmissible incriminating statements obtained by officers where there had been an agreement between the officers and the suspect's attorney that the suspect would not be questioned while being transported from one city to another.

§ 5-15 Confessions and admissions—Miranda v. Arizona—Warnings—Right to remain silent

Prior to any questioning, a person in custody must be warned of the right to remain silent. In fact, it appears that the remainder of the warnings are intended in large measure to implement this first warning. As noted in Miranda, an accused needs a warning concerning the right to remain silent because of the inherently compelling nature of in-custody interrogations.

The exercise of the right to remain silent must be unequivocal. Statements made by an accused after ambiguous assertions of the right, such as " . . . I can stop the interrogation. Right? Yes or no?" will not qualify and police may continue questioning. In addition, police are under no obligation to ask clarifying questions of the accused as to whether he or she fully comprehends the extent of the right to remain silent. Although acknowledging that such clarifying questions might be good police practice, the United States Supreme Court, in Davis v. United States, refused to apply such a rule where the right to counsel was concerned. Several federal courts and the Georgia Supreme Court in Perez have ruled that in the absence of an unequivocal assertion of the right to remain silent, police questioning of an accused in custody may proceed without any obligation on the part of the police to seek clarification of an accused's ambiguous statement about the right to remain silent.

If a defendant chooses to remain silent after receiving Miranda warnings, it is a violation of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment for the prosecution to use the accused's silence to impeach him. However, in Jackson v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court held that when a defendant on direct examination testifies that he made no statement, he may be cross-examined about his post-arrest silence. In Osborne v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals held that "[t]he silence of an arrestee prior to his receipt of the Miranda warnings may be used by the State for purposes of impeachment." In Fallen v. State, "defense counsel elicited from his client the statement that he was never asked . . . to make a written statement." The court found no error in the district attorney bringing out on cross-examination that he was not asked to make a statement, because on being given his Miranda warnings, he elected to remain silent.

The Georgia Supreme Court has held this prohibition to be inapplicable to earlier cases where the issue was not raised in the trial court and to appeals which were completed before June 17, 1976, the date of the decision in Doyle v. Ohio. The rule against using a defendant's silence to impeach him does not apply retroactively in habeas corpus or other post-appeal attacks unless the point was properly raised in the trial court.

It is error for the trial judge to allow an officer "to testify that after being read his rights and after answering one question, the defendant refused to answer a second question and then said his lawyer would be available the next day. The defendant has the right to remain silent and to be represented by counsel and the exercise of these rights is not to be used as evidence against him."

However, if a defendant does not elect to remain silent and he makes a statement and if at trial he makes a different statement, the earlier statement is admissible for purposes of impeachment if the statement is freely and voluntarily made.

See section 5-20, infra, on duty to speak and tacit admissions. Also see section 7-7, subparagraph (5), infra. Also see section 5-19, infra, on questioning a defendant after he says he wants counsel.

§ 5-16 Confessions and admissions—Miranda v. Arizona—Warnings—Use in court of any statements

In summarizing the warning requirements, the United States Supreme Court in Miranda noted that any statement an accused makes "may be used against him." However, another part of the opinion goes on to state that the warnings should include a statement that "anything said can and will be used against the individual in court." It appears that a warning advising a suspect that any statement he makes "can and will" be used against him is not necessary.

§ 5-17 Confessions and admissions—Miranda v. Arizona—Warnings—Right to have counsel present

The right to have counsel present at an in-custody interrogation is "indispensable to the protection of the Fifth Amendment privilege." However, Miranda does not require an officer to inform a defendant how he can obtain counsel. Also, the Georgia Supreme Court has held that the Miranda warnings do not have to contain a statement that if during the course of questioning the suspect wishes an attorney, he may cease answering questions and will not be required to answer further questions until his attorney is present.

While questioning must cease when a suspect in custody says that he wants counsel, unless the right to counsel is later waived, a request to talk with some other person, such as a probation officer or a relative, does not require that questioning stop.

Signing a waiver to counsel after being told that counsel was not immediately available is still a valid waiver, even though the suspect was never provided with counsel during the interrogation. Likewise, a custodial statement was deemed properly admitted in Moore v. State, where the defendant agreed to an interrogation after signing a waiver and communicating, "I guess I'll get a lawyer too."

While a suspect has a right to invoke his right to counsel, this right is personal and cannot be invoked by another. Thus, where an attorney calls officers who have a defendant in custody and requests that questioning of the defendant cease until counsel arrives, this does not amount to an exercise of the defendant's right to counsel at the time of questioning. Likewise, in Blanks v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court held that where a suspect had been given the Miranda warnings a number of times, had waived his right to be silent, and was making a loud statement, officers were not obligated to inform him that an attorney had been hired for him and that the attorney wanted to confer with him. Moreover, in Davis v. United States, the United States Supreme Court held that for a defendant to invoke his right to counsel under the Fifth Amendment, the request must be unambiguous. The Georgia Supreme Court has since adapted the reasoning in Davis and in the absence of an unambiguous request for counsel, police may question an accused who has been properly advised of his rights to counsel.

§ 5-18 Confessions and admissions—Miranda v. Arizona—Warnings—Right to have counsel appointed

The Miranda warnings must effectively advise the accused of his right to a court-appointed counsel. However, it is not necessary to furnish counsel to a suspect where he can afford to employ an attorney on his own. Thus, it has been held that a warning is not defective if the provision for the appointment of counsel is omitted unless it appears that the defendant was indigent.

§ 5-19 Confessions and admissions—Miranda v. Arizona—Waiver—Right to remain silent

As previously pointed out in section 5-11, supra, if there is in-custody interrogation by the state or its representatives, a statement of the defendant obtained by officers is not admissible unless (1) the defendant was adequately warned (section 5-14, supra) and (2) the defendant validly waived his right of silence and, if counsel was not present, his right to the presence of counsel at the time of the interrogation.

An in-custody suspect must clearly and affirmatively waive his right to silence and counsel. A waiver cannot be implied from the silence of the suspect nor from the fact that a confession was obtained. There is no presumption that the defendant knowingly and intelligently waived his Miranda rights. In fact, the "courts must presume that a defendant did not waive his rights; the prosecution's burden is great." However, the failure of a suspect to expressly waive (in writing or orally) his right to remain silent does not automatically prevent the admission of a statement which he thereafter makes.

In Michigan v. Mosley, the defendant, who had been arrested in connection with certain robberies, exercised his right to remain silent after he was advised of his Miranda rights. More than two hours later, a different officer took the defendant to another part of the building, Mirandized the defendant again, and asked him questions about an unrelated holdup murder. At that time defendant made incriminating statements. The United States Supreme Court used a totality of circumstances analysis and held that the defendant's statements were obtained lawfully under the Fifth Amendment and were therefore properly admitted against him at trial. The court considered that (1) the defendant had been advised of his Miranda rights at both interrogations, (2) when the defendant exercised his right to remain silent at the first interrogation, the officer immediately ceased the questioning, and (3) the second interrogation occurred after a significant time lapse, was directed solely at the murder holdup, to which the defendant had not invoked his Miranda rights, and was conducted at another location in the building by another officer.

In the 2006 case of Griffin v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court considered the case of a defendant who sought to suppress incriminating statements where an officer honored the defendant's right to remain silent in the first interview, but then returned four days later to question the defendant about the same crime. The court affirmed the denial of the defendant's motion to suppress, holding that "a second interrogation regarding the same crime may also be constitutional under Mosley . . . where the initial invocation of the right to remain silent was scrupulously honored."

It has generally been held that it is not necessary to show that a suspect was informed of the charge against him. In Vaughan v. State, the court held that the failure of an officer "to advise a suspect as to the crimes about which he is to be questioned prior to the suspect's waiver of his Miranda rights is not relevant to the question of whether the suspect's waiver was knowing and voluntary."

In Colorado v. Spring, the United States Supreme Court held that the failure of an officer to inform a suspect that he would be questioned about a murder did not invalidate the interrogation. " '[O]ne who is told he is free to refuse to answer questions . . . [cannot] later complain that his answers were compelled.' . . . Here, the additional information could affect only the wisdom of a Miranda waiver, not its essentially voluntary and knowing nature. Accordingly, the failure of the law enforcement officials to inform Spring of the subject matter of the interrogation could not affect Spring's decision to waive his Fifth Amendment privilege in a constitutionally significant manner."

The fact that a person declined to sign a written waiver does not mean that a later statement which is obtained is automatically inadmissible. In Moore v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals held that the defendant's refusal to sign a transcription of his confession, based on his belief that the unsigned statement could not be used against him, did not prevent the admissibility of the confession.

While the burden rests on the government to demonstrate that the defendant voluntarily, knowingly, and intelligently waived his privilege against self-incrimination and his right to retained or appointed counsel, where there is questioning of an in-custody suspect without the presence of an attorney, a defendant is not entitled to counsel to help him determine whether to waive his Miranda rights. In some jurisdictions, the state's burden of demonstrating an intelligent and knowing waiver is not met when only one officer testifies, when in fact two policemen were present at the time of the waiver, if there is a conflict in the evidence between the defendant and the testifying officer. However, Georgia has declined to follow these states.

In Colorado v. Connelly, the United States Supreme Court held that the burden placed on the state is to prove waiver by a preponderance of the evidence, and pointed out Miranda is concerned with governmental coercion and is not concerned "with moral and psychological pressures to confess emanating from sources other than official coercion."

In United States v. Hernandez, the Fifth Circuit pointed out that the "more times police inform a suspect of his rights in the face of his repeated invocation of one of those rights—the right to remain silent—the clearer it becomes that the police must not mean what they say. This is exactly the type of subtle coercive pressure which the Miranda opinion condemned."

Intoxication does not automatically prevent a valid waiver. A waiver by the defendant whose blood alcohol percentage was.27 has been upheld. Where a defendant had been shot and he contended that he was under the influence of alcohol and drugs and was suffering a great deal of pain, he was found to have understood and waived his Miranda rights when making a statement at a hospital. In Felts v. State, the Court of Appeals pointed out that "where a suspect is coherent and his demeanor indicates that he understands his rights and has waived those rights, intoxication will not be a defense."

Furthermore, a suspect need not have a great deal of intelligence to waive his Miranda rights. A waiver by a suspect with a mental age of 6 and I. Q. of 60 has been upheld. Likewise, the fact that a defendant is illiterate and was in a special education class when he was in school does not mean he is "incapable of understanding his Miranda rights when they are read to him." Also a waiver may be valid even though the "defendant may have been suffering from some mental condition" or is moderately retarded. In Kerr v. State, there was evidence that the defendant ranked in the lower 3% of the population in range of intelligence. The defendant contended that "he could not have made an intelligent waiver of Miranda rights, because he is not 'intelligent.' "In affirming the trial judge's finding that the defendant knowingly and voluntarily waived his Miranda rights, the court pointed out that there is no requirement that a suspect have a high or average degree of intelligence "but requires a knowing waiver."

Neither does an imperfect translation of a defendant's Miranda rights necessarily nullify an otherwise valid rights waiver. In Nguyen v. State, the court upheld the trial court's admission of the defendant's confession where the record showed that the defendant's Miranda rights were duly explained and that the defendant understood such rights. Under such circumstances, an imperfect translation of the defendant's rights will not foreclose a valid rights waiver.

It has been held that there is a distinction between the weight of the evidence required to show that a statement was made voluntarily and the evidence required to show a Miranda waiver. Thus, where an individual is "distraught, upset, weeping and obviously out of control" even if his statements were voluntary for the purpose of the Fifth Amendment, his condition may be such as to prevent a showing of "the higher standard . . . [required] with respect to waiver of the right to counsel that applies when the Sixth Amendment has attached." See section 5-4, supra.

In United States v. Reyna, the defendant underwent custodial interrogation without receiving the Miranda warnings and confessed. Immediately thereafter he was given the warnings, and he repeated the confession. The Fifth Circuit held that the "first" confession was tainted and that neither the "first" nor "second" confession was admissible. The confessions were said to be "so closely related in time and circumstance that they were one and the same." The idea is that the defendant "let the cat out of the bag" when he made the first statement.

However, in Oregon v. Elstad, the United States Supreme Court said that a "suspect who has once responded to unwarned . . . [and] uncoercive questioning is not thereby disabled from waiving his rights and confessing after he has been given the requisite Miranda warnings," even though he had made an admission of being present at the scene of the crime in response to his earlier questioning. In Thornton v. State, while in jail the defendant wrote a note to an investigator asking how he could "turn state's evidence." The investigator conducted a video interview with the defendant in which he proclaimed his innocence. No Miranda warnings had been given. The Georgia Supreme Court held that "[u]nwarned statements that are otherwise voluntary within the meaning of the Fifth Amendment must nevertheless be excluded from evidence under Miranda."

In Sliger v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court held that the Unified Appeal Procedure giving the defendant an opportunity to state any objections he may have to defense counsel is not compelling the defendant to be a witness against himself.

It has been held that the best evidence of waiver by an in-custody suspect is a signed written waiver form. Such a waiver is set out in Moody v. State. However, there is no obligation on the state to give the defendant a copy of the signed waiver form, and there is no requirement that a copy of the waiver be furnished to defense counsel pursuant to a request for a copy of statements made by the defendant while in custody. See section 14-27, infra, for a request for a copy of such statements. Even when there is a valid waiver of counsel and a suspect begins to answer questions, he may at any time change his mind and exercise his right to remain silent. If he exercises this right, questioning must cease immediately.

§ 5-20 Confessions and admissions—Miranda v. Arizona—Waiver—Right to counsel

In Edwards v. Arizona, the United States Supreme Court established a per se rule, holding that once the Miranda right to counsel has been invoked, any further conversation between police and suspect (1) must be initiated by the suspect, and (2) "waivers of counsel must not only be voluntary, but constitute a knowing and intelligent relinquishment or abandonment of a known right or privilege." In Edwards, the defendant was arrested and Mirandized, after which he told police he wanted to "make a deal." Edwards then told officers he wanted "an attorney before making a deal" and the questioning ceased. The following morning, before the defendant had access to counsel, two different officers Mirandized the defendant again, he waived his rights, and confessed to the same crime about which he was questioned earlier. The court held that Edwards' incriminating statements should not have been admitted against him at trial.

The Georgia Supreme Court in Gissendaner v. State considered a case in which the lawyer, not the suspect, told officers he wanted to be present at any interviews between the suspect and officers. The court, in reversing the conviction, treated the statement of counsel as being the invocation by the suspect of her right to have counsel present before officers talked with the defendant.

In Oregon v. Bradshaw, the United States Supreme Court clarified what it means for a suspect to "initiate" a conversation under Edwards. In the plurality opinion, then Justice Rehnquist defined "initiation" of a conversation as when the suspect "evince[s] a willingness and desire for a generalized discussion about the investigation." In Sanders v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals cited Bradshaw and said that where an in-custody defendant requests a lawyer, an analysis of whether the in-custody defendant who has invoked his right to counsel under Miranda "has later waived that right proceeds in two steps. First, a determination as to whether the defendant initiated further talks with the police, and second, if so, whether his waiver was shown to be voluntary under the totality of the circumstances."

Applying Bradshaw, the Supreme Court in Connecticut v. Barrett held that a suspect did not invoke his right to counsel within the meaning of Edwards where he received Miranda warnings and then stated that "he would not give police any written statements [without having counsel present] but [that] he had no problem in talking about the incident." The court regarded this statement as ambiguous; therefore, the oral statement which followed was admissible.

The Edwards rule applies where the right to counsel is invoked "during custodial interrogation." However, this situation is to be distinguished from that in Michigan v. Mosley, where the defendant was arrested and exercised his right to remain silent after receiving Miranda warnings. In Moseley, some hours after arrest and exercising his right to remain silent, another officer Mirandized the defendant and questioned him about an unrelated crime. The defendant made a statement which was admitted into evidence at trial. The Supreme Court affirmed the admission of the statement. In Fields v. State, the court cited Moseley and said Fields is similar to Moseley except in Fields officers sought the same information at each encounter. However, in Fields there was a 10–month period between the two instances and the defendant wished to make a statement at the later time. The court affirmed the admission of the statement.

In the 2006 case of Griffin v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court considered the case of a defendant who sought to suppress incriminating statements where an officer honored the defendant's right to remain silent in the first interview, but then returned four days later to question the defendant about the same crime. The court affirmed the denial of the defendant's motion to suppress, holding that "a second interrogation regarding the same crime may also be constitutional under Mosley . . . where the initial invocation of the right to remain silent was scrupulously honored."

In the 1986 case of Michigan v. Jackson, the United States Supreme Court held that where a defendant at arraignment requests counsel, the police may not thereafter initiate interrogation with the defendant. The court found the reasoning of Edwards, which was based on the Fifth Amendment, to apply with even greater force in this situation where the right was based on the Sixth Amendment right to counsel. Jackson, however, was overruled in Montejo v. Louisiana. The court found that Jackson was simply not tenable, at least with respect to a defendant's right to counsel where, after the appointment of counsel, the defendant voluntarily executes a proper waiver of counsel and speaks with police. The court said that Jackson was designed to prohibit police "badgering" and that Miranda warnings were sufficient to assure only voluntary waivers of counsel. Accordingly, police may not approach a represented defendant and request an interview without counsel being present provided only that the defendant is first advised of his right to counsel and then voluntarily waives that right.

In McNeil v. Wisconsin, the United States Supreme Court considered a case in which McNeil was represented by counsel at a bond hearing and was not released on bond, and then while still in jail and on the same day as the bond hearing, he was approached by officers, was given Miranda warnings, and was questioned about an unrelated murder, and he gave a statement. The court found that there had been no Miranda violation. The assertion of the Sixth Amendment right of counsel in one case does not bar the statement obtained in the unrelated case. Also, in State v. Jenkins, the same court held that "[t]he fact that . . . [the defendant] was questioned by a detective other than the one to whom he had made the request for counsel does not excuse the continued questioning after the request."

In Texas v. Cobb, the United States Supreme Court considered a case in which the defendant was charged with burglary and counsel was appointed for him in that case. Law enforcement officers approached the defendant and interrogated him about a murder which was factually related to the burglary. The court held that officers may interrogate the defendant about the other offense or offenses as long as the other offense or offenses have not been formally charged and the officers comply with the requirements of Miranda.

In Vaughn v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court cited and followed the rule of Edwards. However, the Georgia Supreme Court has held that "fruits" of a voluntary statement obtained in violation of Edwards are admissible even though the statement itself is not admissible at trial.

In Roper v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court held that "once an accused in custody invokes the right to counsel, he should not be subject to further interrogation by the authorities until counsel is present, unless the accused himself initiates further communication. . . ." (Emphasis added.) It is the duty of law enforcement authorities "to maintain a procedure to enable an officer who proposes to initiate an interrogation to determine whether a suspect has previously invoked the right to counsel. . . . The fact that the interrogating officers had no actual knowledge that . . . [the defendant] had made a request for counsel is constitutionally insignificant. . . . [The defendant's] negative answer to the question of whether he had a lawyer did not answer the question of whether he had invoked the right to counsel, nor could it constitute a waiver."

In State v. Hatcher, after the defendant was arrested "he was provided with and completed at the jail an 'eligibility affidavit form' for appointed counsel." The form stated that he could not afford a lawyer and wanted the court to appoint one for him. Two days later an investigator, who was generally aware of the booking procedures including the request for a lawyer, interviewed the defendant and gave him Miranda warnings. The defendant signed a waiver and made a confession. The Georgia Supreme Court held that the confession was admissible since "the form at issue was offered by the police and completed by appellant as a housekeeping measure; not for the questioning which was to take place a few days later, but as a prospective request for counsel 'when the government's role [would shift] from investigation to accusation.' . . . [T]he form was promulgated to satisfy an accused's Sixth Amendment right to counsel and cannot reasonably be read to constitute an invocation of right to counsel for purposes of the Fifth Amendment."

In Cansler v. State, the court held that "whether or not the detective knew of the request for an attorney is not dispositive. . . . [Also] the . . . [defendant's] later denial of the statement [does not] refute the contention that the detective initiated the interrogation."

In Minnick v. Mississippi, the defendant invoked his right to counsel. Counsel was then appointed and spoke with the defendant. Thereafter the police returned and, without an attorney, the defendant made statements later used against him at trial. The United States Supreme Court held that the fact that the defendant consulted with counsel did not suspend his Fifth Amendment rights in a way that would allow police to interrogate the defendant in the absence of his attorney, unless the defendant initiates the conversation and waives his rights.

In Petty v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court rejected the notion that Edwards had any application to a noncustodial interrogation and overruled Nobles v. State, to the extent it suggested that police must cease questioning an accused who is not in custody after he or she requests an attorney. In Peebles v. State, the court held that the assertion of the right to counsel does not render inadmissible any statement made by the defendant before he asserted the right of counsel. See Annotation, "What Constitutes Assertion of Right to Counsel Following Miranda Warnings—State Cases," 83 A. L. R. 4th 443.

However, in State v. Bymes, the Georgia Supreme Court held that because of "a 21–month break in custody between the initial interrogation and the final interrogation," Edwards did not apply; and in the 1994 case of Wilson v. State, the court held that Edwards did not apply where there was a seven-month break in custody.

It has been pointed out "that a waiver is possible if the request for counsel is equivocal." Thus, in Georgia it has been held that where a defendant was given Miranda warnings and an officer asked if he wanted to talk and the defendant said, "Well, it's no use," and the officer said it was up to him and asked again if he wanted to talk, and the defendant said yes and made a statement, there was no Edwards violation. However, in Wilson v. State, the United States Supreme Court held that once a defendant expresses a desire for counsel, questioning must cease and response to further interrogation cannot be used to cast doubt on the initial request. In Lucas v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court reversed the trial court, concluding that the defendant's statement during questioning that his lawyer told him not to say anything was an invocation of the Fifth Amendment. The concurring opinion by two justices stated that the officers should have sought clarification of his "equivocal request" before asking any other questions other than those related to whether or not the defendant wanted to stop talking.

In Vasser v. State, when the investigator mentioned the right to an attorney during the reading of the defendant's Miranda warnings, the defendant, in custody at the time, stated, "That's what I want. I want a lawyer." However, when the investigator again asked the defendant if he wanted an attorney at the conclusion of the Miranda warnings, the defendant responded, "It doesn't matter. I don't have nothing to hide." The investigator then proceeded to conduct an interrogation of the defendant, during the course of which the defendant asked, "After I beat this case, can I be a policeman, an investigator or something?" Finding that the defendant's question did not constitute an attempt to "initiate" conversation about the charges, the Court of Appeals held that the defendant clearly invoked his right to counsel and suppressed the in-custody statements.

In Davis v. United States, the defendant waived his right to remain silent and to have counsel, both orally and in writing. After being questioned for one and one-half hours the defendant said, "Maybe I should talk to a lawyer." The defendant was asked to clarify his comment to which he stated he was not asking for a lawyer. The defendant was then reminded of his rights and the questioning was continued. About one hour later the defendant said, "I think I want a lawyer before I say anything else." Questioning was stopped at this point. The United States Supreme Court held that "the suspect must unambiguously request counsel . . . [H]e must articulate his desire to have counsel present sufficiently clearly that a reasonable police officer in the circumstances would understand the statement to be a request for an attorney. If the statement fails to meet the requisite level of clarity, Edwards does not require that the officers stop questioning the suspect." The Georgia Supreme Court has expressly adopted Davis and has repudiated prior authority which required police to clarify ambiguous requests for counsel by a criminal suspect before interrogation could continue.

In Berry v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court held that if a request for counsel "was unambiguously limited to the taking of a polygraph examination and did not encompass the custodial interrogation," this did not prevent further questioning. In Baird v. State, the defendant said that he "might ought to talk to a lawyer" in response to a request to search his vehicle. The Baird court held (1) that this was not an assertion of his Fifth Amendment right to counsel, and (2) that where a limited request for counsel is made, officers are "required to honor [it] to no greater extent than the express limits of his reservation." Also, the court declined "to adopt a rule requiring officers to ask clarifying questions."

In Hall v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court pointed out that "where the accused asks a question that contains an ambiguous or equivocal reference to the availability of counsel, an interrogating officer must be given considerable latitude in formulating a reasonable and responsive answer."

In the interesting case of Underwood v. State, the defendant, after having been given his Miranda rights, handed the agents his lawyer's business card. On the back of "the card" there was a preprinted statement as follows: "I refuse to consent to any search of my premises, the location of my arrest, my car or my effects. I wish to exercise my rights under the fifth and sixth amendments to remain silent and to have my attorney present for any questioning or line up. If you ignore my wish to exercise these rights and attempt to procure a waiver I wish to confer with my attorney prior to any conversation with law enforcement agents on subject of waiver." When presented with the card, the officers "immediately terminated the interview." The court did not pass on the issue of "whether such an ambiguous act place[d] a burden on law enforcement officers to inquire whether any of the rights addressed on the preprinted business card are, in fact, being asserted." However, while the defendant was going back to the jail area, he stated "there were some things we could talk about." He was read the Miranda warnings and he signed the Miranda form. The appellate court affirmed the trial judge in admitting the defendant's statements which were given.

In Ottis v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court affirmed the conviction where the defendant said "she wished to talk to the detectives if her attorney was contacted." The detective was "unable to contact her attorney" and so informed the defendant. Then the defendant "initiated the discussion with the police which led to her spontaneous . . . statement placing her at the scene of the crimes, thereby knowingly and intelligently waiving the right she had invoked."

In Gissendaner v. State, a police investigator called the defendant, who was the focus of the investigation in the disappearance of her husband. He requested a meeting with the defendant. Later that day an attorney called and told the officer that counsel had met with defendant, that she wanted him to represent her, and that he wanted to be present at any interview between defendant and police. It was tentatively agreed that the three would meet on February 21. The officer did not hear from the attorney until February 21. On that day the officer went to the defendant's house and informed her that the body of her husband had been found. The defendant was arrested at her home about 1:30 a.m. on February 25. The defendant asked if she could call her attorney and was told she could not. The defendant was placed in a police car, and Miranda warnings were administered, and she agreed to talk with police. The Georgia Supreme Court reversed the conviction, finding that there had been a violation of Edwards v. Arizona.

In the 2000 case of Lucas v. State, the defendant told the interrogating officer that his "lawyer told me . . . to say nothing." Later during the interview the defendant said "[my lawyer] told me . . . to answer nothing." The interrogation continued without pause in both instances. The Georgia Supreme Court concluded "that under the circumstances . . . a reasonable police officer would have understood . . . [the defendant's] statements to be a request for counsel to be present during questioning." The court reversed the trial court's admission of the defendant's statement saying that it was "clearly erroneous."

Also, the Edwards rule does not apply unless the defendant is in custody. The Edwards rule also does not apply to a request of officers for routine booking information. However, in Allen v. State, the defendant was given Miranda warnings and stated "I'll talk to you after I've talked to my lawyer." The Georgia Supreme Court held that the defendant's initial invocation of his right to counsel could not have been clearer.

In Mobley v. State, the evidence showed that in less than 12 hours the defendant was questioned on three separate occasions. At the first questioning, he was given Miranda rights and refused to submit to questioning. Later the same day he was again approached by officers, advised of his Miranda rights, and questioned. He made an incriminating statement and said he wanted to talk with the sheriff. That evening he was approached by the sheriff and advised of his Miranda rights; he made an incriminating statement. The trial judge held that the statement made to the sheriff was freely and voluntarily made and therefore admissible. The Georgia Court of Appeals reversed based on Edwards. The court reasoned that the second interrogation was initiated by officers after the defendant asked for counsel and refused to talk. The court then said that in view of the totality of the circumstances, the third interrogation resulted from the unlawful second interrogation.

However, in White v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals found no Edwards violation where, without making any statement, the defendant said he wanted counsel. Later, not knowing that the defendant had elected to remain silent, officers on an elevator with the defendant asked him if he did not want to make a statement. The defendant said he did, was given his Miranda rights and then confessed to the robbery.

In Woodard v. State, the Court of Appeals reversed the trial court order denying a motion to suppress statements made by the defendant in response to questions of police investigators after being advised of his Miranda rights and executing a written waiver of them. At the time he made the statements, he was represented by appointed counsel and because he had not initiated the conversations which led to the incriminating statements there was no waiver of his right to counsel.

In Beck v. State, the court pointed out that "the mere completion of an application to obtain appointed counsel, without more, is not sufficient to invoke the Fifth Amendment. . . ."

In Arizona v. Roberson, the defendant was arrested for burglary and given his warnings, at which point he stated that he wanted a lawyer "before answering any questions." Three days later, and as yet without counsel, a different officer Mirandized the defendant, he waived his rights, and implicated himself in another burglary. The United States Supreme Court held that Roberson's statements were inadmissible because the Miranda right to counsel is not offense specific.

In Arizona v. Mauro, the United States Supreme Court held that the defendant had waived his Miranda rights where the defendant stated that he did not want to answer questions without the presence of an attorney, but his wife insisted on talking with the defendant and was permitted to talk with him in the presence of an officer who openly recorded the conversation. The court concluded that the incriminating statements were not the result of interrogation by the officer.

In Krier v. State, where the defendant was arrested in New Orleans, the Georgia Supreme Court concluded that a request for counsel "in the asylum state [does not operate] to prevent any further inquiry by authorities in [Georgia] as to whether the accused would like to speak to them, where [Georgia] authorities reasonably understood that no request for counsel had been made."

In the unusual case of Roberson v. State, the defendants were advised of their Miranda rights after arrest and invoked the right to counsel. The defendants' mother suggested to a television and radio reporter that the reporter interview one of the defendants in jail. Then the other defendant requested an interview. Consequently, the sheriff's office, on request, arranged the interviews. The police escorted the defendants to the interview but did not initiate or participate in the interview. The defendants signed waiver forms stating that they voluntarily agreed to the interviews, realizing they had the right to refuse and reserving the right to terminate the interviews at any time. The court affirmed the convictions finding that there was no violation of their rights to counsel.

The Miranda warnings currently in use by some Georgia officers are set out in section 5-14, supra. The opposite side of the card from which officers read the warnings states certain questions to be asked pertaining to waivers. These "waiver" questions have also been set out in section 5-14, supra. See section 5-13, supra, on the meaning of "interrogation." See section 5-15, supra, on the right to remain silent.

§ 5-21 Confessions and admissions—Miranda v. Arizona—Duty to speak

The application of the tacit admission rule in Georgia, at least in criminal cases, has been questioned for over half a century, although O.C.G.A. § 24–3–36, provides that acquiescence or silence when the circumstances require an answer, denial, or other conduct may amount to an admission. However, in Mallory v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court in a unanimous opinion held that in criminal cases a comment upon a defendant's silence or failure to come forward is "far more prejudicial than probative. Accordingly from the date of publication of the opinion, December 26, 1991, . . . such comment will not be allowed even where the defendant has not received Miranda warnings and where he takes the stand in his own defense." However, "not every reference to a defendant's invocation of the right to remain silent entitles a defendant to a reversal. Instead, the error may be found to be harmless beyond a reasonable doubt. The determination of harmless error must be made on a case by case basis, taking into consideration the facts, the trial context of the error, and the prejudice created thereby as juxtaposed against the strength of the evidence of defendant's guilt."

In Doyle v. Ohio, the United States Supreme Court held that an accused's silence after the giving of the Miranda warnings could not be used as evidence of his guilt. However, in Fletcher v. Weir, the United States Supreme Court stated that where a defendant had not been informed that he had a right to remain silent, there is no due process violation in permitting the defendant to be "cross examined as to his post-arrest silence when the defendant chooses to take the stand."

It must be kept in mind, however, that Miranda applies only where a defendant is in custody. Hence, in Jenkins v. Anderson, the Court held that the silence of a suspect who was not taken into custody for two weeks after a homicide could be constitutionally used for impeachment purposes on cross-examination when the suspect testifies to self-defense at his trial. The court pointed out that its decision does not force a state to allow impeachment by pre-arrest silence, but it shows that impeachment in such a situation does not violate the federal Constitution. But in Georgia non-Mirandized post arrest silence is not admissible.

In Norris v. State, the defendant contended he was coerced into escaping. The appellate court said that it could consider the failure of the defendant to tell an investigator about the coercion in determining whether the evidence was sufficient to justify his conviction.

In DeBerry v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court said that a defendant's Fifth Amendment rights were violated where an officer testified that the defendant made no statements to the police when arrested, but the failure of defense counsel to object waived the right of the defendant to later complain. The same right of silence was recognized where a defendant was given Miranda warnings, answered some questions, and then remained silent when he was asked a particularly incriminating question.

In Gibbs v. State, the prosecuting attorney asked an officer if the defendant provided the officer with any statement after he was in custody. The officer replied, "I advised him of his rights and he refused to give a statement." The court held that "the record shows an error of constitutional dimension." It is "fundamentally unfair to simultaneously afford a suspect a constitutional right to silence at arrest and yet allow the implication of that silence to be used against him. . . ."

In the unusual case of Williams v. State, the defendant pled temporary insanity at the time of the crime. In an effort to show that the defendant was not insane at that time, the state was permitted to show that at the time of defendant's arrest, he was given Miranda warnings and he elected to remain silent. However, in Wainwright v. Greenfield, the United States Supreme Court held that there was a violation of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment where the prosecutor used the defendant's silence, after he had been given Miranda warnings, as evidence of the defendant's sanity.

In Jones v. Dugger, the Eleventh Circuit held that there was no error in permitting an officer to testify to his observations of the mental condition of Jones at the time of questioning even if there had not been a valid Miranda waiver. The officer was not permitted to testify as to what Jones said, but he could testify that Jones seemed to be rational and well-oriented and his answers seemed to be responsive to the questions asked.

Even when there is an improper reference to the defendant's silence and the point has been preserved by proper objection, this does not automatically require reversal. The error may be considered to be harmless beyond a reasonable doubt. The test is whether the evidence of the election to remain silent pointed "directly at the substance of the defendant's defense or otherwise substantially prejudiced the defendant in the eyes of the jury."

See section 5-15, supra, on the right to remain silent and section 5-13, supra, on interrogation. Also, generally, see section 5-11, supra, on Miranda.

§ 5-22 Nontestimonial evidence—Under United States Constitution

In Schmerber v. California, the United States Supreme Court held that the compulsory taking of non-testimonial blood-sample evidence from a defendant does not violate the federal Constitution, although noting that the Fifth Amendment prevents the use of testimonial evidence in the situation where an accused is compelled to speak against himself. Likewise, in South Dakota v. Neville, the same Court held that the admission in evidence of a refusal of a defendant to submit to a blood-alcohol test is not a violation of the Fifth Amendment.

Thus, the federal Constitution does not entitle a defendant to refuse to submit to fingerprinting, photographing, or measurements. He must repeat words for identification, appear in court, assume certain positions, walk, make particular gestures, and furnish handwriting exemplars. If a defendant refuses to give handwriting exemplars, it is proper for the court in its charge, and for the prosecution in summation, to refer to the accused's failure to provide this non-testimonial evidence. However, it has been held that an unarrested suspect cannot be ordered by a court to furnish handwriting exemplars. Generally, a person may be required under the federal Constitution to give voice exemplars and handwriting exemplars to a grand jury. Likewise, it has been held that hair samples may be taken involuntarily from a defendant pursuant to a search warrant.

A defendant can be compelled to allow the removal of a bullet from his body by a physician pursuant to a search warrant if there is no risk involved in the procedure. However, a defendant cannot be compelled to undergo a risky operation to remove a bullet from the spinal cavity. In Winston v. Lee, the United States Supreme Court said, "The reasonableness of surgical intrusions beneath the skin depends on a case-by-case approach, in which the individual's interest in privacy and security are weighed against society's interest in conducting the procedure. . . . Schmerber . . . provides the appropriate framework of analysis for such cases." The court then concluded that the state had failed to demonstrate that surgical removal of the bullet would be reasonable in view of the evidence which the state had and the disputed evidence about the risks of such an operation.

In Andresen v. Maryland, the United States Supreme Court held that a defendant's incriminating business records are non-testimonial and thus admissible. In Doe v. United States, the United States Supreme Court held that there was no Fifth Amendment violation in requiring a depositor to sign a "consent directive" which directs foreign banks to disclose records of the depositor.

On incrimination by lineups, see section 6-4, infra. Also see section 4-26, supra, on searches incident to an arrest and section 4-32, supra, on consent to search. See section 21-3, infra, on voice exemplars as testimony. See section 5-13, supra, on video taping of sobriety tests.

§ 5-23 Nontestimonial evidence—Under Georgia Constitution and Georgia law

Georgia has long asserted that it grants more protection to its citizens than that afforded by the United States Constitution. The Georgia Constitution provides that "[n]o person shall be compelled to give testimony tending in any manner to criminate himself." The word "testimony" has been construed to limit the state from forcing the individual to present evidence, oral or real.

Georgia law regarding non-testimonial evidence has been summarized as follows:

"[N]o man is bound to accuse himself of any crime or to furnish any evidence to convict himself of any crime. . . . The constitutional guaranty protects one from being compelled to furnish evidence against himself, either in the form of oral confessions or incriminating admissions of an involuntary character, or of doing an act against his will which is incriminating in its nature."

The Georgia statute on self-incrimination provides as follows:

"No person, who shall be charged in any criminal proceeding with the commission of any indictable offense or any offense punishable on summary conviction shall be compellable to give evidence for or against himself." (Emphasis added.)

Thus, a defendant cannot be forced to do an affirmative act which would be incriminating such as placing his foot in a footprint near a burglary or placing his hand in his pocket and surrendering a pistol, based on these provisions. Likewise, it is improper for a district attorney during a trial to ask a defendant to stand and raise his shirt so as to reveal identifying scars on his chest, and a district attorney may not compel a defendant to produce handwriting exemplars or voice exemplars. However, it has been held that a high school student's state constitutional rights were not violated where the assistant principal asked the student to empty his pockets in the presence of the assistant principal, and that a law enforcement officer can obtain non-testimonial evidence from a prisoner.

In Robinson v. State, relying on Creamer, the Georgia Court of Appeals held that a defendant's state constitutional rights were not violated where, pursuant to a warrant, samples of blood and urine were taken to determine if he had cocaine in his system.

Also, in Price v. State, the court relied on Creamer in holding valid a search warrant which required a leg hair to be removed from a defendant who was not under arrest at the time. The court again emphasized that there is "a distinction between forcing an accused to do an act, and compelling him to submit to an act." (Emphasis in original.) The court explained that forcing a defendant to give evidence violates the right of the defendant not to incriminate himself, but forcing an accused to submit to the removal of a hair was not a violation of his rights.

In Pinson v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals pointed out "that requiring a blood test for the purpose of proving or disproving paternity" would not compel a defendant to be a witness against himself within the meaning of the Fifth Amendment nor would the procedure compel him to give testimony tending to incriminate himself within the meaning of the Georgia Constitution.

In Strong v. State, testimony regarding the alcoholic content of a blood sample removed from the defendant for the intoxication test while he was unconscious in the hospital was held admissible in the defendant's trial for murder, a crime apparently committed by means of a motor vehicle, after the court concluded that the implied consent laws were inapplicable to a murder case. However in a routine driving under the influence case, the police must inform the driver that he has a choice of a blood, breath or urine test and the right to have an independent test made by someone of his own choosing.

As pointed out in the foregoing section, nothing in the United States Constitution prevents a defendant from being forced to give voice exemplars and in Georgia it has been held that a defendant may also be required to give such exemplars. However, there is older Georgia authority holding that a defendant may not be forced by court order to produce incriminating evidence. Thus, in State v. Armstead, the court held that a defendant cannot be forced to produce a handwriting exemplar to be used against him. However, the Georgia Court of Appeals has held that a defendant can be required to give voice exemplars and to repeat certain words in a lineup. Likewise, in State v. Thornton, the Georgia Supreme Court said, "We decline to extend our Constitution so far as would prohibit reasonable police practices, such as the taking of fingerprints [and] . . . taking . . . dental impressions. . . ."

In the interesting case of Weems v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court held that the Fourth Amendment right of a victim to be secure against an unreasonable search prevented a defendant from compelling a victim to undergo surgery for the removal of a bullet to be used in his defense. Likewise, in Park v. State, the court held that the defendant was not entitled to force the victim to be examined by an expert selected by the defendant.

Unlike the situation under the federal Constitution, in Georgia private papers which are merely tangible evidence of the commission of a crime may not be seized. However, it has been held that if the papers are the instrumentalities of a crime, they may be seized.

See section 6-12, infra, on voice identification. See section 5-22, supra, on compelling non-testimonial evidence under the federal Constitution and section 5-25, infra, on officers requiring an incriminating act. See Note, "The Georgia Right Against Self–Incrimination: Historical Anomaly or Vanguard of Justice?" 15 Georgia Law Review 1104 (1981). See Goger, Daniel's Georgia Handbook on Criminal Evidence (2009 ed.), § 7–29, on use of DNA results like fingerprints.

§ 5-24 Statutes requiring incriminating acts

If a statute requires a defendant to incriminate himself, he cannot be convicted for failing to comply with the terms of the statute. Therefore, a federal law requiring gamblers to pay a wagering tax and to register their names violates the privilege against self-incrimination under the Fifth Amendment. In one case, the United States Supreme Court held that a state statute infringes on the Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination where it provides that if an officer of a political party, subpoenaed by a grand jury to testify concerning the conduct of his office, refuses to testify or to waive immunity against prosecution, he shall lose his office. However, in California v. Byers, a defendant charged with violating the "hit-and-run" law requiring a driver involved in a collision to stop at the scene and give his name and address was held not to suffer substantial risk of self-incrimination if he complied with the law, but rather to face the possibility of civil damages. However, in Chandler v. Miller the United States Supreme Court held unconstitutional a Georgia statute which required candidates running for certain offices to pass a urinalysis drug test before running for office. The court concluded that there was no "special need" for such tests.

In Bd. Of Ed. Of Indep. Sch. Dist. No. 92 of Pottawatomie County v. Earls, the United States Supreme Court approved a school district's policy which required all middle and high school students to consent to drug testing as a condition to participate in extracurricular activities. The Court based its decision on a finding that the policy was a reasonable device for detecting and preventing drug use among students.

Georgia has shown considerable reluctance in finding compelled acts to be so incriminating as to justify a defendant's refusal to act. Thus, in Dennis v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court held a statute valid which required a driver to drive his truck on a weighing scale, even though the law imposed a penalty on the driver for failure to follow such instructions.

In Raines v. White, the appellant Raines was a defendant in an action brought under O.C.G.A. §§ 19–7–40 et seq. to determine paternity. The defendant contended that O.C.G.A. § 19–7–45 was violative of the federal and state Constitutions. The court concluded that the defendant could be required to submit to a blood test as provided for in that section.

In Keenan v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court upheld the validity of O.C.G.A. § 40–6–392(d), holding that it was not error for the trial judge to admit the refusal of a defendant to take a state-administered breath test. In Fantasia v. State, the same court held that the defendant was not compelled by the state to submit to a breath test. "[T]he suspect has a choice which does not infringe upon his right against self-incrimination."

In Garner v. United States, the United States Supreme Court held that a federal income tax return in which the defendant stated he was a professional gambler was admissible against the defendant when he was charged with conspiracy to violate gambling laws. The defendant was said to have made the disclosure instead of claiming the privilege on his tax returns; his disclosures were not regarded as compelled incriminations.

See section 5-22, supra, on compelling non-testimonial evidence under the federal Constitution; section 5-23, supra, on non-testimonial evidence under the Georgia Constitution and law; and section 5-25, infra, on officers requiring incriminating acts.

§ 5-25 Officers requiring incriminating acts

In Chafin v. State, the defendant was required to sign a property receipt card which was kept in the normal course of business by the police department. The card was introduced at trial to allow a comparison of the signature with a signature on a motel registration form. The Georgia Supreme Court concluded that this was not a Miranda violation.

In State v. Armstead, the state filed a motion to compel the accused to produce handwriting exemplars. The Court of Appeals affirmed the trial court's decision to deny the motion, citing Creamer v. State. "[A]lthough evidence may be compulsorily adduced from an accused, it is constitutionally impermissible to compel an accused to perform an act which results in the production of incriminating evidence. . . . The distinction is between forcing an accused to do an act against his will and requiring an accused to submit to an act. While the latter 'takes evidence from the defendant' . . . and is constitutionally acceptable, the former compels the defendant, in essence, to give evidence which violates an individual's right not to incriminate himself." (Emphasis in original.)

The Court of Appeals recognized that the United States Supreme Court, in Gilbert v. California, held "that handwriting exemplars can be compelled," but asserted that the state can grant more (but not less) protection to its citizens than the federal Constitution. The Armstead court cited Creamer: " 'While the language in the United States Constitution has long been construed to be limited to "testimony," the Georgia Constitution has been construed to limit the State from forcing the individual to present evidence, oral or real.' "(Emphasis in original.) However, in a case involving a lineup, the Georgia Supreme Court cited United States v. Wade, and stated "one's voluntary consent to a lineup does not violate his Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination, since the lineup process involves no compulsion of the accused to give evidence of a testimonial nature against himself." Similarly, the Georgia Supreme Court has held that a suspect can be forced to take part in a lineup. In Graham v. State the Georgia Court of Appeals held that the state has a right to demand the presence of the defendant so that he can be identified.

In Tate v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals asserted that "[o]ur appellate courts have held, or recognized, that requiring a suspect in a criminal case to verbalize specified words for identification purposes, whether or not the words used are the same as those allegedly used during the commission of the offense, does not violate an accused's privilege against self-incrimination accorded the accused by the United States' Constitution and the state's statutes and Constitution." No Georgia cases were cited.

The idea that a suspect may be forced to speak certain words seems to be contrary to historic Georgia law which prevents a suspect from being forced to perform any affirmative act which might incriminate him. See section 5-23, supra.

Elder v. State involved testimony of witnesses in a murder trial where evidence was given that the defendant's foot fitted tracks leading from a field near the victim's house. The defendant, while under arrest and handcuffed, was brought by the sheriff and several others to the place where the tracks were being examined. The sheriff commanded the defendant to put his foot in the track. The Georgia Supreme Court held that this evidence should have been excluded, and because it was not, the case was remanded for a new trial. The court found that the defendant did not voluntarily put his foot in the track and stated: "the evidence as to the foot of the accused fitting the track should have been excluded upon objection being made thereto under the provision of the constitution of this State, which declares that 'No person shall be compelled to give testimony tending in any matter to criminate himself' . . . [W]e think in the present case, under the circumstances, there was such a show of force as amounted to the actual use of force and to coercion."

In Rick v. State, the defendant was convicted of possession of a certain drug and attempting to obtain the drug by forgery. A pharmacist who received the alleged forgery had written down the number of the defendant's driver's license. While testifying, the defendant was ordered to produce the license by the district attorney. The defendant's lawyer objected on Fourth Amendment grounds that the defendant's right against self-incrimination was violated. However, the Court of Appeals decided that it was not error for the trial judge to require him to produce his license and to admit the license into evidence. The court also pointed out that admission of the license was not harmful to the defendant because evidence had already been admitted regarding the defendant's license number.

In Mobley v. State, the court pointed out that compelling a defendant to undergo a psychiatric examination to determine his competency to stand trial and his insanity defense does not violate the defendant's privilege against self-incrimination.

See section 5-23, supra, on non-testimonial evidence under the Georgia Constitution and law. See section 5-4, supra, on coercing an employee to give a statement. See Goger, Daniel's Georgia Handbook on Criminal Evidence (2009 ed.), § 7–16 on performing a sobriety test without being warned against self-incrimination.

§ 5-26 Results of illegally obtained evidence

The material in this section is in summary form. The exclusionary rule is treated in far greater depth in section 2-24 et seq., supra.

From the standpoint of the federal exclusionary rule, any admission or confession of the defendant which is obtained in violation of the Miranda requirements is not admissible against the defendant if he makes a proper objection to the introduction of such evidence. Also if a confession or an admission is not freely and voluntarily made, it is not admissible. However, Harris v. New York, holds that if an accused makes a voluntary statement, even in the absence of proper Miranda warnings, it may be used to impeach him where the defendant testifies at trial. However, if the statement was not voluntarily made it may not be used even for purposes of impeachment. In addition, the admission of such a statement may constitute reversible error unless "the jury is expressly instructed that the evidence is admitted for the purpose of impeachment only, whether or not a request to so charge be made, and whether or not any exceptions are made to the charge as given."

Under Georgia law a confession is not admissible unless it was "made voluntarily, without being induced by another by the slightest hope of benefit or remotest fear of injury."

In Griffin v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals held that under Georgia law, there must be a determination of voluntariness, regardless of whether the confession is obtained by an officer or a private person, before a statement is submitted to the jury for its consideration. Additionally, it is better practice for a hearing to be held outside the presence of the jury with both the state and the defendant given the opportunity to present evidence. Where the confession is obtained by a private actor who is not a state public law enforcement officer, there is no requirement that the suspect be provided with Miranda warnings.

In Wilson v. Zant, the Georgia Supreme Court concluded that the exclusionary rule did not apply to the fruits of a voluntary statement obtained in violation of Edwards v. Arizona even though the statement itself is inadmissible at trial. In the case of United States v. Patane, the District Court granted, and the Appellate court affirmed, the defendant's motion to suppress a firearm where the weapon was discovered as a result of the defendant's voluntary statements made without Miranda warnings. However, the United States Supreme Court reversed on the grounds that "[t]he Self-incrimination Clause . . . is not implicated by the admission into evidence of the physical fruit of a voluntary statement." Hence, neither Miranda nor the "fruits-of-the-poisonous-tree" doctrine requires suppression of physical evidence seized as a result of voluntary statements made in the absence of Miranda warnings.

The issue, however, may be different where the defendant's right to counsel has attached. In Vergara v. State, the defendant had requested counsel and sometime thereafter requested to speak with police investigators. The defendant's statements led to the discovery of contraband. The court concluded that based upon the totality of the circumstances, the state failed to show that the defendant had waived his previously invoked right to counsel and the fruits doctrine required the exclusion of the evidence.

Even if there is error on the part of the court in admitting such evidence, a reviewing court may still consider it harmless error and thus refuse to reverse the conviction. Also, a defendant lacks standing to attack a violation of the constitutional rights of a co-defendant who has confessed to a crime and thereby implicated the defendant.

See section 2-27, supra, on the effect of an illegal arrest on identification and section 6-9, infra, on the right to place a suspect in a lineup.

Chapter 6

Pre-Trial Identification

§ 6-1 Scope
§ 6-2 Eyewitness identification—Background
§ 6-3 Overview of some United States Supreme Court cases on eyewitness identification
§ 6-4 Lineups
§ 6-5 Showups
§ 6-6 Picture identification
§ 6-7 Presence of counsel
§ 6-8 Due process standard
§ 6-9 Motions for lineups
§ 6-10 Admissibility of in-court identification testimony at trial
§ 6-11 Hearing on motion to suppress identification testimony
§ 6-12 Voice identification

KeyCite®: Cases and other legal materials listed in KeyCite Scope can be researched through the KeyCite service on Westlaw®. Use KeyCite to check citations for form, parallel references, prior and later history, and comprehensive citator information, including citations to other decisions and secondary materials.

§ 6-1 Scope

In this chapter consideration is given to some methods of identifying a person, normally a defendant. A defendant may be identified in a number of ways, including eyewitness identification, photographic identification, voice identification, handwriting identification, fingerprint and palm print identification, footprint identification, and some other perhaps less commonly used methods of identification. This chapter is concerned only with eyewitness identification, photographic identification, and voice identification. Other methods of identification are treated elsewhere in this book.

§ 6-2 Eyewitness identification—Background

There have been cases in which a defendant was convicted of a crime because of the testimony of an eyewitness who incorrectly identified him as the person committing the crime. In some of these incidents, the evidence has been extremely weak. It has been stated that "erroneous identification of the accused constitutes the major cause of known wrongful convictions." Also, it has been said that the hazard of a mistaken eyewitness identification is particularly pronounced in a situation where the witness is a member of one race and the suspect is a member of another race.

It has been held that the fact that a victim cannot accurately describe the assailant to the police because of darkness and because he was attacked from the rear does not prevent an in-court identification. The Georgia Supreme Court has said that where an eyewitness positively identifies an assailant, this is not opinion evidence and consequently it is not error for the trial court to fail to charge on non-expert opinion evidence. However, Dr. Agnor, in his Georgia Evidence, refers to identification testimony as opinion testimony.

Until the case of United States v. Wade, decided in 1967 and discussed in the next section, it was generally thought that a jury question existed as to the identity of the defendant in all cases in which there was a dispute as to the identity of the perpetrator of a crime. It always has been true that the identity of a defendant as the guilty party may be shown by circumstantial evidence as well as direct evidence, but if the evidence is entirely circumstantial, it may be insufficient to support a conviction.

In Wade, the United States Supreme Court stated that eyewitness identification by the victim or witnesses is peculiarly riddled with dangers which may prevent a fair trial, and a major cause of miscarriages of justice result from mistaken identification. Despite the dangers which exist in eyewitness identifications, such identification is regarded as essential to most criminal cases. Yet, every experienced lawyer who tries criminal cases knows how devastating such eyewitness identification testimony frequently is, even when the witness has had very little opportunity to view the person who committed the crime. Nevertheless, the rule remains that generally, eyewitness testimony is admissible and the jury determines how much weight it should be given. However, there are situations so extreme that some such evidence is not admissible.

Identification testimony in court may conceivably come from three sources: (1) a witness pointing out the defendant in court; (2) asking the eyewitness if he has identified the defendant earlier; and (3) having a third person testify that the witness identified the defendant on an earlier occasion. However, Georgia has placed limitations on the third possibility which are discussed later in this section.

In the first situation there is no per se exclusionary rule. There is no authority for the proposition that an in-court identification is subject to the same safeguards required for a pre-trial identification at a line up or by way of a photographic array. However, if the pre-trial procedures have been such as to undermine the reliability of the eyewitness identification, there may be a due process violation. Thus, if the suggestiveness of the identification amounts to "a very substantial likelihood of irreparable misidentification" based on a totality of the circumstances, then such testimony of pre-trial identification is not admissible.

In the second situation and possibly in the third, where a defendant was identified by a witness or the victim at a pre-trial lineup or showup, there is a per se exclusionary rule which applies to the admission of such pre-trial identification testimony if the defendant had no opportunity to be represented by counsel at the lineup or showup and if the adversary criminal judicial proceeding had already been instituted against the defendant.

Also, in the second and third situations, there may be a less precise due process violation which may apply to such pre-trial identification testimony if (1) the identification procedure was so unduly suggestive (2) that it was conducive to irreparable mistaken identification.

Aside from the constitutional limitation which may require the exclusion of extrajudicial pre-trial identifications which are involved in situations two and three, there are other questions. In the second situation, Georgia and most jurisdictions seem to permit a witness to testify in court about his pre-trial identification of the defendant. In United States v. Owens, the United States Supreme Court held that there was no violation of the Confrontation Clause where there was testimony of an out-of-court identification statement of a witness who was present for trial as a witness and who had since lost his memory of the event so that he was not able to testify as to the basis for the identification. See Goger, Daniel's Georgia Handbook on Criminal Evidence (2009 ed.), § 1–27, on cross-examination. However, a few states will not permit such testimony on hearsay grounds or because it is regarded as unduly bolstering the in-court identification.

In the 2001 case of White v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court held that "[i]n the absence of some other viable hearsay exception, such as 'necessity' or 'res gestae,' a law enforcement officer may not testify to a pre-trial identification of the accused unless the person who actually made the identification testifies at trial and is subject to cross-examination." In Abrams v. State, the court affirmed the trial court in permitting an investigator to testify that the victim and an eyewitness identified the defendant, and over objection, the investigator testified that the victim told him the defendant "was the right size and the clothing was right." The court also pointed out that the victim and the eyewitness both testified and were available for cross-examination. See an excellent annotation, "Admissibility of Evidence as to Extrajudicial or Pretrial Identification of Accused," 71 A. L. R. 2d 449 (1960).

It is within a trial court's discretion whether or not to admit expert testimony regarding eyewitness identification. However, "[w]here eyewitness identification of the defendant is a key element of the State's case and there is no substantial corroboration of that identification by other evidence, trial courts may not exclude expert testimony without carefully weighing whether the evidence would assist the jury in assessing the reliability of eyewitness testimony and whether eyewitness testimony is the only effective way to reveal any weakness in an eyewitness identification." In Brodes v. State, the trial judge excluded expert testimony on the accuracy of eyewitness identification. The Appellate Court reversed, finding that the expert's testimony was "highly relevant" to the case, which involved "cross-racial identifications by victims who were at gunpoint . . . ." Following trial and conviction, Brodes eventually found its way to the Supreme Court of Georgia and there the Court reversed the trial court, which, relying on the pattern charge, instructed the jury that one of the factors it was to consider in reviewing the testimony of the eyewitnesses was the level of certainty in their identification. The Court was persuaded by the empirical research presented that there exists a distinct "lack of correlation between a witness's certainty in his or her identification of someone as the perpetrator of a crime and the accuracy of that identification . . . " The Court went on to "advise" trial courts to refrain from using the level of certainty factor as part of their eyewitness identification charge. However, Brodes in no way is an impediment to a witness testifying about his or her level of certainty of identification. Such testimony would, of course, be subject to challenge by way of "cross examination, expert testimony or the presentation of testimony from other eye witnesses."

The next section discusses in chronological order some United States Supreme Court decisions which have considered problems of eyewitness identification. Then the general aspects of lineups are treated followed by material on showups and photographic identification. Next, consideration is given to the right to counsel at the time of identification and then due process consideration is discussed. After material on motions for lineups there is a discussion on hearings on motions to suppress identification.

See Annotation, "Propriety of Requiring Suspect or Accused to Alter, or Refrain From Altering, Physical or Bodily Appearance," 24 A. L. R. 4th 592 (1983).

§ 6-3 Overview of some United States Supreme Court cases on eyewitness identification

On June 12, 1967, the United States Supreme Court handed down decisions in three landmark cases on eyewitness identification. The first case, in terms of where it is reported, is the case of United States v. Wade.

In Wade, the defendant was indicted for bank robbery some six months after the robbery. He was arrested about a week later. Fifteen days after counsel had been appointed for him, FBI agents, without notice to Wade's attorney, arranged to have two bank employees observe a lineup of Wade and five or six other prisoners. Before the lineup the bank employees observed, through an open door, Wade, who was standing in the hall with an FBI agent. The other five or six prisoners appeared and a lineup was conducted in the courtroom. Each person in the lineup was directed to say something like "put the money in the bag." Both employees identified Wade at the lineup. At trial both employees on direct examination identified Wade. Prior lineup identification was elicited from both employees on cross-examination. At the close of the testimony, defense counsel moved for a judgment of acquittal or alternatively to strike the courtroom identification on the ground that the lineup without notice to, and in the absence of, defense counsel violated the Sixth Amendment right to assistance of counsel and violated the Fifth Amendment. The Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit reversed and ordered a new trial at which the in-court identification evidence was to be excluded because of the Sixth Amendment violation and the court concluded that there had been no Fifth Amendment violation. The Supreme Court pointed out that a defendant is entitled to the presence of counsel "at any stage of the prosecution, formal or informal, in court or out, where counsel's absence might derogate from the accused's right to a fair trial." Identification may take the form of a lineup or showup "as in the present case, or presentation of the suspect alone to the witness . . . risks of suggestion attend either form of confrontation. . . ." "The presence of counsel at such critical confrontations . . . operates to assure that the accused's interests will be protected. . . ." The "presence of counsel itself can often avert prejudice and assure a meaningful confrontation at trial, there can be little doubt that for Wade the . . . lineup was a critical stage of the prosecution. . . ." Both Wade and his counsel should have been notified of the lineup and his counsel's presence should have been required unless this right was waived. Counsel's presence is necessary as an observer "to preserve the defendant's basic right to a fair trial as affected by his right meaningfully to cross-examine the witnesses against him and to have effective assistance of counsel at the trial itself." The court expressly left open the question of whether substitute counsel would suffice if the presence of his counsel would have resulted in prejudicial delay. The "accused's inability effectively to reconstruct at trial any unfairness that occurred at the lineup may deprive him of his only opportunity meaningfully to attack the credibility of the witnesses' courtroom identification."

In summary, the United States Supreme Court said that the court of appeals did not apply the proper test. The court directed the conviction vacated "pending a hearing to determine whether the in-court identifications had an independent source, or whether, in any event, the introduction of the evidence was harmless error . . . and . . . [directed] the District Court to reinstate the conviction or order a new trial, as may be proper." However, the Court pointed out that the Government must be given "the opportunity to establish by clear and convincing evidence that the in-court identifications were based upon observations of the suspect other than [at] the lineup identification." (Emphasis added.) The question to be determined in the trial court was whether the in-court identification was based on the lineup which was without counsel or whether it had an independent source. "Application of this test in the present context requires consideration of various factors; for example, [1] the prior opportunity to observe the alleged criminal act, [2] the existence of any discrepancy between any pre-lineup description and the defendant's actual description, [3] any identification prior to lineup of another person, [4] the identification by picture of the defendant prior to the lineup, [5] failure to identify the defendant on a prior occasion, and [6] the lapse of time between the alleged act and the lineup identification. [7] It is also relevant to consider those facts which despite the absence of counsel, are disclosed concerning the conduct of the lineup."

The second of the three cases to be reported was Gilbert v. California. After counsel had been appointed, a lineup was held in an auditorium after indictment for armed robbery of a savings and loan association. At trial Gilbert moved to strike the testimony of a cashier of the association on the ground that she identified him at the lineup which was conducted in the absence of his counsel. The trial judge denied a hearing at which the defendant sought to show that the witness' trial testimony was based at least in part on the lineup. On cross-examination the witness testified to her identification of the defendant at the lineup. Apparently other prosecution witnesses testified at the sentencing phase of the trial as to other robberies committed by the defendant and their lineup identification of the defendant. The conviction was vacated and the case remanded. The testimony of the witnesses at the sentencing phase of the case was subject to a per se exclusion because the defendant was not represented by counsel at the lineup identification. It was error for the trial judge to permit the in-court identification testimony of the witnesses at the savings and loan association without first determining that their testimony would not be tainted by the lineup. Unless "the California Supreme Court is 'able to declare a belief that it was harmless beyond a reasonable doubt' . . . Gilbert will be entitled on remand to a new trial or, if no prejudicial error is found on the guilt stage but only in the penalty stage, to whatever relief California law affords where the penalty stage must be set aside."

The last of the three cases is Stovall v. Denno. Stovall was arrested in 1961 the day after a doctor was stabbed to death in his kitchen and the doctor's wife also had been stabbed a number of times. The wife was placed in a hospital in critical condition and major surgery was performed on her. Stovall was brought to the wife's hospital room on the day after surgery for purposes of identification without being given an opportunity to obtain counsel. He was handcuffed and was the only black person in the room. After Stovall repeated a few words as directed, he was identified as the assailant. The victim testified at trial to her identification of Stovall in her room and also made an in-court identification of him. The state's conviction was attacked by federal habeas corpus. The Supreme Court concluded that the right to counsel at a lineup as recognized in Wade and Gilbert was to be applied only to identifications after June 12, 1967, the date of the decisions in those cases. However, even though the right to counsel at the time of an identification was not applied, Stovall still had a right to relief in the "event the confrontation . . . was so unnecessarily suggestive and conducive to irreparable mistaken identification that he was denied due process of law. . . . The practice of showing suspects singly to persons for the purpose of identification, and not as part of a lineup, has been widely condemned." However, whether or not due process has been violated depends on a totality of the circumstances surrounding it. Here the showing of Stovall to the victim was imperative. She was the only one who could have exonerated him. She might have died. The hospital was not far from the jail. She could not go to the jail and a lineup was out of the question. Hence, there was found to be no due process violation in the identification.

In Simmons v. United States, a savings and loan association in Chicago was robbed by two men in 1964. Officers located a car matching the one described by an employee of the association. A man named Andrews was a suspect. FBI agents obtained pictures of Andrews and Simmons from Andrews' sister who told agents that Andrews and Simmons were together on the day of the robbery. The agents showed the employees at least six snapshots which consisted mostly of group pictures of Andrews and Simmons. The pictures were exhibited to each employee separately. All of the employees identified Simmons, but none of them identified Andrews. They later reaffirmed their identification from pictures. Simmons claimed that the identification procedure fatally tainted his conviction. The United States Supreme Court pointed out that improper use of pictures may cause witnesses to err in identification and that the danger is increased where several pictures are displayed and the picture of one person recurs. However, despite the hazards, identification by photograph is widely used by officers. The court stated, "[W]e hold that each case must be considered on its own facts, and that convictions based on eyewitness identification at trial following a pretrial identification by photograph will be set aside on that ground only if the photographic identification procedure was so impermissibly suggestive as to give rise to a very substantial likelihood of irreparable misidentification." The court then pointed out that in this case photographic identification had to be resorted to. The perpetrators were still at large. The agents needed to determine if they were on the right tract. There was little likelihood of misidentification of Simmons. All employee witnesses identified Simmons. The bank had been well-lighted. The robbers did not wear masks. Andrews was not identified. Witnesses had no doubt. Hence, the identification procedures did not violate due process.

In Foster v. California, Davis, the night manager of a Western Union office, had been robbed by three men. Clay surrendered and implicated Foster and Grice. Only Davis and the robbers were witnesses to the crime. Davis was called to the police station to view a lineup of three men. Foster was about 6' tall, the other two in the lineup were about 5' 6". Foster wore a leather jacket similar to one worn by one of the robbers. Davis could not identify Foster positively but thought he was the man. Davis asked to talk with Foster and did so alone in a room with him. Davis was still uncertain. Ten days later police arranged another lineup. Foster was the only man in the second lineup who had been in the first. This time Davis was convinced that Foster was the man. At trial Davis testified to his identification of Foster in the lineups as set out above. The only other evidence against Foster was the testimony of Clay, an acknowledged accomplice in the robbery. The identification was made before the decision in Wade. However, the Court pointed out that judged by a totality of the circumstances, the conduct of an identification may be so unnecessarily suggestive and conducive to irreparable mistaken identity as to amount to a denial of due process. The court concluded that the facts of this case amounted to such a due process violation and reversed the conviction. The court concluded that all the identification testimony should have been excluded.

In Kirby v. Illinois, the defendant and a companion were arrested on a Chicago street. When officers reached the police station they learned that the day before a man named Shard had reported that he had been robbed by two men who had taken traveler's checks and his social security card. Kirby had the social security card and three checks. A police car was sent for Shard. When Shard entered the room at the police station he positively identified Kirby and his companion. Six weeks later Kirby and his companion were indicted. Their pre-trial motion to suppress Shard's testimony was denied. At trial Shard described his identification at the police station and made an in-court identification. In a plurality opinion the Supreme Court pointed out that the case did not involve any compulsory self-incrimination and hence the Fifth Amendment did not apply. As to the question of the right to counsel at identifications guaranteed by the Sixth Amendment and the per se exclusionary rule, the Court said that this right applies only after the initiation of judicial criminal proceedings. The right to counsel at identifications applies at any critical stage of a prosecution not merely when a suspect is arrested. In affirming the conviction, the Court pointed out that the due process clause adequately protects a person, who has not been formerly charged, from suggestive identifications and pointed out the interest of society in the prompt investigation of unsolved crimes. The decision does not discuss the suggestiveness of Kirby's identification from a due process standpoint.

In Moore v. Illinois, the defendant was arrested for rape. The victim appeared the next day at a preliminary hearing which was conducted to determine whether or not the defendant was to be bound over to the grand jury. The defendant's name was called and he was lead before the bench. The victim was in the courtroom and also was called by the judge. The prosecuting attorney outlined evidence connecting the defendant with the crime and moved for a continuance of the hearing until fingerprint evidence could be presented. The victim identified the defendant and a continuance was granted. Moore was not represented by counsel at the time. Counsel was appointed for Moore after he had been indicted. Defense counsel moved to suppress the identification of Moore by the victim because he was not represented by counsel. The motion was denied and at trial on direct examination the victim testified that she had identified Moore at the preliminary hearing and that she also had made an in-court identification. The defendant's conviction was affirmed by the Illinois courts and Moore sought a writ of habeas corpus in federal court. The Supreme Court pointed out (1) that the Wade per se exclusionary rule of pre-trial identification testimony applied to an uncounseled identification at a preliminary hearing. The right attaches "at or after the initiation of adversary judicial criminal proceedings—whether by way of formal charge, preliminary hearing, indictment, information, or arraignment." The court also pointed out that (2) counsel's presence can serve both his client's interests and those of the prosecution "by objecting to suggestive features of a procedure before they influence a witness' identification"; (3) the testimony of pre-trial identification elicited by the prosecution in its case-in-chief enhances the witnesses' in-court identification; (4) where testimony is the direct result of an illegal lineup, the prosecution is not entitled to an opportunity to show that the testimony had an independent source; (5) the right to have counsel present at an identification at or after the initiation of adversary criminal proceedings exists whether the identification is at a lineup, a one-on-one identification or a judicial proceeding. The denial of habeas corpus was reversed and the case was remanded for a determination of whether the failure to exclude that evidence was harmless constitutional error.

In Neil v. Biggers, the victim had been raped in 1965. She saw her assailant in the lighted house and then saw him in the moonlight for some 10 or 15 minutes. She gave a description of her assailant to officers. During the next seven months she was shown suspects in lineups and showups and some 30 or 40 photos. She did not identify any of them. The defendant, Biggers, was being held in jail on an unrelated charge and the victim was called to the police station to look at him. Officers said they were unable to get persons looking like Biggers so as to arrange a lineup, so a showup was conducted. At that showup, at the victim's request, Biggers said "shut up or I'll kill you." He was positively identified at that time and later convicted. The Tennessee Supreme Court affirmed and he filed a petition for habeas corpus in federal court asserting a due process violation. The United States Supreme Court concluded that the identification was unnecessarily suggestive but pointed out it "is the likelihood of misidentification which violates a defendant's right to due process . . . [s]uggestive confrontations are disapproved because they increase the likelihood of misidentification . . . the admission of evidence of a showup without more does not violate due process." The "central question [is] whether under the 'totality of the circumstances' the identification was reliable even though the confrontation procedure was suggestive. . . ." The "factors to be considered in evaluating the likelihood of misidentification include [1] the opportunity of the witness to view the criminal at the time of the crime, [2] the witness' degree of attention, [3] the accuracy of the witnesses' prior description of the criminal, [4] the level of certainty demonstrated by the witness at the confrontation, and [5] the length of time between the crime and the confrontation." After reviewing the facts of the case in light of the factors suggested, the Court concluded that there was no substantial likelihood of misidentification and held that the habeas corpus should not be granted.

In United States v. Crews, a woman was robbed by a male while she was in the women's restroom on the grounds of the Washington Monument. She gave officers a full description of her assailant. Several days later Crews was seen in the vicinity of the crime. He matched the earlier description. After an attempt to photograph him failed, he was taken into custody ostensibly as a suspected truant from school and apparently without probable cause. He was detained at police headquarters, briefly questioned, photographed and released. Thereafter the victim identified the photograph of Crews and later identified him at a lineup. He was indicted for the robbery. Defense counsel moved to suppress all identification testimony. The trial judge found that the victim's in-court identification was based upon her independent recollection untainted by the intervening identifications. It was conceded that testimony about the intervening photographic and lineup identifications were suppressible as a result of the Fourth Amendment violation, i.e., the unlawful arrest. The conviction was affirmed by the Supreme Court and the in-court identification was held admissible because there was support for the trial judge's finding that the victim's identification rested on her independent recollection of her initial encounter with the defendant, uninfluenced by the pre-trial identification.

In United States v. Ash, Ash and another were wanted in connection with a bank robbery. Acting on information, an FBI agent showed five black and white mug shots of black males of generally the same age, height and weight to four witnesses. All four made an uncertain identification of Ash. Ash was not in custody at the time and had not been charged. Trial finally was set almost three years after the crime. Shortly before trial, the prosecutor and an FBI agent showed five color photographs to the same witnesses. Three of the witnesses selected the picture of Ash. Ash was identified in court at trial and evidence of the pre-trial photographic identification was admitted. Ash was convicted and sought review. The appeal apparently was presented with the view that the defendant was entitled to a per se exclusion of the testimony relating to the pre-trial photographic identification. The Supreme Court pointed out that a photographic identification is not a trial-like stage and while there are some risks which exist there are also safeguards; and even if these safeguards fail, review is available under the due process standard. Therefore, the Sixth Amendment does not grant a right to counsel at photographic displays for the purpose of identification.

§ 6-4 Lineups

A lineup is distinguished from a showup by the fact that a lineup requires the witness to identify the alleged perpetrator of a crime from among a number of persons while a showup is a one-on-one identification whereby the witness is shown only one person and in effect asked if this is the person who committed the crime.

Lineups must be considered from two standpoints: First, in some situations there is a per se exclusion of the pre-trial identification testimony. Second, the due process standard must be considered. Due process considerations are discussed in section 6-8, infra.

Under the authority of United States v. Wade and Moore v. Illinois, there is a general per se exclusionary rule which applies to a pre-trial identification at or after the initiation of adversary judicial criminal proceedings unless the defendant is represented by counsel who is present at the time of the identification. In Moore, " 'adversary judicial criminal proceedings' were [said to be] initiated when a preliminary hearing was held," but this rule has been held not to apply where the pre-trial identification was at the place scheduled for a preliminary hearing but no evidence was introduced and the case was simply referred to juvenile court. In Victorine v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court continued to rely on a Georgia case decided before Moore and concluded that "there is no right to counsel at a pre-indictment photo lineup." In Phillips v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals pointed out that the Sixth Amendment right to counsel at a lineup is "offense-specific." Thus, "[t]he right does not apply with respect to one offense where adversary proceedings have been commenced with respect to a different offense, but not that offense." In Phillips, the defendant had been indicted for burglary at the time of the lineup, but he had not yet been indicted for the unrelated charge of rape.

Nevertheless, a defendant may waive his right to the presence of counsel at a lineup. In Jenkins v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals held that where defense counsel is notified of a lineup and he simply elects not to attend, this amounts to a waiver of the right to have counsel present. However, an identification in the absence of counsel at such time does not prevent an in-court identification at the time of trial if the in-court identification has an independent origin. Also, it must be remembered that there is no due process right to a pre-trial lineup.

A number of sets of rules or guidelines for lineup identifications have been suggested by and for various groups of law enforcement officers. These suggestions may be helpful to counsel attending a lineup and in connection with the cross-examination of witnesses who have given eyewitness identification testimony.

Some of the most important guidelines or rules which have been suggested are as follows:

(1) All persons in the lineup should be of the same general age and race and have similar characteristics.

(2) Clothing worn by each person should be similar.

(3) Any movements or statements should be made by each person in the lineup, one at a time. It now seems clear that under Georgia law a person in a lineup may be compelled to speak certain words.

(4) A color photograph of the lineup should be taken and developed as soon as possible.

(5) A witness should be prevented from seeing the defendant in custody prior to lineup.

(6) Witnesses should not be shown a photograph of the defendant before the lineup.

(7) If more than one person is to view a lineup, the witnesses should do so one at a time and out of the presence of the other.

(8) No actions should be taken or statements made to a witness to suggest that a suspect is standing in any particular place.

(9) As few persons as possible should be allowed in the room when the lineup is conducted.

(10) The witness, before entering the room where the lineup is to be conducted, should be given a form on which his identification can be marked and signed.

(11) There should be at least six persons in the lineup.

(12) Statements by persons in a lineup should not be requested unless a witness suggests it. If statements are made, all participants should repeat the same words.

(13) If counsel is present, he should be allowed to make suggestions.

(14) Prior to the lineup, the witness should give a detailed description of the perpetrator. This description should be reduced to writing before the lineup.

(15) If possible, law enforcement officers should not be used in lineups.

(16) Some authorities feel that "blank lineups"—lineups which are held in the absence of the suspect—should be utilized. Blank lineups could prevent a witness from picking out the person in the lineup looking most like the accused even if the person is not the perpetrator of the crime.

(17) The names and addresses of all persons participating in the lineup should be preserved.

In Georgia, it has been held that a suspect has no right to refuse to take part in a lineup. Generally, if a person is lawfully incarcerated on an unrelated charge, he may be forced to be a "stand in" in a lineup.

In Foster v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals treated a pre-trial identification in the courtroom as a lineup. The court said that two witnesses to a robbery (who had never identified the defendant during a four-month period between the crime and the trial) were asked by a representative of the district attorney to identify the assailant from a group of defendants seated in the jury box of the courtroom, before the trial started. At the trial defense counsel objected to the identification testimony of one of these witnesses. The court concluded that if defense counsel was not present when the witness (who testified over objection as to the identity of the defendant) identified the defendant in the jury box, the admission of such pre-trial identification, and all of the witnesses' identification testimony, was error unless the trial judge determined that the witness' in-court identification had an origin independent "from her lineup identification, based on the standards set forth in . . . Wade." The court distinguished Foster from Prater v. State where witnesses on their own initiative attended a court proceeding where they expected to see the defendant. The court indicated that Wade condemned state action in providing for identification in the absence of defense counsel. In Robinson v. State, the court found that there was no lineup where a witness on her own initiative attended an arraignment calendar call. The district attorney talked to the witness when she was noticed and asked if she could identify any of the robbers. The witness then pointed out the defendant. The court reasoned that the identification was not orchestrated by the police or the district attorney.

In Ely v. State, the court pointed out that evidence of such a courtroom identification arranged by the district attorney and without the knowledge of the defendant was not admissible under Wade. However, this alone does not prevent the witness, during the trial, from identifying the defendant if the trial identification has an independent origin.

In Wiley v. State, the court upheld the admissibility at trial of an identification at a "lineup" at which only the hands of participants were visible. The victim had previously given a detailed description of her assailant's hands. However, she had been unable to identify him at an earlier conventional lineup, presumably because her assailant was wearing a mask at the time of the crime. Because counsel was present at the lineup, the court properly applied the general two-step due process standard discussed in section 6-8, infra.

The statement of an officer to a witness before a lineup that a suspect had been arrested has been said to be no more suggestive than the lineup itself. However, such statements should be avoided.

In Rivers v. State, the court pointed out that a "lineup was not impermissibly suggestive because . . . [the defendant] was the only person to appear both in the photo array and the physical lineup."

See 29 Am. Jur. 2d, Evidence § 628 (1994) on suggestive lineups. Generally, see "Lineups and Showups: Admissibility and Effect of Pretrial Identification," 19 Am. Jur. Proof of Facts 2d 435; "Unreliability of Eyewitness Identification," 18 Am. Jur. Proof of Facts 2d 361. See also 29 Am. Jur. 2d Evidence § 371.4. See Annotation, "Admissibility of In–Court Identification as Affected by Pretrial Encounter That Was Not Result of Action by Police, Prosecutors and the Like," 86 A. L. R. 5th 463 (2001).

§ 6-5 Showups

As previously mentioned, a showup occurs when a witness views a single individual for purposes of identification. This means of identification is inherently suggestive and has been widely condemned when used by law enforcement officers.

Nonetheless, as the court observed in Horne v. State, "the identification need not be excluded as long as the identification was reliable notwithstanding any suggestive procedure under all the circumstances. The factors to be considered in evaluating the likelihood of misidentification include the opportunity of the witness to view the criminal at the time of the crime, the witness' degree of attention, the accuracy of the witness' prior description of the criminal, the level of certainty demonstrated by the witness at the confrontation, and the length of time between the crime and the confrontation." (Citations omitted.)

However, courts have generally upheld admission of in-court identification when the prior one-on-one showups were reasonably and fairly conducted at or near the time of the offense. Such early identification is needed (1) to guide officers in determining whether or not to look further for the perpetrator; (2) because the accuracy and reliability of identification is likely to be greater at that time; and (3) to permit the speedy release of an innocent person who is in custody. For these reasons, delays in identification of as much as two or three hours have not been condemned. However, an identification after a delay of as much as four or five hours has been held to be too suggestive.

In M. A. K. v. State, a juvenile was arrested and carried to the victim of a burglary to see if he were the burglar. The victim identified the juvenile. The Georgia statute, the material parts of which are set out in section 5-8, supra, provides that a "person taking a child into custody, with all reasonable speed and without first taking the child elsewhere, shall . . . [take] the child immediately before the juvenile court or promptly contact a juvenile court intake officer." The juvenile contended that this statute had been violated by taking him to the victim of the burglary for identification. The court held that the statute was directory and did not limit the authority of the officer to take the juvenile for identification.

After the exigencies connected with an identification shortly after an arrest have dissipated, there is a right to the presence of counsel at such identification at or after the initiation of the adversary criminal judicial proceeding. See section 6-4, supra. If this right to counsel is violated at such an identification there is a per se rule which prevents the admission of such pre-trial identification at the trial. However, this alone does not prevent an in-court identification at the time of trial.

If the showup or lineup takes place before the initiation of the adversary criminal judicial proceeding, but after the dissipation of the exigencies connected with the arrest, it seems that in-court testimony of the pre-trial identification will be excluded only if the pre-trial identification amounts to a due process violation, i.e., if it was so suggestive as to result in misidentification. However, here again, the tainted pre-trial identification does not automatically prevent a later in-court identification of the defendant at the time of trial.

An "accidental" identification of a defendant by a witness even after the initiation of the adversary criminal judicial proceeding will not automatically prevent in-court testimony of the pre-trial identification. Thus, in Herron v. State, the victim and her brother had been at the police station to view some pictures. The victim could not positively identify her assailant from the pictures but two of the pictures reminded her of her assailant. The defendant was then released and he left at the same time as the victim. The evidence was that the victim by chance saw the defendant. The victim then stated that the defendant was her assailant. The trial judge was affirmed in refusing to strike the one-on-one showup identification testimony because there was no showing that the confrontation was staged. The court concluded that the confrontation had not been arranged and thus there was no due process violation. There was said not to be a "very substantial likelihood of irreparable misidentification" and the pre-trial identification was not impermissibly suggestive. Hence, testimony of the pre-trial identification was admissible.

See section 6-8, infra, on due process and identification. See Annotation, "Admissibility of Evidence of Showup Identification as Affected by Allegedly Suggestive Showup Procedures," 39 A. L. R. 3d 791 (1971).

See 29 Am. Jur. 2d, Evidence § 629 (1994). Generally, see "Lineups and Showups: Admissibility and Effect of Pretrial Identification," 19 Am. Jur. Proof of Facts 2d 435; "Unreliability of Eyewitness Identification," 18 Am. Jur. Proof of Facts 2d 361.

§ 6-6 Picture identification

Much of what has been said about lineup and showup identification applies to an identification based on pictures, in that reliability is the linchpin of any identification procedure. However, there is one very important difference. Whereas there is generally a per se right to the exclusion of a pre-trial identification at a lineup or showup, at or after the initiation of the adversary judicial criminal proceeding if counsel is not present, no such automatic exclusion applies to testimony regarding a photographic identification.

In United States v. Ash, the United States Supreme Court concluded that the dangers of mistaken identification are not sufficient to require a per se exclusionary rule of testimony of a photographic identification. However, the admissibility of such testimony is still limited by the due process clause. In Branch v. Estelle, the Fifth Circuit pointed out that the distinction between a review of a corporal lineup and a photographic lineup is the fact that a photographic lineup can be reconstructed for purposes of trial and appellate court review. However, the court said that in a situation where officers fail to preserve the photographic array, there is a presumption that the array is impermissibly suggestive. Nevertheless, in Daniel v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals held that the failure to preserve the photos used in a pre-trial lineup "merely goes to the weight to be afforded the pictorial lineup and not to its admissibility."

In Brewer v. State, the court affirmed the admission of a photograph of the defendant even though the photograph on the back contained the signature of the victim which had been placed there at the time she identified the photograph.

In Huggins v. State, the court held that testimony of a picture identification was admissible even though the pictures used had been lost ("the absence of the pictures at the time of trial . . . goes to the weight").

In the 2001 case of White v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court held that "[i]n the absence of some other viable hearsay exception, such as 'necessity' or 'res gestae,' a law enforcement officer may not testify to a pre-trial identification of the accused unless the person who actually made the identification testifies at trial and is subject to cross-examination."

The display of a single picture is regarded as being too suggestive. Hence, where there is such an impermissibly suggestive identification, it must be determined whether under a totality of the circumstances the display of a single photograph was conducive to irreparable mistaken identification. Even though the display of a single photograph is impermissibly suggestive, still this does not prevent an in-court identification if the in-court identification has an independent source.

If there are a number of pictures and the picture of one person appears more than once, or if an officer tells a witness that he has other evidence that one of the persons pictured committed the crime, the chance of misidentification increases. It has been held that the fact that the picture of the defendant was eight years old does not make the array impermissible.

Ideally the pictures presented should be of the same kind, size and appearance. In Wright v. State, the court held the photographic identification was not impermissibly suggestive where six photographs of black males who appeared to be about the same age as the defendant with similar medium complexion, hair, and no facial hair were presented to the victim. However, in Cheeves v. State, there was some indication that the backgrounds of some of the photographs were different, two of the photographs were slightly smaller than the others, and some of the persons pictured had on hats while others did not. The Georgia Court of Appeals affirmed the trial judge's action in overruling the defendant's request to exclude the eyewitness identification. Although the case was recently overruled, in Heard v. State, the court affirmed the trial judge's finding that the photo array was not impermissibly suggestive where the defendant's picture had a different colored background and his face may have been larger than the faces in the other photos. Likewise, in Brewer v. State, the court held that "[t]he contention that the shading and tone of defendant's photograph made . . . [the] identification procedure unduly suggestive is without merit." In Padilla v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court affirmed the trial court in the pre-trial identification of the defendant "even though he was the only mixed-race male in the photographs." In Hendry v. State, the court concluded that the fact that "the individuals in the photographs had on the same clothing as the individuals the witness saw in the show-up is not in and of itself impermissively [sic] suggestive." In Jackson v. State, the court held that a photographic lineup was not rendered impermissibly suggestive merely because the defendant's co-indictee was pictured in one of the six pictures displayed.

Nevertheless, in Passman v. Blackburn, a photographic identification was found to be impermissibly suggestive where officers used a single, colored photograph of a front view of the defendant and the remaining 11 pictures were black-and-white mug shots with front and side views. Also, the court pointed out that four of the black-and-white pictures were significantly smaller. Nevertheless, in Graham v. State, the court held, "The variance in size and texture in the pictures used does not render the procedure impermissibly suggestive." In Colston v. State, the court held that a photographic lineup was not impermissibly suggestive "because of the different backgrounds of the pictures, different sizes of the photographs and the fact that defendant's photograph was the second largest."

In the Tenth Circuit case of United States v. Sanchez, the court pointed out that "[t]he larger the number of pictures used in an array, the less likely it is that a minor difference, such as background color or texture, will have a prejudicial effect on selection. . . . Conversely, when a relatively low number of photographs are used . . . , minor differences such as background color can make a picture stand out, and can act to repeatedly draw a witness's eyes to that picture."

In asking a witness to view a photographic array, an officer should not tell the witness that the suspect has been arrested. However, a pre-trial photographic identification is not rendered impermissibly suggestive by an officer's telling the victim that there is a suspect in the seven pictures displayed.

It has been said pictures should be displayed to only one eyewitness at a time, and if there are other eyewitnesses they should not be present when the identification is being attempted. However, in a case where two photo spreads are used and only the defendant's picture appeared in both, the court concluded that the identification was not impermissibly defective.

Suggestions made by officers may cause a due process violation at the time of a photographic identification. The witness should not be informed that the defendant's picture is in the array, and no picture should be pointed out to a witness. In Cridiso v. State, the court said that "it may not be good practice for a police officer to indicate to a witness that he has chosen the 'right guy.' "However, the test for admissibility at trial following a tainted pre-trial identification (either photographic or physical) is "whether the in-court identification had an independent origin."

Georgia has recognized that a composite drawing of a suspect made up of data supplied by witnesses may be shown to a witness for purposes of identification. However, the inability of a victim to verbally convey the picture of the assailant to an artist has been held not to prevent a photo or physical identification. In Williams v. State, the court held that a composite drawing was not objectionable as hearsay where the police artist did not testify at trial. See Annotation, "Admissibility in Evidence of Composite Picture or Sketch Produced by Police to Identify Offender," 42 A. L. R. 3d 1217 (1972). Also, in Georgia it has been held that a defendant may be identified by permitting a witness to look through "mug" books.

Some psychologists believe that in an array of photographs, if one picture is not in line with the others, that is if it is "crooked" in the array, it is more likely to be picked out. Likewise, some have concluded that a picture of a person with a different expression from the persons in the other pictures or different clothing from the others is more likely to be selected.

In Lynch v. State, the defendant contended that the victim's in-court identification was tainted by a photographic lineup of eight photographs and that the array was misleading because the pictures (from chest up) showed the heights of the suspects. However, there was no testimony that the identification was based on any height information. The court concluded that in view of the totality of the circumstances, it was not error to admit the in-court identification testimony.

In the unusual case of Gravitt v. State, a picture was shown to the victim about two weeks before the victim was robbed and he was told that the defendant might rob him. Three days after the robbery the victim identified the defendant in a lineup. At trial the victim testified that his lineup identification had not been influenced by the picture. The court concluded that there was no substantial likelihood of misidentification and no due process violation in admitting the in-court identification.

In Baier v. State, an officer displayed three black and white photographs to the witness. Two of the pictures depicted the accused, including one with a mustache added. The witness tentatively identified the accused, pointing out that the mustache was incorrectly drawn. Later the witness saw him in a showup at jail and "recognized him." In reversing the conviction, the court concluded that there had been "an impermissibly suggestive photographic confrontation, followed by a suggestive in person confrontation at a critical stage of the proceedings conducted without counsel . . . making it impossible to determine that the courtroom identification is untainted. . . ." However, in Futch v. State the court stated that "[c]onvictions based on eyewitness identification at trial following a pretrial identification by photograph will be set aside only if the photographic identification procedure was so impermissibly suggestive as to give rise to a very substantial likelihood of irreparable misidentification. . . . Moreover, '(e)ven if a pretrial identification is tainted, an in-court identification is not constitutionally inadmissible if it does not depend upon the prior identification but has an independent origin.' "

It has been pointed out that a photographic array is a less reliable means of identification than a corporal lineup and that the use of such a less reliable identification is a factor which may be used in determining whether an identification was reliable. However, even though "a corporal lineup is the most reliable identification procedure and for that reason the most preferable, . . . a defendant has no constitutional right to a lineup."

In Boscaino v. State, the victim positively identified the defendant at a photographic lineup conducted three days after the incident. However, he could not positively identify the defendant in court. The court held that the failure to positively identify the defendant in court did not invalidate his earlier positive identification.

On the other hand, it was held in Banks v. State that "[t]he victims' failure to identify . . . [the defendant] from the photographic lineup does not require the conclusion that their in-court identification was based solely on the" viewing of the defendant in the courtroom at the time of trial.

Generally, see Annotations, "Admissibility of Evidence of Photographic Identification as Affected by Allegedly Suggestive Identification Procedures," 39 A. L. R. 3d 1000 (1971); "Lineups and Showups: Admissibility and Effect of Pretrial Identification," 19 Am. Jur. Proof of Facts 2d 435, 446; "Unreliability of Eyewitness Identification," 18 Am. Jur. Proof of Facts 2d 361. See also 29 Am. Jur. 2d Evidence (1994) § 630. See section 6-9, infra, on an arrest to take a suspect's picture. See Annotation, "Admissibility in Evidence of Composite Picture or Sketch Produced by Police to Identify Offender," 23 A. L. R. 5th 672 (1994), and Goger, Daniel's Georgia Handbook on Criminal Evidence (2009 ed.), § 7–8.

§ 6-7 Presence of counsel

As previously mentioned, defense counsel has a right to be present when his client is present at any kind of identification at or after the initiation of the adversary criminal proceeding. Conversely, there is no right to counsel at an identification before the initiation of the adversary criminal proceeding. Also, like most other rights, the presence of counsel may be waived. Nevertheless, the giving of the Miranda warning alone has been held not to constitute a waiver of the right to have counsel present at a lineup. Also, it may be possible to utilize substitute counsel if the defendant's counsel cannot be present or there would be a prejudicial delay in waiting for the defendant's counsel.

After the time at which the defendant constitutionally is entitled to counsel, when he is present for identification, the failure to have counsel present results in a per se exclusion of testimony of the pre-trial identification at least in the absence of an accidental or unanticipated identification or perhaps when the identification can be justified by exigent circumstances. If the defendant's right to counsel is violated, testimony of the pre-trial identification is inadmissible regardless of whether there was an independent source of the witness' identification at the confrontation.

However, the fact that there has been a pre-trial identification of a defendant in violation of his right to counsel does not necessarily mean that the in-court identification testimony of the witness is to be excluded. If the witness' in-court identification was independent of any tainted pre-trial identification, the in-court identification testimony is admissible.

As previously pointed out, however, the defendant is not entitled to be represented by counsel at a photographic identification regardless of when it takes place.

What is counsel's role at an identification? Clearly it is envisioned that counsel is present as a witness and so that he may better cross-examine the identifying witness or witnesses at trial. The idea of having defense counsel act as a witness at a critical stage of the proceeding may place the attorney in an unusual position. If there is a disagreement about what took place or the arrangement of the lineup, he may have to withdraw from the case in order to testify. However, in Moore v. Illinois, a more active role was suggested by the United States Supreme Court. The court said that defense counsel may object to suggestive features before they influence a witness' identification.

There is some older authority indicating that defense counsel can do nothing but observe and that he cannot prevent an unfair lineup nor make suggestions which must be followed. In addition, officers have authority to eject argumentative defense counsel from the lineup room if his efforts impede the efforts of officers to conduct the proceeding effectively. With the possible exception of the situation involving disruption of the proceeding, the validity of these views is at least open to question since Moore. However, if counsel does have a right to object or make suggestions, his failure to do so may amount to a waiver.

Generally, see "Lineups and Showups: Admissibility and Effect of Pretrial Identification," 19 Am. Jur. Proof of Facts 2d 435 and 22A C. J. S. § 616.

§ 6-8 Due process standard

The due process requirement applies to all testimony involving pre-trial identifications, at least in the absence of a waiver. These requirements apply to all lineups, showups, and photographic displays regardless of whether there was a constitutional right to the presence of counsel at the time. Thus, even if the right to counsel was waived by the defendant at the time of a pre-trial identification, it may still be possible for defense counsel to exclude testimony of the identification if the confrontation violated due process. The due process standard is the only standard which applies to a photographic pre-trial identification and it is the standard which applies to accidental confrontations and confrontations produced by exigent circumstances. Of course, it was the only standard which applied to pre-trial identifications before June 12, 1967.

The due process standard applies to two different kinds of identification testimony. First, it applies to the admissibility at trial of a pre-trial identification. Second, the due process standard applies to the question of whether or not the witness will be permitted to identify the defendant in court at the time of trial.

"It is error to allow testimony concerning a pre-trial identification of the defendant if the identification procedure was impermissibly suggestive and, under the totality of the circumstances, the suggestiveness gave rise to a substantial likelihood of misidentification." "A court need not consider whether there was a substantial likelihood of misidentification if it determines that the identification procedure was not impermissibly suggestive." "An identification procedure is impermissibly suggestive when it leads the witness to an 'all but inevitable identification' of the defendant as the perpetrator . . . or as was held in Heyward v. State,[] is the equivalent of the authorities telling the witness, 'This is our suspect.' "

In cases where there is a question of a due process violation in a pre-trial identification, testimony of the pre-trial identification is to be excluded if the violation was so suggestive as to result in misidentification. If the pre-trial identification "was so unnecessarily suggestive and conducive to mistaken identification" as judged by a totality of the circumstances surrounding it, the defendant is said to have been denied due process of law and testimony of the pre-trial identification should be excluded.

However, in the 2000 Georgia Supreme Court case of Jones v. State, the court held that "[w]hen a trial court concludes that an identification procedure is impermissibly suggestive, the issue becomes whether there was a substantial likelihood of irreparable misidentification. If not, then both the pre-trial and in-court identifications are admissible."

Insofar as admission of in-court identification where there is a question of whether or not due process has been violated, a two-step analysis now is used. First, the threshold inquiry is whether the identification procedure used was impermissibly suggestive, and only if it was, is the second question reached. Second, was there a substantial likelihood of irreparable misidentification? These questions are to be answered in the light of a totality of the circumstances surrounding the identification. Insofar as the question of likelihood of irreparable misidentification is concerned, it comes down "to the central question whether under the 'totality of the circumstances' the identification was reliable even though the confrontation was suggestive." In Neil v. Biggers, the United States Supreme Court said that the "factors to be considered in evaluating the likelihood of misidentification include [1] the opportunity of the witness to view the criminal at the time of the crime, [2] the witness' degree of attention, [3] the accuracy of the witness' prior description of the criminal, [4] the level of certainty demonstrated by the witness at the confrontation, and [5] the length of time between the crime and the confrontation." In Semple v. State, the court held that Biggers "deals with the suggestiveness of an identification procedure used by police, and applies only to state action."

However, in Davis v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals recognized that even in a situation as "inherently suggestive" as a one-on-one showup, "any psychological effect a one-on-one showup may have on a potential witness is greatly diminished when that witness is a law enforcement officer who, through experience, training or both, has learned certain witness identification techniques and procedures."

A discrepancy between a pre-lineup description and the actual description, the identification of another person before a lineup, the failure to identify the defendant on an earlier occasion, the identification of the defendant by picture, and the lapse of time between the crime and the lineup are all significant factors to consider. However, in Price v. State, the court held that an identification is not "inherently unreliable" because of inconsistencies in the description given by the witness where the witness is available for cross-examination.

Where an identification is made, it is improper for an officer to tell the witness that he has chosen the right person.

In Swicegood v. Alabama, the court, on the basis of a due process violation in the identification of the defendant, pointed out that (1) the defendant, who was 35 years of age at the time, was 9 to 15 years older than the other participants in the lineup; (2) the two witnesses had an unsupervised opportunity to discuss the lineup between the first viewing when neither identified the defendant and the second viewing when they both positively identified the defendant; (3) one witness was allowed to view those in the lineup without masks although he had never seen the robber without a mask; (4) one witness had given only a very general description, and neither witness was asked to give a more precise description prior to the lineup; (5) neither witness had a good opportunity during the offense to see or hear the robber (one was locked in a closet the entire time and the other wore a blindfold covering her eyes for all except about two seconds, and her ears were covered for at least part of the time); (6) the lineup was held nearly three weeks after the robbery; (7) the in-court certainty may have been tainted by the remark of a police officer to the effect that the witnesses had identified the "right man"; and (8) even though the defendant generally fit the description of the witnesses, so did the others in the lineup. The court concluded that the lineup raised due process considerations sufficient enough to require an examination of the reliability of the identification. The court then examined each of the five factors set out in Biggers in light of the evidence in the present case and concluded by saying, "We cannot say that the likelihood of misidentification was slight or that the suggestiveness of the lineup was an uncorrupting influence. . . . [U]nder all the circumstances of this case, the suggestiveness of the lineup and the unreliability of the identifications coalesce to produce a due process violation."

In Clark v. State, the court held that a lineup was not impermissible because the defendant was the only person to appear in both an earlier pictorial identification and the lineup.

In Hodnett v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court pointed out that a lineup would not be flawed simply by an officer's telling a defendant to take a certain position in the lineup.

Lastly, the failure to hold any kind of pre-trial identification is not a due process violation of a defendant.

See section 6-5, supra, on showups.

Generally, see "Lineups and Showups: Admissibility and Effect of Pretrial Identification," 19 Am. Jur. Proof of Facts 2d 435 and "Unreliability of Eyewitness Identification," 18 Am. Jur. Proof of Facts 2d 361.

§ 6-9 Motions for lineups

In Georgia it has been said that a defendant has no right to refuse to participate in a lineup, at least if it is properly arranged and conducted. Even if he is on bond, it seems he may be required to appear for a lineup. Georgia courts do not seem to have considered expressly a situation in which law enforcement officers desire to have a suspect placed in a lineup even though they do not have sufficient probable cause to justify an arrest of the suspect. Most courts seem to hold that a suspect may not be forced to appear in a lineup unless there is probable cause to arrest the suspect. However, a person lawfully held in custody for one offense has been held not to have a right to complain when he is used as a "filler" in a lineup in connection with an unrelated offense. It has been held that when there is probable cause, pursuant to a warrant, there may be an arrest of a suspect for purposes of fingerprinting and photography. However, it seems that a grand jury at least may do so. Also, it should be remembered that if officers think they have probable cause for a valid arrest and they do not, this does not mean that in-court identification is automatically suppressible even if a picture made as a result of the illegal arrest was used as a means of a pre-trial identification.

Likewise, Georgia does not seem to have expressly passed on the question of whether or not a defendant on his own motion is entitled to a pre-trial lineup. Courts in other jurisdictions have differed on this question, some holding that a defendant under some circumstances is entitled to a pre-trial lineup and some holding that a defendant is not entitled to such a lineup.

§ 6-10 Admissibility of in-court identification testimony at trial

In sections 6-4 through 6-9, supra, the emphasis was on whether testimony of a pre-trial identification is admissible at trial. The thrust of this section is to determine when the pre-trial taint is so severe or the witness' view of the defendant so fleeting that a witness should be prevented from testifying at trial that "the defendant is the man I saw commit the crime." Some of the cases previously discussed in this chapter have considered this problem.

If a pre-trial identification arranged by officers violates the right to counsel or if there is a due process violation, such as was discussed above, then on motion it is the duty of the trial judge to determine whether the witness has an independent recollection of the appearance of the defendant which is based on having seen him at the time of the crime and which is independent of the tainted pre-trial identification. If the witness can testify independently of the pre-trial identification, the witness' in-court identification testimony is admissible. If the witness cannot testify in-court as to the defendant's identity independently of the tainted pre-trial identification, his in-court identification testimony should be excluded. In Paxton v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals pointed out that an independent origin of an in-court identification may be shown by the fact that "the victim was able to give a precise and accurate description of his assailant before he viewed the photographic lineup."

If there is a tainted pre-trial identification and the state wishes to show that the witness should be permitted to identify the defendant in-court, the burden is on the state "to establish by clear and convincing evidence that the in-court identification . . . [would be] based upon the observations of the suspect" at some time other than at the tainted identification.

In Tiller v. State, the court pointed out that "even where a pretrial identification has been found to be tainted, a subsequent in-court identification is admissible if it does not depend on the prior, tainted identification but has some other independent basis."

In Smith v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals considered whether a pre-trial photographic lineup was so impermissibly suggestive as to give rise to a substantial likelihood of irreparable misidentification. In determining whether the in-court identification was tainted, the court considered each of the five criteria set out in Neil v. Biggers, viz., (1) the opportunity of the witness to view the perpetrator at the time of the crime; (2) the witness' degree of attention; (3) the accuracy of the witness' prior description of the criminal; (4) the level of certainty demonstrated by the witness; and (5) the length of the time between the crime and the confrontation. The court then concluded that there was no substantial likelihood of misidentification at either the pre-trial or in-court identification.

It has been pointed out that reliability is to be determined from a totality of the circumstances. Thus, it has been held that an "in-court identification based upon the scene of the crime was not impermissibly tainted solely because the appellant sat at the defendant's table and was the only black male in the courtroom." Likewise, an in-court identification is not inadmissible solely because the victim was unable to identify the defendant at a lineup shortly after the crime or failed to identify the defendant at a photo lineup. In Buckner v. State, the court held that "uncertainty expressed by the victim regarding his in-court identification of [the defendant] was merely a factor to be considered by the jury in determining the weight of this testimony."

In Brodes v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court reversed the trial court, which, relying on the pattern charge, instructed the jury that one of the factors it was to consider in reviewing the testimony of the eyewitnesses was the level of certainty in their identification. The Court was persuaded by the empirical research presented that there exists a distinct "lack of correlation between a witness's certainty in his or her identification of someone as the perpetrator of a crime and the accuracy of that identification . . ." The Court went on to "advise" trial courts to refrain from using the level of certainty factor as part of their eyewitness identification charge. However, Brodes in no way is an impediment to a witness testifying about his or her level of certainty of identification. Such testimony would, of course, be subject to challenge by way of "cross examination, expert testimony or the presentation of testimony from other eye witnesses."

In Clay v. State, the court held that when the jury has been adequately charged on the presumption of innocence, reasonable doubt, burden of proof, credibility of witnesses and impeachment, there is no error should the court fail, sua sponte, to charge the jury on identification even if it constitutes the sole defense.

It should be pointed out that the United States Supreme Court held in United States v. Crews that where a defendant was illegally arrested and photographed and identified by the victim of the robbery by the picture and later in a pre-trial lineup, the victim was not prevented from identifying the defendant in court at the time of the trial where the trial judge found that her in-court identification was based on her original encounter with the defendant. However, it was conceded that her testimony as to the photographic identification and the lineup was suppressible as a result of the Fourth Amendment violation.

It must be emphasized that the failure of defense counsel to object to an in-court identification generally prevents a later attack based on an allegedly tainted prior identification. On the other hand, a pre-trial lineup or display of a photograph or photographs to a witness is not a prerequisite to an in-court identification.

It is within a trial court's discretion whether or not to admit expert testimony regarding eyewitness identification. However, "[w]here eyewitness identification of the defendant is a key element of the State's case and there is no substantial corroboration of that identification by other evidence, trial courts may not exclude expert testimony without carefully weighing whether the evidence would assist the jury in assessing the reliability of eyewitness testimony and whether eyewitness testimony is the only effective way to reveal any weakness in an eyewitness identification."

See 21A Am. Jur. 2d Criminal Law § 803. See Goger, Daniel's Georgia Handbook on Criminal Evidence (2009 ed.), § 7–8, on expert testimony relating to accuracy of eyewitness identification.

§ 6-11 Hearing on motion to suppress identification testimony

An objection to the admissibility of in-court identification may be raised at trial. Also, where there is a tainted pre-trial identification, most jurisdictions recognize the right of a defendant to file a pre-trial motion to suppress the in-court identification and to have an evidentiary hearing on the question raised.

In Kemp v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals strongly indicated that the point should be raised before the trial starts and that a defendant may waive his right to an evidentiary hearing by not making a timely motion for such a hearing.

Regardless of how the point is raised, any such hearing should be conducted outside the presence of the jury. In Watkins v. Sowders, the United States Supreme Court concluded that while the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment does not always require a hearing outside the presence of the jury, the "prudence of such a hearing has been emphasized by many decisions. . . . A judicial determination outside the presence of the jury of the admissibility of identification evidence may often be advisable. In some circumstances . . . such a determination may be constitutionally necessary. But it does not follow that the constitution requires a per se rule compelling such a procedure in every case."

In a motion to suppress identification testimony, the judge is the trier of fact and he is to determine credibility, weight, and conflicts in the evidence. It has been said that if there is evidence to support the ruling of the trial judge, the ruling will not be disturbed.

In Moore v. State, the court held that a trial judge may deny, without a hearing, a pre-trial motion to suppress identification testimony. The Georgia Court of Appeals held in Davis v. State that in reviewing the denial of a motion to suppress identification testimony, the appellate court may consider "the evidence adduced both at the suppression hearing and at trial."

See section 14-73, infra, on motions to suppress and motions in limine. For motions to suppress identification, see Goger, Daniel's Georgia Criminal Trial Practice Forms (6th ed.), §§ 6-1, 6-2, 6-3, 20-6, 20-7, 20-8, 20-9, 2-10 and 20-11.

§ 6-12 Voice identification

Much of what has been said about eyewitness identification applies to voice identification. For example, the California Court of Appeals has ruled that a defendant has a right to have his counsel present at a "voice lineup." Under the United States Constitution and under Georgia law, a defendant may be required to give voice exemplars and to repeat any words, including those which the witness said the perpetrator used at the time of the offense, and he may be forced to stand in a lineup. If a law enforcement officer requests individuals to speak over the telephone for purposes of identification and none of them refuse, the identification is admissible even though no Miranda warnings are given. See section 5-23, supra, on compelling a suspect to give non-testimonial evidence in Georgia.

Another difference between the two types of identification concerns their accuracy, particularly where spectrographic identification is used. Whereas eyewitness identification is frequently open to much dispute, voiceprints or spectrographic voice identifications are said to be quite accurate and are gaining acceptance in the scientific community. In fact, a voiceprint has been said to have the same accuracy as fingerprint identification. Some courts, however, have rejected voiceprints as unreliable.

One other distinction should be pointed out. While the general rule regards voice identification as direct testimony, the Georgia rule is that such testimony is opinion evidence and, consequently, is not admissible unless the witness testifies to the basis for his opinion.

In Reese v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals declined to hold that where voice identification is involved, it is necessary to have persons in the lineup with a similar distinctive voice as that of the assailant.

In Jefferson v. State, the victim was approached from the rear, blindfolded, and raped. The assailant spoke to the victim a number of times, and she described his voice. While the defendant was being questioned at the police department on the day of the arrest, the police had the victim listen to the defendant's voice just outside the room where he was being questioned. The victim positively identified the voice of the defendant. The court concluded that the voice identification was admissible under the test of Neil v. Biggers. See section 6-3, supra. The Georgia court held that the factors to be considered in evaluating the likelihood of misidentification include (1) the opportunity to hear the voice at the time of the crime; (2) the degree of attention of the witness; (3) the witness' prior description of the voice; (4) the level of certainty of the witness at the time of confrontation; and (5) the length of time between the crime and the confrontation. The court then concluded that there was no substantial likelihood of irreparable misidentification.

Generally, see Goger, Daniel's Georgia Handbook on Criminal Evidence (2009 ed.), § 6–30, on the defendant as a witness, and § 9–6, on voice identification, and sections 5-22 and 5-23, supra, on non-testimonial evidence. See 1 Wharton's Criminal Evidence, § 189. See also 22A C. J. S. Criminal Law § 616(b)(4).

See 29 Am. Jur. 2d Evidence § 368, on identification by voice. See Annotations, "Admissibility of Evidence of Voice Identification of Defendant as Affected by Alleged Suggestive Voice Lineup Procedures," 55 A. L. R. 5th 423 (1998), and "Cautionary Instructions to Jury as to Reliability of, or Factors to Be Considered in Evaluating, Voice Identification Testimony," 17 A. L. R. 5th 851 (1994).

Part II

CRIMINAL OFFENSES—ELEMENTS OF A CRIME AND LAW ENFORCEMENT LIABILITY*

ARSON

I. Generally

At common law arson was defined as the malicious burning of the dwelling house of another. A crime against property, arson focused on the burning of the dwelling house because of the inherent danger to human life and safety. An intent to burn the dwelling house of another was required, as were fire and an actual burning, however slight. The "dwelling house" included the residence and buildings within the curtilage.

Arson is codified in Article 3 of Chapter 7 of Title 16 entitled "Arson and Explosives," where it is broken into three degrees. First and second degree arson, as defined by §§ 16-7-60 and 16-7-61, protect "structures," while third degree arson, as defined by § 16-7-62, protects personal property.

In 2004, the General Assembly expanded the scope of these statutes to prohibit and punish arsons committed during the commission of felonies.

II. Elements of Offense

Arson has three basic elements: (1) damage by fire or explosion; (2) the intentional act or direction of the defendant knowing that it will damage the protected structure of another; and (3) the lack of that other person's consent.

When an arson is committed during the commission of felony, the prosecution must prove the commission of the underlying felony in addition to the elements of the arson offense.

In 2008, the General Assembly in an effort to consolidate and harmonize the provisions relating to the arson of lands revised and redesignated § 16-7-28 as § 16-7-63.

A. Damage by Fire or Explosive

Unlike the common law, the Georgia statutes include damage by explosives as a basis for arson liability. In the context of criminal damage to property "fire or explosive" has been construed to require some sort of inflammable instrumentality controlled by human hands. That same construction would apparently apply to the arson statutes. Georgia has traditionally followed the common law view that any charring or burning, no matter how slight, constitutes damage within the meaning of the arson statute. The Court of Appeals, however, has broadened the term "damages" in the arson statute to include mere smoke damage, whether or not accompanied by charring or burning.

B. Criminal Intent

Arson is a crime of intention. The defendant must act with the intent to damage a protected structure. There is very little case law on the intent question as a distinct element, however, probably because the act of burning is very powerful evidence of the mens rea.

In an 1874 case, the Georgia Supreme Court held that if a prisoner burns a hole in the door of a guardhouse merely for the purpose of effecting his escape and not with intent to injure or destroy the building, he would not be guilty of arson. Given the present statute's definition of the mens rea as knowingly damaging the property of another, however, this case would probably be reversed if the question were litigated today. The intent to escape would be irrelevant, it could be argued, so long as the defendant knew that his act would damage the property.

The 1979 amendments to the arson statute added arson liability for knowingly directing another to do the acts which cause the prohibited damage.

In Altman v. State the court concluded that only one incendiary act and thus only one crime of arson was committed where the defendants, who carried a grudge against the victim, burned his cabin; the fire destroyed the first cabin and then spread to a second one, adjacent to the first. The court wrote that the act was "directed

---

This information is taken from* Kurtz, Criminal Offenses and Defenses in Georgia, 2010 Edition, by Robert E. Cleary, Jr. (Thomson Reuters 2010). Footnotes in the original volume were deleted to conserve space and reduce cost.*

This Kurtz, Criminal Offenses and Defenses in Georgia, 2010 Edition data can also be accessed in its entirety on Westlaw at the sign-on GACRIMOFDF. The Westlaw sign-on GAHARRISON, Georgia Harrison Analytical Library, contains documents from all available Georgia Harrison Analytical texts published by Thomson Reuters and The Harrison Company.

not against individuals, since none happened to be present, but against the public interest in the protection of life and property in general. Therefore, only one crime was committed." While the Altman result could be defended as a lack of mens rea, it is not clear that the court's reasoning and broad language is appropriate. If the purpose of the arson statute is the protection of the security of a home, it would seem that the intentional burning of 10 homes is deserving of more punishment than the intentional burning of one home. The response, of course, to this approach is to argue that the disparate harms should and can be reflected in the punishment assessed, not in the number of convictions assessed.

In Alexander v. State, the defendant argued that the trial judge erred in denying his motion for directed verdict on the arson charge, since the state did not offer any evidence of the defendant's intent to burn the victim's apartment. The defendant did not dispute that it was he who struck the match that started the fire, but he claimed that it was an accident. The court held that the evidence presented by the state supported a finding that the defendant's striking of the match was not accidental. The evidence showed that the defendant had threatened the victim's life more than once before the fire and had physically abused the victim. The state's arson expert testified that the fire began in a puddle of gasoline on the floor which was ignited close to the floor, and that the extent of the defendant's injuries and the fact that the defendant's clothes were not burned made the version of the fire set forth in the defendant's written statement impossible.

In Vega v. State, the defendant argued that the evidence failed to show that he deliberately or intentionally set the fire to the abandoned building or that he had ignitable materials with him. Rather, the evidence only showed that he had tossed several tires onto the fire while it continued to grow larger. The court held, however, that § 16-7-60(a) does not require that the defendant personally set the fire or possess ignitable materials. The evidence would be sufficient where it shows that the defendant knowingly damaged or knowingly aided or abetted another to damage property by adding fuel to a fire.

C. Statutorily Protected Structures

The Georgia arson statute expands considerably the types of structures protected from damage. While at common law only dwellings were protected, § 16-7-60(a) describes the following as protected structures without regard to whether they are occupied, unoccupied or vacant: (1) dwelling houses, (2) buildings, vehicles, railroad cars, watercraft or other structures designed for use as dwellings, (3) any structure insured against loss or damage by fire or explosive, (4) any structure which is damaged with the intent to defeat, prejudice or defraud the rights of a spouse or co-owner. Additionally, first degree arson protects any structure which is damaged under such circumstances in which danger to human life is reasonably foreseeable. Section 16-7-61 defines second degree arson as the damaging of a structure not covered by § 16-7-60. This would appear to be limited to uninsured structures not designed as dwellings in which the damage was not done with the intent to defeat, prejudice or defraud the rights of a spouse or co-owner. Third degree arson is limited to the damaging of personal property.

D. Property of Another

The statutes continue the troublesome requirement that the property be that "of another." That phrase has embroiled many courts, including Georgia's, in arguments over whether property merely in another's possession is "of another." In Tukes v. State, the accused set fire to the house the occupants had already sold to him. The court found that the circumstance did not bar prosecution, stating that lawful occupancy constitutes the ownership contemplated by the statute, not legal title. This result is correct because the offense of arson is not so much an offense against property interests as it is against the security of the house. Since lawful occupancy by one in charge, rather than legal title, constitutes the ownership contemplated by the statute, alleging the "ownership" of the property by a person or entity is an unnecessarily minute description of an unnecessary fact in an indictment and need not be proved. The state need only present some evidence of lawful occupancy by another to satisfy this requirement of the statute.

Both § 16-7-60 and § 16-7-61 also now explicitly prohibit the burning of a structure used as a dwelling house in which anybody else has a security interest, such as a mortgage or lien. Thus, the mortgagor can be convicted of arson for burning his house. Two exceptions to the general requirement that the property damaged must belong to another are found in § 16-7-60(a)(3) and (4). The former subsection of first degree arson prohibits the burning of any insured structure and the latter bars the damaging of any structure, without regard to ownership, with the intent to defeat, prejudice, or defraud the rights of a spouse or co-owner. Thus, an individual who burns his own unmortgaged house would be guilty of first degree arson if it was done to defeat a spouse's rights upon divorce.

E. Reasonable Foreseeability of Danger to Human Life

To prove first degree arson under § 16-7-60(a)(5), it must be established that it was reasonably foreseeable that human life might be endangered by the accused's acts. The fact that the arson of one structure threatened a neighboring dwelling should be sufficient. For example, in Griffin v. State, evidence that the explosion of one house knocked out the windows of a neighboring dwelling located only 35 feet away supported a first degree arson conviction. Likewise, in Lawrence v. State, evidence that the defendant set the fire in her apartment and that the fire damaged ten units in the apartment complex was sufficient to support a first degree arson conviction.

In Vineyard v. State, a "reasonable foreseeability of danger to human life" was established where the evidence showed that the fire was set in a carpet plant, that the plant was occupied by several employees, and that although a wall separated the employees from the actual fire, they were in close proximity thereto and toxic smoke filled the area. In Helton v. State, the court held that the time of the fire, past midnight, plus the fact that the house was occupied by sleeping residents thereof was sufficient evidence of the potential for danger to human life.

In Vega v. State, the defendant claimed that, even if he had knowingly damaged the building by means of fire, he would not have had any way of knowing that he was endangering human life, because the building was abandoned, and the victim, who was in a small bedroom area, was so intoxicated that he was likely unconscious. The court found, however, that the evidence showed that the defendant had actual knowledge that he was endangering human life. The defendant's statements immediately after adding fuel to the fire and upon being restrained outside the building indicated that he knew that someone else was still in the building and probably died in the fire.

F. Lack of Consent

The final element of arson requires proof that the damage was done without the consent of all owners, any holder of a security interest or lien, or, under § 16-7-60(a)(3), the insurer. While lack of consent must be proven, a perfunctory statement by the defendant that he did not have the consent of the mortgagee will suffice, as will a similar statement about lack of consent made by the victim. The lack of consent can be established by circumstantial evidence.

G. Value of Property

The value of the property damaged need not be alleged or proven in prosecutions for first or second degree arson. For third degree arson, however, the state must prove the damaged personalty had a value of at least $25.

H. Address of Property

A variance between the specific address of the burned property alleged in the indictment and proof of the actual address at trial is not fatal where it is undisputed that the victims owned only one home and that home was burned. Thus, the defendant would not be entitled to a directed verdict of acquittal on this basis. Furthermore, if the address clearly is in dispute and hotly contested by the parties at trial, the disputed issue of fact must be decided by the jury and a directed verdict of acquittal would be inappropriate.

H.1. In Commission of Felonies

In 2004, the General Assembly seemingly expanded the scope of the arson statutes to prohibit and punish arsons committed during the commission of felonies. It can be inferred from the language of Section 4 of the 2004 Act that the General Assembly intended to enhance the punishment for arsons committed during the commission of felonies. This section provides that the Act "shall not apply to any offense committed prior to July 1, 2004. Any such offense shall be punishable as provided by the statue [sic] in effect at the time the offense was committed." (Emphasis supplied.) However, the Act did not add any enhanced punishment provisions for arsons committed during the commission of felonies nor did it substantively amend the existing punishment provisions. Because of this legislative oversight, arson offenses whether involving other felonies or not are subject to the same punishment provisions regardless of when they were committed, contrary to the mandate expressed in Section 4 of the Act. Moreover, this oversight renders the subsections added by the 2004 Act, §§ 16-7-60(b), 16-7-61(b), and 16-7-62(b), ineffective until the General Assembly can add provisions to the arson statutes that specifically punish arsons committed during the commission of felonies.

I. Jury Instructions

Where an indictment charges the defendant with committing first degree arson by a specific method, a charge to the jury that arson may be committed by a method not specified in the indictment can constitute error, if a modicum of evidence has been presented from which it could be inferred that the jury convicted the defendant of arson in a manner not charged in the indictment.

III. Presumption of Accidental Damage

There is one key presumption in Georgia arson law: it is presumed that any burning is the result of accidental or providential cause, rather than of criminal design. Thus, if nothing appears but the burning, the state must overcome this presumption. The effect of this presumption is illustrated by Riddings v. State.

In Riddings, the state proved that the defendants' mother had moved out of a house in response to the failure of her landlord and owner of the house to repair the water system, and that the defendants were in the vicinity of the house at the time of the occurrence of the fire. The defendants conceded their proximity, but denied setting the fire or any knowledge of how it started. The court held this evidence insufficient to overcome the presumption that the fire was accidental.

On the other hand, in Whitten v. State, testimony by firemen that there were four separate fires inside the burning building and that they smelled gasoline in two of the rooms was sufficient to overcome the presumption and establish the fire as incendiary in nature. The presumption of accidental burning is a reflection of and consistent with the generally announced burden on the state to prove the corpus delicti in any crime.

In the absence of a written request, the failure of the trial court to charge the jury that the law presumes every fire to be accidental until the state proves otherwise is not reversible error.

IV. Admissibility of Evidence

Because arson is usually accomplished by stealth, circumstantial evidence generally must be used to show both the guilt of the accused and the corpus delicti. The court in Grimes v. State provided a short list of the types of circumstantial evidence that is generally admissible: the isolation of the premises, the absence of any natural cause for the fire, the precautions taken to avoid a fire and the presence of oil or other inflammable material can all be introduced to show the corpus delicti. The motive and opportunity of the accused, his prior threats, subsequent admissions of fact and suspicious conduct on his part are also often used to establish the guilt of the accused.

Evidence of threats made by the defendant to the owner of the premises prior to its burning is admissible to show intent, as is evidence of an earlier attempt by the defendant to burn the building in question. Evidence of the defendant's commission of a similar arson for which he had not been convicted is admissible to show bent of mind and course of conduct. Evidence of motive is likewise admissible in the form of bad feelings between the defendant and the victim, the defendant's inability to pay his rent, the defendant's involvement in an unusually high number of prior fires, or the defendant's stated perception of his dire financial condition. Evidence of prior difficulties between the defendant and the victim is admissible for the purpose of establishing the nature of the victim's relationship with the defendant during the period immediately preceding the fire. This evidence is not inadmissible merely because it may incidentally place the defendant's character into evidence.

While evidence of another crime committed by the defendant would generally be inadmissible, evidence that cocaine was received by the defendant in partial payment for committing the arson would be admissible as part of the res gestae of the crime.

Suspicious circumstances, especially those involving conduct of the accused, are customarily admitted. In Lester v. State testimony of two neighbors stating that they had observed a man enter and leave a house in a surreptitious manner shortly before its burning was admitted. Typical are the cases in which the defendant is seen removing furniture or other items of personalty from a house shortly before its burning.

Officials are justified in entering a burning residence without a warrant to combat the fire and may remain for a reasonable time after it has been extinguished to investigate the cause of the fire. Photographs taken by an investigator of open drawers, of the insides of closets, and of rooms not damaged by the fire would be pertinent evidence in determining whether the fire was caused accidentally or intentionally. The absence of items from drawers, closets, and rooms could be construed as a suspicious circumstance indicating that the fire was not accidental. Because the investigator is properly in the residence collecting evidence concerning the cause of the fire, his photographs are not subject to suppression.

Direct evidence such as statements made by the defendant to his alleged co-conspirator, and descriptions of inflammable instrumentalities, such as clothing soaked with gasoline, and plastic bottles filled with gasoline is admissible and is often utilized by the state.

Expert testimony is often essential in an arson case. Because the fire in question often destroys everything in the building, prosecutors must rely heavily on experts' conclusions drawn from examining the building and any remains. An arson expert can testify to his conclusion that the building was destroyed by "two separate and very hot, fast-moving fires," leaving it to the jury to draw the inference of arson. Expert testimony can also be used to show motive. For example, in Griffin v. State there was expert testimony that most of the personalty listed on an insurance claim as lost in the fire had not, in fact, been in the burned house. This sufficiently established a motive for the fire.

When the trial court implicitly accepts a witness's expert qualifications, the state is not required to make a formal tender of the witness as an expert. When a witness is qualified as an expert in fire investigation, he is qualified to testify regarding the whole field. Most importantly, an expert is permitted to testify that in his opinion a fire was incendiary in nature as opposed to accidental. The fact that the expert's opinion may be based in part on facts not in evidence goes to the weight, not the admissibility, of his opinion.

Unless the defendant has placed his character in issue or has raised some defense which the profile is relevant to rebut, the state may not introduce expert testimony of a serial arsonist profile, nor may the state introduce character evidence showing the defendant's personality traits and personal history as its foundation for demonstrating that the defendant has the characteristics of a typical serial arsonist.

Firefighters can testify to their own personal sensory perceptions, and, after Parker v. State, firefighters can even offer their opinions as to the nature of the fire. In Parker, a volunteer firefighter who had 17 or 18 years experience and had helped fight the fire in question characterized the circumstances surrounding the event as "peculiar." The court held that he was qualified by his experience to offer such an opinion and that it would help the jury in evaluating his observations. In Carr v. State, two firefighters testified about such matters as backdrafts, vapor explosions, fire origins, and the use of accelerants. The court found no abuse of the trial court's discretion in permitting them to testify as experts. Both witnesses had considerable experience as firefighters, 20 years for one and 13 for the other. In Morrow v. State, the court held that the fire chief was competent to testify as an expert witness in explosive devices. He had attended arson schools and had also received specific training on explosive devices. Having fought fires for over 20 years in various capacities, he had experiences with gasoline fires and explosives, including four bombs. Even though the fire chief did not consider his experiences extensive and did not consider himself an explosives expert, such expressions of doubt did not render him unqualified.

In Carr v. State, the state presented testimony that a dog, trained to indicate the presence of chemical ac-celerants, had alerted at the site of a fire where investigators had already come to believe an accelerant was used. The Georgia Supreme Court held that the dog alert testimony was expert testimony subject to the requirements of scientific verifiability. The average layperson would not have been able to determine from merely watching the dog that chemicals which could have accelerated a fire were present. It was only by the dog handler's analysis of the dog's behavior that the conclusion could have been reached that an accelerant was used. However, since dog alerts to accelerants have not been shown to have the scientific reliability necessary to permit their use as substantive evidence of the presence of accelerants, the dog alert testimony was inadmissible. Because there was no other direct evidence of the presence of an accelerant, and thus no direct evidence of arson, the trial court's ruling that the testimony was admissible was reversible error.

Prior to 1995, the state's failure to provide the defendant upon written request with a copy of a fire scene investigator's written report resulted in the report being excluded from evidence in the state's case-in-chief or in rebuttal. The proper remedy for the state's failure to provide the written report was the exclusion of the written report rather than the granting of a mistrial. Any report that was based on the fire scene investigator's general knowledge gleaned from experience and training rather than on any tests performed on material taken from the scene did not constitute a "scientific report" and did not have to be produced by the state upon written request by the defendant. Effective January 1, 1995, the state's disclosure of a fire scene investigator's written report is regulated by Georgia's 1994 criminal discovery provisions. If the state fails to comply with these discovery provisions, the trial court may order compliance, grant a continuance, or, upon a showing of prejudice and bad faith, prohibit the state from introducing a fire scene investigator's written report not disclosed to the defendant.

V. Sufficiency of Evidence

There is no clear line that can be drawn to show what evidence is sufficient and what evidence is not sufficient to convict. Because arson cases usually rest in large part on circumstantial evidence, the factual patterns are so varied that it is difficult to find any common denominators. Nevertheless, certain types of factual circumstances are more persuasive than others.

A. Presence at Scene of Crime

Testimony that the defendant was present at the site of the alleged burning immediately prior to its inception has proven highly convincing as to guilt. Such evidence, although insufficient in itself to seal the fate of the accused, is particularly persuasive in conjunction with other evidence of guilt, or when the proof of the corpus delicti is particularly forceful. For example, in Maddox v. State the defendant's alleged co-conspirator connected the defendant with the alleged arson, the defendant admitted being with the co-conspirator shortly before the fire, and a witness testified to seeing a yellow automobile like the one owned by the defendant in and around the site of the fire before and after its occurrence. Such evidence was sufficient to convict the defendant of arson. In Collins v. State, the dweller testified that when she heard her boyfriend knocking on her window on the night in question, she yelled at him to leave as she was not going to let him in. Shortly thereafter, she heard noises at the kitchen door and called the police, who arrived to find the pickup truck and garage on fire. The court found this evidence of the boyfriend's presence at the scene of the fire along with other evidence sufficient to convict him of first degree arson. In Griffin v. State, although the evidence was circumstantial, it was held to be sufficient to convict the defendant of arson. In addition to his presence at the scene of the crime, the evidence showed that the defendant might have been motivated to start the fire because of animosity toward his estranged spouse for taking furniture from the marital home. Furthermore, the defendant's unexplained presence at the house approximately 30 minutes before the fire, his unusual and frightening demeanor which caused the estranged spouse to leave the house immediately before the fire, and his instantaneous exit after the fire was started were all circumstances which the jury could have relied on in finding the defendant guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. In Patterson v. State, witnesses testified that they saw the defendants standing beside a parked car. About 25 minutes later when the witnesses drove past the scene again, they saw the car totally engulfed in flames. Although neither of the defendants was present at that time, they admitted driving the car to the scene. Law enforcement authorities investigated and determined that the car had been doused with a flammable liquid and set afire. This evidence along with other evidence was held sufficient to convict the defendants of second degree arson.

In Murden v. State, a neighboring apartment dweller saw the defendant break into the apartment and then leave ten minutes later. She noticed that smoke was billowing out of the apartment door. The burned apartment belonged to the defendant's ex-girlfriend and she testified that after the fire the defendant called her and said that he "wasn't through" with her yet and that he wished that she and her baby "was in flames." After noting the establishment of the corpus delicti, the court held that under these circumstances "mere presence" was enough to indicate that the defendant was criminally responsible for the fire. When the proof of the corpus delicti is weak, however, the court will reverse convictions even though presence is admitted by the defendant.

The relationship between the proof of the corpus delicti and the guilt of the accused is probably greater than the courts admit. It is rare for the court to hold the evidence sufficient to establish the corpus delicti, but not sufficient to establish the accused as the criminal agency responsible. Often when the court is uneasy about the guilt of the accused, the court will almost invariably express its dissatisfaction with the proof of the corpus delicti.

B. Suspicious Conduct

While suspicious conduct of the accused is often used to help establish guilt, the courts have required a high degree of proof. In Powell v. State, for example, the corpus delicti was clearly proven. The accused, the owner of the arsoned dwelling, attempted to recover from his insurer for his "lost" furniture. The evidence presented at trial, however, revealed that the accused had moved the furniture out of his house the day before the burning and was presently storing the furniture several miles away under the name of a friend. Such conduct was held to establish defendant's guilt clearly.

In Jones v. State, however, the defendant's conduct did not rise to a sufficient level of "suspiciousness." There the only evidence adduced was that a house burned and the defendants, shortly thereafter, were found in possession of cottonseed stolen from the house without any showing as to how recent the theft was. In Campbell v. State the court concluded that there was evidence only of the defendant's presence at the crime scene. The court noted a "conspicuous absence of any evidence to show intent, motive, participation, conspiracy, counseling or encouragement of another party." In Solomon v. State, the evidence raised a suspicion against the defendant but not enough to connect him to the arson. Thus, the evidence was insufficient to convict the defendant where it revealed that the defendant and his wife were in the process of a divorce, that both had motive, that the defendant's personal possessions had been destroyed by the fire while the wife's personal possessions had been removed before the fire, and that both the defendant and his wife had access to the home. In Collins v. State, the court held that while the defendants obviously had the opportunity to start the fire, the perceived absence of clothing and family photographs in the mobile home, combined with the presence of photographs and "important" papers in their car and in one of the defendants' purse, was insufficient to establish a motive for starting the fire. Without more, the fact that they had exclusive access to the property, as many if not most property owners do, raised no inference of incendiarism on their part.

C. Threats

A threat made by the defendant is extremely persuasive evidence. So long as the threat is of reasonable specificity and there is at least some other thread of probative evidence this may be sufficient. A showing of ill-will between accused and prosecutor, plus a specific threat to burn the prosecutor's dwelling has been held sufficient to convict. The establishment of bad feeling and a general threat of harm, however, has been held insufficient.

D. Financial Distress

For the arson of one's own property great stress has been placed on the financial circumstances of the owners. In Kennedy v. State the court pointed out that the appellant was having a slow time in his building business and had recently renewed an insurance policy on the log cabin which was the subject of the arson. In Powell v. State the appellate court emphasized the appellants' "difficult financial condition . . . prior to the fire." In affirming the conviction, the court characterized the evidence as consistent with the state theory that the appellants sought to destroy their home, replace it elsewhere and escape their creditors. In Stephens v. State, despite the father's claim that the fire began accidentally, the court held that the evidence was sufficient to authorize his conviction for arson. The evidence showed that he "had fallen on severe financial hard times" with his sole remaining asset being the insurance policy on his home. There was also sufficient evidence to authorize the conviction of his son as an aider and abettor. Evidence of his son's "own financial distress" established his son's motive for complicity in the scheme to commit arson. In Steidl v. State, although the defendant denied conspiring with the ex-boyfriend of his daughter to burn his own house down, the court held that the evidence was sufficient to authorize his conviction for arson. Moreover, evidence that the defendant was behind on his mortgage payment and behind on payments to numerous other creditors and that, prior to the fire, the defendant had commented that he could get out of debt with insurance money if the house were burned down established the defendant's motive for the arson. In these cases, it should be noted, there was strong evidence of criminal agency in the fires.

VI. Relationship to Other Offenses

Important Notice about Repudiation of Actual or Same Evidence Test: The Georgia Supreme Court repudiated the actual evidence test in Drinkard v. Walker, 281 Ga. 211, 636 S.E.2d 530 (2006), because it found this test to be inconsistent with the statutory framework governing the prohibition against multiple convictions for included offenses in Georgia. This inconsistency resulted in years of confusion and unpredictable results. In its place, the court adopted the required evidence test and overruled any prior case law that is inconsistent with it. Thus, any prior case law applying the actual evidence test is no longer controlling and should not be relied upon to determine whether one offense is included in another under § 16-1-6(1). The discussion of such case law is included below only insofar as it may still be applicable to pending prosecutions that arose before the Drinkard decision. See MULTIPLE CONVICTIONS, II. Tests to Determine Presence of Multiple Convictions, for a complete discussion of the Drinkard decision.

Criminal damage to property in the second degree may, on the particular allegations and proof, be a lesser included offense of arson in the first degree, thus authorizing a conviction of the former on an indictment for the latter. When the evidence establishes without conflict that arson in the first degree occurred, and the defendant simply denies being the one who committed it, the crime of criminal damage to property merges with the crime of arson, and no charge on the lesser crime is required. Second degree criminal damage to property is necessarily a lesser included offense of second degree arson, since it differs from second degree arson only in the respect that a less serious injury or risk of injury or a lesser degree of culpability suffices to establish its commission.

Arson in the second degree is not a lesser included offense of arson in the first degree, where it is unrefuted that the property alleged and proven to be burned was that property included or described in the first degree arson statute. Also, arson in the third degree which refers specifically to personal property is not necessarily a lesser included offense of arson in the first degree, even though there is evidence that personal property was burned along with the dwelling.

Where the evidence shows a series of incendiary acts involving the property interests of different entities, multiple counts of arson should not be merged into a single conviction. However, where the evidence shows a succession of incendiary acts involving a single residence, such conduct constitutes one act of arson, that of burning of the residence. Since there is only one crime of arson, multiple counts of arson should be merged into a single conviction.

If the offense of burglary is completed before the offense of arson is committed, the two offenses do not merge as a matter of fact or law. Since the same facts are not necessary to prove the commission of both offenses, the defendant may be properly convicted and sentenced for each offense.

Where the evidence shows that the defendant intended to set fire to a house and that he set fire to clothing, i.e., to personal property, as a "substantial step toward the commission of that crime," a charge on attempted first degree arson would be authorized.

VII. Punishment

In Georgia, all three degrees of arson are felonies. Under § 16-7-60, first degree arson is punishable by imprisonment for one to twenty years or up to a $50,000 fine, or both. Second degree arson, under § 16-7-61, is punishable by one to ten years' imprisonment or a fine of up to $25,000 or both. Third degree arson, under § 16-7-62, is punishable by a fine of not more than $10,000 or imprisonment of one to five years, or both.

VIII. Arson of Lands

A. Prohibited Conduct

Section 16-7-63 prohibits (1) starting, causing, or procuring another to start or cause a fire with intent to damage in any woodlands, brush, field, or other lands that are not one's own and without the permission of the owner or the lessee having control of such property; (2) burning any brush, field, forest land, campfire, or debris, whether on one's own land or the lands of another, without taking the necessary precautions before, during, and after the fire to prevent the escape of the fire onto the lands of another; (3) causing a fire by discarding any lighted cigarette, cigar, debris, or any other flaming or smoldering material that may cause a forest fire; or (4) destroying or damaging any material or device used in the detection or suppression of wildfires.

B. Punishment

The offenses described in items (2), (3), and (4) above are punishable as misdemeanors.

The arson of lands in the third degree as described item (1) above is punishable by a fine not to exceed $10,000 or by imprisonment for not less than one nor more than five years, or both.

If the arson of lands as described in item (1) above results in a fire that burns more than five acres that are not one's own, the offense is classified as arson of lands in the second degree punishable by a fine of not more than $25,000 or by imprisonment for not less than one nor more than ten years, or both.

If the arson of lands as described in item (1) above is committed under such circumstances that it was reasonably foreseeable that human life might be endangered, the offense is classified as arson of lands in the first degree punishable by a fine of not more than $50,000 or by imprisonment for not less than one nor more than 20 years, or both.

C. Exceptions

Section 16-7-63 does not apply to any fire resulting from the operation of transportation machinery or equipment used in its normal or accustomed manner.

ASSAULT

See ATTEMPT AND SOLICITATION; SEXUAL ASSAULT AGAINST PERSONS IN CUSTODY OR UNDER SUPERVISION OR CARE OF ANOTHER. See also RECKLESS CONDUCT AND RELATED OFFENSES.

I. Generally

The common law of assault has been codified in the separate statutory crimes of simple assault and aggravated assault. Simple assault can be committed either by attempting to inflict a violent injury upon another or by placing another in reasonable apprehension of immediately receiving a violent injury. Aggravated assault consists of conduct constituting an assault in conjunction with either (1) the intent to murder, rape, or rob, (2) the use of a deadly weapon, or (3) the discharge of a firearm from within a motor vehicle toward another person without legal justification. Assault with the intent to murder, rape, or rob can also be punished as an attempt, but was included in the assault statute "from a deference to tradition."

II. Simple Assault

A. Generally

There are two types of simple assault: (1) the attempted battery type and (2) the apprehension of harm type.

While it is likely that any attempt to commit a battery constitutes an assault, the statute requires an attempt to inflict a "violent injury," rather than an attempt to commit a battery. Section 16-5-23, defining simple battery, distinguishes between a battery committed by causing physical harm and one committed by an insulting or provoking physical contact, and the court of appeals has insisted that the two types are separate. It might be argued, therefore, that an attempt to commit a battery of the insulting or provoking type is not an attempt to inflict a violent injury, and thus not an assault.

B. Attempted Battery Type

Because the attempted battery type of assault is defined in terms of attempt, it carries with it the considerable theoretical baggage which accompanies the attempt statute. Like other attempts, attempted battery assault is a specific intent crime, and the state must establish that the defendant intended to commit a violent injury. In addition, the prosecution must show that the defendant's actions constituted a "substantial step" toward the commission of a battery; mere preparation will not suffice. Thus, if the actor curses another and picks up rocks as if to throw them, but makes no attempt actually to throw the rocks, it has been held that he has not gone beyond preparation and is not guilty of an attempted battery assault.

As with any other attempt, however, if the defendant has gone beyond preparation, it is irrelevant that he is prevented from completing the battery or that the completion of the battery was physically impossible. Thus, if the defendant approaches his victim menacingly, with a brick in his hand which he is prevented from throwing only by the victim's pretense that he is armed, he is guilty of an attempted battery type of simple assault. The fact question of whether there has been a substantial step before prevention will often be close.

C. Reasonable Apprehension of Harm Type

The other type of simple assault is committed when one person places another in reasonable apprehension of immediately receiving a violent injury. The absence of an intent requirement in the statute would indicate that only an intent to commit an act which in fact places another in reasonable apprehension of injury is required, and not a specific intent to cause such apprehension.

The principal focus of the cases is on the actus reus question of whether the defendant's actions could have placed his victim in reasonable apprehension of immediate injury. A mere threat to commit a violent injury upon the person of another does not necessarily constitute an assault. Before there is an assault, there must be a threat to the victim (whether verbalized by the defendant or implied by his conduct) coupled with the apparent present ability of the defendant to carry out that threat. Lack of actual ability to carry out the threat is irrelevant, so long as the defendant had the apparent ability to do so from the victim's perspective. For example, aiming a toy pistol at another might very well constitute an assault, if the state can demonstrate that the victim reasonably apprehended an immediate violent injury.

Since § 16-5-20(a)(2) requires that the actor place his victim in reasonable apprehension of receiving an immediate violent injury, there would seem to be no liability for a "conditional assault," or a threat to injure another upon some as yet unrealized condition. For example, the threat, "If you don't stay away from my daughter, I'll kill you," (spoken to an undesirable, but nonthreatening suitor), is conditional and should not alone impose liability for assault. The actor's conduct at the time the conditional threat is delivered, however, may place his victim in reasonable apprehension of immediate injury, even though his words evidence only a conditional intent. Thus, where the defendant was drunk and holding a pistol to the chin of his victim at the time he issued a conditional threat, his assault conviction was affirmed because the jury could find that, under the circumstances, his victim reasonably apprehended an immediate injury.

D. Similar Offenses

Prior violent conduct that is sufficiently similar to the charged offense of simple assault is admissible for the limited purpose of establishing the defendant's bent of mind and course of conduct.

IIA. Assault of Unborn Child

A person commits the offense of assault of an unborn child when he, without legal justification, attempts to inflict violent injury to an unborn child. For the purposes of this offense, an unborn child is a member of the species homo sapiens at any stage of development who is carried in the womb. It should be noted that this definition has not adopted the common law limitation that affords protection only to those unborn children who are so far developed as to be ordinarily called "quick," i.e., so far developed as to be able to move or stir in the mother's womb. Rather, it affords protection to all unborn children at any stage of development.

III. Aggravated Assault

A. Generally

Analytically, there are two components to the proof of any aggravated assault under § 16-5-21. First, the defendant must commit an assault. Second, the assault must be committed either (1) with an intent to murder, to rape, or to rob, (2) with a deadly weapon, or (3) by discharging a firearm from within a motor vehicle toward another person without legal justification.

B. Mens Rea

1. Intent to Murder, Rape, or Rob

An assault with intent to murder, rape, or rob is a specific intent offense; the mens rea requirement is the specific intent to commit the particular crime. Thus, the courts have warned that a conviction for assault with intent to murder is improper if the facts indicate that the homicide would have been voluntary manslaughter rather than murder had the victim died. If a defendant shoots at his victim "as the result of a sudden, violent, and irresistible passion resulting from serious provocation," and misses, there will be no conviction for assault with intent to murder, although there would probably be a conviction for assault with a deadly weapon.

Intent to rape, when it is an essential element of the aggravated assault, may be shown by circumstantial evidence. Where it is an essential element of the aggravated assault, the failure to define the offense of rape in a jury instruction constitutes reversible error.

A defendant's denial of any intention to rape the victim, followed by his spontaneous assertion that he was unable to do so, would be directly relevant to an aggravated assault charge against him. The fact that a portion of his statement may incidentally be unfavorable to him does not render it inadmissible.

A defendant's belief that the victim was a female and his actions taken toward the victim in an effort to commit a rape would be sufficient to establish his intent to rape (i.e., have carnal knowledge with a female). That the victim turned out to be male, rendering an actual rape impossible, would not affect his culpability. The defendant's belief that the victim was a female would support a conviction of aggravated assault with intent to rape.

2. Specific vs. General Intent

Assault with intent to murder and assault with a deadly weapon do not have identical mens rea requirements. Where the defendant is charged with assault with intent to murder, the assault, coupled with the specific intent to commit murder, is the crime. Proof that the method of assault used by the defendant constituted a deadly or offensive weapon would not be required.

An assault committed by means of a deadly or offensive weapon, unlike an assault committed with the intent to murder, does not require a specific criminal intent; rather it requires only a general criminal intent, which in the case of simple assault, an essential element of aggravated assault, is a general intent to injure. Thus, where the defendant is charged with the attempted battery type of deadly weapon aggravated assault, the defendant's general intent to injure is an element of the offense. Proof of the defendant's use of a deadly or offensive weapon with the intended consequence being the attempted or the completed injury to the victim would be sufficient for conviction. Where the defendant is charged with the reasonable apprehension type of deadly weapon aggravated assault, however, a general intent to injure is not an element of the offense. Proof of the defendant's use of a deadly or offensive weapon which placed the victim in reasonable apprehension of immediately receiving a violent injury would be sufficient for conviction. In this type of deadly weapon aggravated assault, the state must show the intention to commit the act of using the deadly weapon, not the intention to make the victims apprehensive.

It is not necessary to charge the jury that an intent to injure is an essential element of aggravated assault. A general charge on intent would be sufficient to enable the jury to apply it to an assault count.

3. Transferred Intent

Where one intends to assault a victim with a deadly weapon and in the course of that assault another victim is injured, the original intent is transferred in law to the other victim as well. This principle of transferred intent does not apply, however, if a person, as the result of an unprovoked assault, shoots at his assailant, but misses him and instead hits a bystander. No guilt would attach to that person because the assault upon him would justify his shooting at the assailant.

4. Intentionally Firing Gun into Group of People or at Another

When a defendant intentionally shoots several times into a group of people intending to harm only one of them, a jury would be authorized to find him guilty of aggravated assault against each person in the group.

Firing shots with the intention of frightening a group of people establishes as a matter of law the offense of aggravated assault. Likewise, intentionally firing a gun at another, absent justification, is sufficient in and of itself to support a conviction of aggravated assault.

5. Criminal Intent vs. Criminal Negligence

Because the attempted battery type of deadly weapon aggravated assault cannot be committed by criminal negligence, a charge that criminal negligence can substitute for criminal intent would be error. Criminal intent and criminal negligence are not interchangeable in those instances where the mental culpability of the actor is the essential element that distinguishes two separate crimes, with separate penalties, for committing the same behavior. Such an instance exists with the attempted battery type of deadly weapon aggravated assault and reckless conduct: where the proscribed conduct is the result of the actor's criminal intent, the General Assembly has determined that the offense constitutes the felony of aggravated assault whereas that same conduct which is the result of the actor's criminal negligence supports a conviction only of reckless conduct.

A charge that criminal negligence can substitute for criminal intent would also be error for the reasonable apprehension type of deadly weapon aggravated assault. Because it is the state of mind of the victim that determines whether an aggravated assault of this type has been committed, there is no reason for a charge on criminal negligence at all.

6. Knowledge of Victim's Status as Peace Officer

An essential element of aggravated assault on a peace officer is that the defendant knew the victim was a peace officer. Thus, the jury must be charged that knowledge is an essential element of the crime.

However, where an indictment charges a defendant with felony murder predicated on an aggravated assault against a sheriff's deputy, the identification of the victim as a law enforcement officer would describe neither the murder charge nor the manner in which it was committed. Therefore, this identification would not be a material averment in the indictment and would not need to be proven, and it would be proper for the trial court to deny a defendant's motion for a jury instruction that the state bears the burden of proving beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant knew that the victim was a law enforcement officer engaged in the performance of his duties at the time of the shooting.

7. Evidence Illustrating Motive, Intent, Plan, Scheme, Bent of Mind, or Course of Conduct

The following evidence has been held admissible to illustrate the defendant's motive, intent, plan, scheme, bent of mind, or course of conduct in committing an aggravated assault: (1) a conviction for a prior aggravated assault of a similar nature; (2) a conviction for a prior sexual offense similar in nature to a charge of aggravated assault with intent to rape; (3) a guilty plea to a prior voluntary manslaughter charge involving a stabbing incident of a similar nature; (4) evidence of prior difficulties, threats, or confrontations against the particular victim; (5) where the victim is the defendant's wife, evidence regarding the defendant's marital separations and relationship with another woman; (6) evidence of the defendant's previous beating of his spouse or mate; (7) evidence of a domestic situation in which the defendant demanded a sexual favor then assaulted the victim when she refused; (8) where the victim is a woman with whom the defendant is sexually and emotionally involved, a conviction for the prior murder of his wife; (9) evidence concerning the defendant's alleged participation in satanic worship; (10) evidence explaining gang culture; and (11) evidence concerning the defendant's expression of racial bias some time before the shooting.

If the defendant's previous conviction involved a different offense, a different victim, and was committed at a different time and in a different manner, his previous conviction is not admissible to show his state of mind in committing an aggravated assault.

C. Actus Reus

1. Assault with Intent to Murder, Rape, or Rob

The actus reus of the "assault with intent" type of aggravated assault was clarified in Bissell v. State. In this case where the defendant was charged with aggravated assault with intent to rape, the court reasoned that there is a "substantial step" requirement within this type of aggravated assault, but it relates to the simple assault element only. Thus, it is necessary for a conviction for aggravated assault to show a substantial step toward the commission of a battery, i.e., a simple assault. However, once that substantial step toward a battery is proven, it becomes aggravated assault so long as it was accompanied by an intent to commit rape. It need not be accompanied by a substantial step toward a rape. In fact, if there was a substantial step, the court said, "the crime would then become attempted rape." The court's conclusion, therefore, was that the actus reus of the "assault with intent" version of aggravated assault is the same as that for simple assault, with the only difference between the two crimes being the mens rea.

Where the charge is the "assault with intent" type of aggravated assault, the state is required to prove the commission of an assault with the intent to accomplish the more serious crime. The state is not required to prove the victim's reasonable apprehension of harm nor the likelihood that the weapon used would result in serious bodily injury.

2. Assault with a Deadly or Offensive Weapon

a. Types of Weapon

The great majority of aggravated assault cases involve the use of a weapon. There are two types of weapon under the statute: (1) a weapon that is deadly as a matter of law and (2) an object that, when used offensively, is likely to or actually does result in serious bodily injury. If the defendant is charged with committing the aggravated assault with a weapon that is deadly as a matter of law, it is inappropriate for the trial court to instruct the jury that deadly weapon aggravated assault is committed when the deadly weapon is "used offensively." The offensive use of a weapon applies only to an aggravated assault committed with an offensive weapon and does not apply to an aggravated assault committed with a weapon that is deadly as a matter of law.

Since an aggravated assault committed with an offensive weapon may be committed in more than one way, it is sufficient for the state to show that it was committed in any one of the separate ways listed in the indictment, even if the indictment uses the conjunctive rather than disjunctive form. Thus, where the evidence is sufficient to show that the defendant violated the statute in at least one of the ways alleged in the indictment, there is no fatal variance.

While the courts have been reluctant to hold that anything other than a firearm used as such is per se a deadly weapon, they have held that hands, fists, feet, dogs, lamps, shoes, blackjacks, motor vehicles, knives or pocketknives, waterbugs, metal pipes, small logs, cigarette lighters, lit cigarettes in conjunction with gasoline, and ceramic statues may be deadly or offensive weapons, depending upon the circumstances. Where a question exists as to whether an object could serve as a deadly or offensive weapon, it is proper for the trial court to define for the jury what constitutes a deadly or offensive weapon. The determination of whether a weapon is deadly or offensive is to be made by the jury, considering the manner in which the weapon was used.

It is not necessary for the state to admit into evidence the deadly weapon used by the defendant in order for the defendant to be found guilty of aggravated assault. Evidence of the victim's injuries, if any, may be used to show the weapon's deadliness. In the absence of any direct evidence that a deadly weapon was used in the assault against the victim, a jury can reasonably infer from evidence of the victim's injuries that the victim was indeed assaulted with a deadly weapon. However, there is no requirement that the victim actually be injured by the deadly weapon before a conviction for aggravated assault is authorized. Where the victim never actually received a violent injury, the jury's determination of whether the weapon was deadly would obviously have to be based upon factors other than the nature and extent of the victim's injuries.

b. Perception of Weapon's Deadliness

The determination of a weapon's deadliness depends upon whether the defendant is charged with deadly weapon aggravated assault or intent to murder aggravated assault. In the law of murder, the use of a deadly weapon is often used as evidence of an intent to kill, and the same is true where the charge is aggravated assault with the intent to murder. The Court of Appeals has indicated that in such cases the deadliness of the weapon is to be determined from the defendant's viewpoint, depending upon his perception of the weapon and its capabilities.

Where the charge is deadly weapon aggravated assault, however, it is the victim's reasonable apprehension of harm by an assault with a deadly weapon that establishes the crime of aggravated assault. The focus is on the victim's reasonable perception of the weapon, so that, for example, a shotgun which the defendant knows is missing its trigger and is incapable of firing would be a deadly weapon for purposes of deadly weapon aggravated assault if the victim reasonably perceived it as a normally functioning lethal weapon, even though it would not be a deadly weapon for purposes of establishing an intent to kill. This analysis, however, should apply only to a deadly weapon aggravated assault of the reasonable apprehension type. The victim's perception would hardly be relevant in the attempted battery type of deadly weapon aggravated assault.

c. Types of Assault

There are two types of deadly weapon aggravated assault under the statute: (1) the reasonable apprehension type and (2) the attempted battery type. In order to sustain a conviction of the first type, the state must demonstrate that the victim reasonably apprehended an immediate violent injury. In most instances, the victim's testimony that he saw a weapon and evidence of his reaction to it will articulate this type of deadly weapon aggravated assault. In order to sustain a conviction of the second type, the state must demonstrate that the defendant attempted to injure the victim. The victim's perception of the weapon and his reaction to it are irrelevant in this type of deadly weapon aggravated assault. Instead, the evidence must show that the defendant intended to commit a violent injury to the person of the victim and that the defendant's actions constituted an attempt toward the commission of that violent injury. Where an indictment sufficiently alleges deadly weapon aggravated assault of either type, the trial court may instruct the jury on both types of deadly weapon aggravated assault.

When in issue, the state of mind of the victim, including whether the victim had been placed under reasonable apprehension of injury or fear from an event, may be proved by indirect or circumstantial evidence. The victim's reasonable apprehension of a violent injury may be inferred from the conduct of the victim. Although the victim may not testify as to his apprehension and although the threat accompanying the use of the deadly weapon may have been indicative only of a conditional threat to inflict bodily harm, the jury can still determine from the circumstances that the victim, with a deadly weapon pointed at him, was in reasonable apprehension of immediately receiving a violent injury. The fact that a victim not available to testify at trial was severely wounded as a result of a shooting would certainly support an inference that he was placed in reasonable apprehension of his immediate safety. A victim who felt the flash and pressure of the weapon when it was fired could be found to be in reasonable apprehension of harm even though the weapon was not pointed at him. Also, a victim who heard a shot and fell to the ground to avoid being shot at again could be found to be in reasonable apprehension of immediately receiving a violent injury. Likewise, a victim, having fled for fear of being shot, could be found to be in reasonable apprehension of receiving a violent injury, even though he was not in the presence of the weapon when it was fired. A victim who continuously fought her armed attacker while screaming "Help me, God, help me Jesus, help me God, help me" could be found to be in reasonable apprehension of physical harm. Although the victim's awareness is not an essential element of the crime of aggravated assault, it has been held that a victim that was unquestionably asleep or passed out during the time of an aggravated assault could not have been placed in apprehension of receiving an injury. The corroboration of the victim's testimony is not required to prove deadly weapon aggravated assault.

A reasonable apprehension of harm cannot support an aggravated assault conviction without some evidence that the apprehension was aggravated by the defendant's use of a weapon. Absent any evidence that the defendant actually used a weapon against the victim, he cannot be found to have committed deadly weapon aggravated assault.

Since deadly weapon aggravated assault of the reasonable apprehension type is based upon the victim's perception of the assailant's weapon and her reaction to it and not upon the victim's fear of the assailant, a statement by the victim that she was not afraid of her assailant does not demand a verdict of acquittal for the assailant.

The aggravated assault statute does not differentiate between offensive and defensive threats of immediate bodily harm.

d. Possession of Weapon

In order to establish the crime of aggravated assault by the use of a firearm, there must be sufficient evidence that the defendant possessed the firearm. However, the state is not required to prove the victim was aware of the defendant's possession, nor is it required to produce physical evidence of gunfire, such as bullets, bullet holes, or expended shells, in order to establish this crime.

e. Firing Weapon into Group of People

Regardless of the number of shots fired, the act of firing a weapon into a group of people makes each individual in the group a separate victim. Where the defendant has been found guilty of multiple counts of aggravated assault under these circumstances, his convictions would not merge because the assaults were committed upon different victims.

f. Criminal Agency

Whether the victim's gunshot wound was self-inflicted or the result of the defendant's assault with a deadly weapon is a question for the jury to determine.

D. Party to Crime

A person who engages another in a fistfight while the other is simultaneously being beaten with an object by the person's confederate necessarily "aids and abets" the confederate in his assault upon the other, and is therefore a party to the crime committed by the confederate.

It is not necessary to place a weapon in the defendant's hands to find him guilty of being a party to the crime of aggravated assault.

Whether the defendant participated in an aggravated assault with intent to rob or abandoned the enterprise or was merely present is for the jury to determine.

E. Indictments

An indictment for aggravated assault which does not recite language from the Code must allege every essential element of the crime charged. An indictment which merely alleges that the accused used his hands in the commission of an assault fails to set forth the essential elements of aggravated assault. It fails to state that the accused attempted to use his hands as a deadly weapon or that he attempted to rape, rob, or murder the victim. Moreover, it fails to state that the accused intended to inflict a violent injury on the victim or that he placed the victim in reasonable apprehension of being injured violently. Without allegations setting forth the essential elements, the indictment is fatally defective and void, and incapable of supporting a conviction.

An indictment alleging an assault by use of an instrument which is not a deadly weapon per se is not required to be more specific regarding its use than indictments charging assault with an instrument which is a deadly weapon per se, as even the latter type of weapon, including guns, can be used in more than one way to commit an assault. So long as the indictment contains the necessary elements of the assault charged and clearly apprises the defendant of the allegation he must be prepared to defend against, the absence of language about the instrument's use can not be deemed to have rendered the indictment so vague as to be deficient.

Because the aggravated assault statute requires proof of only one act, inclusion in the indictment of more than one such act is mere surplusage, which is unnecessary to constitute the offense, need not be proved, and may be disregarded. Moreover, when an indictment alleges that an aggravated assault was committed by two means, the state need prove only one of the two acts constituting the crime to sustain a conviction.

An indictment charging a defendant in the statutory language of aggravated assault does not need to additionally charge in the language of simple assault in order to withstand demurrer.

Where the indictment charges the defendant with aggravated assault under § 16-5-21(a)(2), which requires only a showing of a general intent to injure, it would not be void for failing to expressly allege the criminal intent.

Where an indictment charges a defendant with committing an aggravated assault by one specific method, the defendant cannot be convicted of that offense based on a totally different, unspecified method. To do so would violate the defendant's rights under the Due Process Clause.

F. Jury Instructions

It is not necessary that a charge on simple assault be given in order to complete the definition of aggravated assault. The latter does not need the former to make it complete. It has been held, however, that where the defendant has been charged with assaulting the victim "with a firearm, a deadly weapon, by pointing said weapon at said person," a jury charge on deadly weapon aggravated assault that fails to include the requisite elements of assault is clearly inadequate. The offense could easily be confused with the misdemeanor offense of pointing a pistol at another. Under such a charge, there is a high probability that the jury would not be informed of the elements of aggravated assault sufficiently to determine whether the state has met its burden of proof.

Where an indictment charges the defendant with committing an aggravated assault by a specific method, a charge to the jury that aggravated assault may be committed by alternative methods, emphasizing a method of committing the crime not specified in the indictment, is reversible error. Yet the charge as a whole would not be erroneous if the trial court has also given a curative instruction limiting the jury's consideration to the method specified in the indictment or if the trial court has read the indictment verbatim to the jury. However, it should be noted that reading the charge as set forth in the indictment may not, under some circumstances, prevent the jury from being misled.

When the language of an indictment charges the defendant with causing the death of the victim "by shooting," it raises the possibility of aggravated assault both with a deadly weapon and intent to murder. As the language of such an indictment would be sufficient to put a defendant on notice of both grounds for aggravation, jury instructions that aggravated assault, as the underlying felony for a felony murder count, could be established with either "intent to murder" or use of a "deadly weapon" would be proper.

A charge stating that the term "serious bodily injury" as used in the aggravated assault statute means such injury as is likely to cause "death or great bodily harm" as used in the self-defense statute would not be a complete and correct statement of the law on aggravated assault and thus should not be given to a jury.

An instruction to the jury on the commission of aggravated assault by use of a deadly weapon that states that "[a] firearm when used as such is a deadly weapon as a matter of law" is a correct statement of the law and does not improperly direct a finding on the question of intent.

IV. Relationship to Other Offenses

Important Notice about Repudiation of Actual or Same Evidence Test: The Georgia Supreme Court repudiated the actual evidence test in Drinkard v. Walker, 281 Ga. 211, 636 S.E.2d 530 (2006), because it found this test to be inconsistent with the statutory framework governing the prohibition against multiple convictions for included offenses in Georgia. This inconsistency resulted in years of confusion and unpredictable results. In its place, the court adopted the required evidence test and overruled any prior case law that is inconsistent with it. Thus, any prior case law applying the actual evidence test is no longer controlling and should not be relied upon to determine whether one offense is included in another under § 16-1-6(1). The discussion of such case law is included below only insofar as it may still be applicable to pending prosecutions that arose before the Drinkard decision. See MULTIPLE CONVICTIONS, II. Tests to Determine Presence of Multiple Convictions, for a complete discussion of the Drinkard decision.

Prior to 1968, former GCA § 27-2508 provided that a person could not be convicted of assault with intent to commit an offense or of an attempt to commit an offense if it appeared that the crime intended or attempted was actually consummated. This rule was reversed by § 16-5-22, relating to assaults with the intent to commit an offense, and § 16-4-2, pertaining to attempts, which together were held to have repealed former GCA § 27-2508 by implication. The only limitation imposed by § 16-5-22 is that the defendant may not be convicted of both the assault and the completed crime.

There is no law authorizing the conviction for an attempt to commit a deadly weapon aggravated assault which itself is a particular type of attempt to commit a crime.

Stalking is not "in essence a common law assault." Since the act and intent elements of stalking differ from those of assault, it is clear that Georgia's stalking law proscribes intentional actions not covered by the assault statutes. Because of the differences between the two crimes, the rationale which makes attempted assault a legal impossibility and an absurdity does not apply to attempted stalking. Thus, attempted stalking is punishable as a criminal offense.

There is a great deal of case law concerning assault as a lesser included offense of other crimes. It is often advantageous for the defendant to have assault declared to be a lesser included offense of the indicted crime because it gives the jury an opportunity to render a "compromise" verdict, convicting the defendant for a lesser crime than that originally charged.

Georgia courts have held that simple assault is not necessarily a lesser included offense of deadly weapon aggravated assault. This is because the use of a deadly weapon elevates any simple assault into an aggravated assault.

A defendant is not entitled to a jury instruction on simple assault as a lesser included offense where the jury can find only an aggravated assault or no assault at all. Such would be the case where a deadly weapon was concededly or clearly involved in the assault or where the defendant's defense is essentially that no aggravated assault occurred. There are situations, however, when the record will support an instruction on simple assault. For example, if the deadly nature of the weapon used in an assault case is a contested issue, the defendant is entitled to an instruction on simple assault as a lesser included offense.

It has been held, for purposes of authorizing instruction and conviction of a lesser offense, that an offense is a lesser included offense of another offense if it is either necessarily included in the greater offense (that is, if all the essential elements of the lesser offense must necessarily be established as part of proving the commission of the greater offense) or if all the necessary elements of the lesser offense are alleged in the particular indictment charging the greater offense. The courts have held that the offenses of carrying a pistol without a license, carrying a concealed weapon, reckless conduct, and simple battery are not necessarily included in the offense of aggravated assault, and that the crime of terroristic threats and acts is not necessarily included in assault with intent to murder. Also, it has been held that simple assault is not a lesser included offense of terroristic threats, and that affray, as statutorily defined, is not a lesser included offense of aggravated assault.

Where there is no evidence that the defendant was merely firing at an occupied vehicle, a trial court's refusal to give a requested charge on terroristic acts as a lesser included offense of aggravated assault is not error.

Although it may be possible for simple assault to be a lesser included offense of child molestation, where the undisputed evidence shows that the defendant committed the crime of child molestation by fondling the victim with the requisite intent, a trial court's refusal to give a requested charge on simple assault as a lesser included offense is not error.

While aggravated assault with intent to commit rape may be a lesser included offense of rape in some cases, it is not so in every case because in many instances the offense of rape may undoubtedly be completed without the commission of an independent aggravated assault. The crime of aggravated assault with intent to rape is complete when there is a "substantial step" toward a battery of the victim, i.e., an assault, coupled with intent to rape. If there is a substantial step toward the rape itself, the crime would then become attempted rape. The acquittal of aggravated assault with intent to rape does not "necessarily include" a finding against rape. The offense for aggravated assault with intent to rape does not merge with the offense of burglary. The offense of aggravated assault with a deadly weapon does not merge with the offense of aggravated assault with intent to rape as a matter of fact where the aggravated assault with a deadly weapon was complete when the defendant grabbed the victim in the living room and wielded the knife, and where the subsequent aggravated assault with intent to rape occurred in the bedroom when the defendant bound the victim and made threatening statements concerning rape while the knife was on the dresser near his hand. The offense of child molestation does not merge with the offense of aggravated assault with intent to rape where the evidence shows that after the defendant pulled the victim's panties down and exposed his penis, he attempted to penetrate the victim's vagina with his penis. Aggravated assault and rape are separate offenses and do not merge, where the evidence used to prove the aggravated assault is not used to prove the force element of the rape. Where the evidence shows either the commission of the completed offense of aggravated assault with intent to rape or the commission of no offense, there is no error in the trial court's failure to charge the jury on the lesser offenses of battery and simple battery.

Where the offense constituting cruelty to children is based upon and committed in a way different from the offenses of child molestation and assault with intent to rape and is not satisfied by the introduction of the same evidence, there is no merger and the trial court may enter a separate conviction on cruelty to children.

Since the "assault" element of aggravated assault with intent to rob is contained within the "use of an offensive weapon" element of armed robbery and both crimes share the "intent to rob" element, there is no element of aggravated assault with intent to rob that is not contained in armed robbery. Therefore, an aggravated assault with intent to rob conviction would merge into an armed robbery conviction.

Aggravated assault with intent to rob would be necessarily included in armed robbery, but neither deadly weapon aggravated assault nor aggravated assault with intent to murder is necessarily included in armed robbery. Aggravated assault is not a lesser included offense of armed robbery as a matter of law, although it may be included as a matter of fact. Also, aggravated assault is not included in attempted armed robbery as a matter of law, although these two offenses may merge as a matter of fact. However, where the underlying facts show that one crime was completed prior to the second crime, so that the crimes are separate as a matter of law, there is no merger. Robbery by intimidation does not merge with aggravated assault with intent to rob as a matter of fact where the acts described by the victim constituted separate offenses. It also has been held that two simple assaults were separate offenses and were not as a matter of fact merely lesser included offenses of the offense of armed robbery. The crime of conspiracy to commit armed robbery does not merge with the crime of aggravated assault where the facts necessary to prove the conspiracy to commit armed robbery are not the same facts necessary to prove the aggravated assault. Because the offenses of robbery by force and aggravated assault on a person over the age of 65 years have different elements and prohibit different conduct, neither is included in the other as a matter of law. Nor are they included as a matter of fact where the state proves each offense by different facts.

Section 16-11-102 is not in conflict with, and does not take precedence over, §§ 16-5-20(a)(2) and 16-5-21(a)(2). The aggravated assault definition includes an element not contained in the pointing of a firearm definition, specifically: a resulting reasonable apprehension of immediate violent injury. Thus, if the victim is not placed in reasonable apprehension of immediate violent injury by the pointing of the firearm, only the misdemeanor of pointing a firearm (and not the felony of aggravated assault) has been committed. This would be the case where the victim was completely unaware that a firearm was pointed at him. On the other hand, if the pointing of the firearm placed the victim in reasonable apprehension of immediate violent injury, the felony of aggravated assault has occurred.

Where the evidence establishes either that the defendant committed the offenses of aggravated assault and murder by intentionally shooting and killing the victim or that he committed no offense at all because the pistol discharged accidentally, the trial court is not required to charge the jury regarding the offense of pointing a pistol at another as a lesser included offense of aggravated assault.

A charge of aggravated assault on a peace officer merges into a mutiny in a penal institution conviction because the aggravated assault charge is established by proof of less than all the facts required to establish the commission of mutiny.

In Jackson v. State, where the defendant struck a peace officer with a metal chair, the court held that the acquittal of the defendant of aggravated assault upon a peace officer does not compel the conclusion that the defendant did not act with the intent to cause serious bodily injury to the peace officer, since in aggravated assault upon a peace officer the court looks to the means by which one attempts to inflict injury; in the crime of mutiny in a penal institution, the court looks to the intended result.

Where an indictment alleging aggravated assault on a peace officer sufficiently puts the defendant on notice that he might be convicted of the lesser offense of felony obstruction of an officer and the evidence presented at trial would support such a charge, the trial court, upon written request, must charge the jury on the lesser included offense of felony obstruction. However, where there is overwhelming evidence that the defendant committed the aggravated assault, the failure to give the requested charge is harmless error.

Where the same conduct that proves aggravated assault on a police officer proves obstruction of the same officer, the two offenses merge for sentencing purposes and the defendant can be sentenced for only one.

Because the offense of leaving the scene of an accident has different elements than the offense of aggravated assault on a police officer, the two offenses do not merge as a matter of law.

Simple kidnapping and aggravated assault are not included in one another as a matter of law. Since simple kidnapping is consummated when the victim is seized, a prior or subsequent aggravated assault against the victim would constitute a crime separate from the kidnapping as a matter of fact. However, where an aggravated assault provides the "bodily injury" for a kidnapping with bodily injury charge, the two offenses legally merge.

Under the required evidence test, aggravated assault, aggravated battery, and kidnapping each require proof of at least one different element. Where the state presents independent evidence to prove each of these individual crimes as set forth in the indictment, the aggravated assault and aggravated battery can not be considered part of the single completed act of kidnapping with bodily injury and therefore do not merge with the kidnapping charge.

As a matter of law, aggravated assault with intent to rob is not a lesser included offense of kidnapping with bodily injury. The two offenses share no essential elements.

Where hijacking and kidnapping convictions are supported by different and additional facts from those supporting a conviction for aggravated assault, there is no merger of the offenses as a matter of fact.

If the evidence establishing false imprisonment is not used up in proving an aggravated assault charge, the two crimes, although occurring sequentially, constitute separate offenses since each is established by proof of different facts, i.e., each offense is a completed crime when the next is perpetrated on the victim.

Whether assault or aggravated assault is a lesser included offense in another offense (or whether another offense is included in aggravated assault) may also depend upon the allegations of the indictment in any particular case. If the indictment, in the course of setting forth the crime charged, alleges all the necessary elements of an assault, for example, then assault is a lesser included offense in that case, although it might not be in another case involving different factual allegations.

Although the element of physical or bodily harm is a requisite for battery, where the physical or bodily harm is committed with a deadly weapon, battery is not a lesser included offense. Where the indictment alleges assault with a deadly weapon and the evidence shows that an assault was committed with a deadly weapon, aggravated assault is proved beyond a reasonable doubt, and the evidence does not support a finding that the defendant committed a battery. Therefore, a trial court is not required to charge the jury on battery as a lesser included offense.

Where the facts adduced to support an aggravated assault charge in an indictment are the same facts used to support an aggravated battery charge in an indictment, the aggravated assault is a lesser included offense of the aggravated battery and the defendant may be convicted only for the aggravated battery. Where the aggravated assault and the aggravated battery are established by proof of different facts, the offenses do not merge in fact and the defendant may be convicted and sentenced for both offenses.

The rule of lenity applies when two statutes governing the same conduct are conflicting with respect to their prescribed punishments, i.e., where one statute punishes the same conduct to a lesser degree than the other statute. In such a situation, a defendant would be entitled to have the lesser of two penalties administered. Since aggravated assault and aggravated battery are both felonies, differing grades of punishment are not involved. Thus, the rule of lenity would not apply to a defendant's sentences for aggravated assault and aggravated battery.

If the aggravated assault of the victim is independent of the act causing the victim's death, the aggravated assault does not merge into the malice murder as a matter of fact. Moreover, if, in order to establish that the defendant committed aggravated assault as pled in the indictment, the state is required to show not only that he shot the victim but that he did so with the intent to rob him, the aggravated assault would not be established by proof of the same or less than all the facts required to establish proof of malice murder. Thus, the two crimes would not merge as a matter of fact. However, if the aggravated assault and murder of the victim arise out of the same act, a defendant's conviction on the aggravated assault charge would merge into the murder conviction.

Although attempt to commit murder and deadly weapon aggravated assault are two different crimes as a matter of law, because the one crime requires proof that the defendant intended to commit murder whereas the other crime does not require proof of such specific intent, deadly weapon aggravated assault merges into attempt to commit murder as a matter of fact where both crimes are based on allegations in the indictment that the defendant assaulted the victim with a deadly weapon and where each crime is established by proof of the same facts.

Where the evidence shows completion only of the greater offense of felony murder, that is, there is no evidence from which the jury can conclude that death resulted from a cause other than the aggravated assault inflicted by the defendant, the trial court is not required to offer aggravated assault to the jury as a lesser option.

Where the defendant is convicted of the voluntary manslaughter of one victim and the aggravated assault of another victim, the convictions do not merge as a matter of fact, even though only one shot was fired, striking both victims. One crime is not included within another if each crime affects a different victim. Thus, verdicts of guilty of voluntary manslaughter as to one victim and aggravated assault as to the other victim will be upheld.

Where there was one act committed upon one victim at the same time, either intentionally or accidentally, convictions of aggravated assault and involuntary manslaughter would be mutually exclusive verdicts. It would therefore be proper for the trial court to instruct the jury to continue deliberating on these two charges.

If evidence presented at trial supports allegations in an indictment that the defendant pointed a gun at the victim and threatened to shoot the victim, the jury would be authorized to find either that the defendant used a gun to place the victim in reasonable apprehension of immediately receiving a violent injury or that the defendant threatened to commit a crime of violence with the purpose of terrorizing the victim. In such a case, the offense of terroristic threats is included in the offense of aggravated assault with a deadly weapon as a matter of fact.

If the evidence does not show that two aggravated assaults upon the same victim were committed in a continuous and uninterrupted act but shows that one aggravated assault was completed before the other occurred, the two aggravated assaults are separate offenses and do not merge.

The aggravated assault and criminal trespass statutes differ in the classification of the interests that each statute seeks to protect: the person placed in reasonable apprehension of receiving serious bodily injury in the case of aggravated assault and the property of another in the case of criminal trespass. Thus, criminal trespass is not a lesser included offense of aggravated assault as a matter of law. Furthermore, inasmuch as an indictment alleges deadly weapon aggravated assault and therefore does not require the state to prove that the defendant interfered with the victim's property, criminal trespass is not a lesser included offense as a matter of fact.

Criminal damage to property in the first degree, which involves the deliberate and unauthorized interference with property, is not a lesser included offense of aggravated assault as a matter of law.

Because the elements of interference with government property are not included in the elements required for aggravated assault, the two offenses do not merge as a matter of law.

The offenses of aggravated stalking and aggravated assault do not merge as a matter of fact where the stalking is completed before the assault occurs.

Aggravated assault with a motor vehicle and hit-and-run with that same vehicle are not mutually exclusive verdicts. Duality is not an impossibility.

Reckless driving is a crime founded upon an act of criminal negligence rather than an intentional act. Aggravated assault with a motor vehicle, which is based on attempting to commit a violent injury to the person of another under § 16-5-20(a)(1), requires a finding of an intentional infliction of injury, which precludes the element of criminal negligence in reckless driving. Accordingly, a verdict of guilt as to aggravated assault with a motor vehicle based on § 16-5-20(a)(1) would be mutually exclusive with a verdict of guilt as to serious injury by vehicle predicated on reckless driving.

Because discharging a firearm near a public street is not a lesser included offense of aggravated assault, a trial court commits no error by refusing to merge the offenses during sentencing.

Although the weapon used to assault the victim is stolen, the offense of theft by receiving stolen property does not merge into the offense of aggravated assault as a matter fact because the theft offense requires proof that the defendant knew or should have known that the weapon was stolen. No such proof is required for an aggravated assault conviction.

The offense of possession of a firearm by a convicted felon does not merge into the offense of aggravated assault as a matter of fact because the possession offense requires proof that the defendant was a convicted felon, while the assault offense does not.

Instructing a jury that if they find the defendant guilty of deadly weapon aggravated assault, they necessarily have to find the defendant guilty of possession of a weapon during the commission of a crime is harmful error. Such an instruction prevents the jury from independently considering whether or not the defendant is guilty of the possession charge. A trial court cannot direct the jury to return a verdict of guilty in a criminal case no matter what the law or the evidence would require.

V. Defenses and Exemptions

A. Simple Assault and Aggravated Assault

Perhaps the most important of the defenses available in an assault or aggravated assault prosecution are the justification defenses set forth in Article 2 of Chapter 3 of Title 16, such as self-defense, defense of another, defense of property, and lawful arrest. Because of their importance and general applicability, these defenses are considered in separate topics of this work.

Since 1833 the law of Georgia has provided that: A person charged with simple assault or simple battery may introduce in evidence any opprobrious or abusive language used by the person against whom force was threatened or used and the trier of facts may, in its discretion, find that the words used were justification for simple assault or simple battery.

Section 16-5-25 is based upon a legislative determination that a person should not be held criminally liable when his passions are aroused by the abusive language of another, so long as the force employed is not disproportionate to the provocation which brought it about. The defense is available only to one charged with simple assault or simple battery, and it is not error to refuse an instruction on § 16-5-25 where the defendant is charged with murder or aggravated assault.

In determining whether the words used justified an assault or battery, the jury may consider circumstances such as the relative size and strength of the defendant and the victim, the degree of force used, and the initial use of abusive language by the defendant. The opprobrious language justifying an assault or battery must have been used in the defendant's presence and immediately prior to the assault, and, thus, words published in a newspaper will not justify an assault, even if they are "republished" by a statement such as "I put the publication in the paper as a man, and am responsible for it."

The defense has been fairly strictly construed. Grimaces or facial expressions of contempt are not "opprobrious or abusive language" which may justify an assault or battery, and the section is not a defense to a citation for criminal contempt for assaulting a witness in the courtroom. The defense is also unavailable to a police officer who assaults his prisoner, and insulting language used by a small child will not justify an assault by an adult upon the child.

Lack of knowledge of the victim's status as a police officer may be relevant in Georgia, as it is even in the federal system, to establish a defense of either self-defense or defense of others. Thus, if a defendant assaults an undercover officer while resisting arrest because he mistakenly believes the officer to be a private citizen, the facts should be examined to determine whether the use of force would have been justified against a private citizen. If so, then the defendant should not be punished for assault at all.

In a domestic dispute, a sibling who commits a simple assault or an aggravated assault against another sibling living or formerly living in the same household would be exempt from the enhanced punishment prescribed by the Crimes Against Family Members Act of 1999. Furthermore, a parent, guardian, or person acting in loco parentis who administers corporal punishment to a child would be exempt from the Act's enhanced punishment for simple assault. However, if the corporal punishment constitutes an aggravated assault, the parent would not be exempt under the Act.

Where an offense has been committed in the presence or within the immediate knowledge of a private citizen, he would be authorized by law to arrest the offender, and the offender would not be legally permitted to resist the arrest. Under these circumstances, jury instructions regarding an unlawful arrest by a private citizen and the offender's right to use force to resist such an unlawful arrest would not be authorized.

B. Assault of Unborn Child

There is nothing in the Code section outlining the offense of assault of an unborn child that permits the prosecution of (1) any person for conduct relating to an abortion for which the consent of the pregnant woman, or person authorized by law to act on her behalf, has been obtained or for which such consent is implied by law; (2) any person for any medical treatment of the pregnant woman or her unborn child; or (3) any woman with respect to her unborn child.

VI. Punishment

A. Simple Assault

Simple assault is a misdemeanor punishable under the general misdemeanor statute. However, simple assault is punishable as a misdemeanor of a high and aggravated nature when it is committed in a public transit vehicle or station, between family members, against an elder person, against a public school employee engaged in official duties or on school property, or against a pregnant female.

B. Assault of Unborn Child

Assault of an unborn child is a misdemeanor punishable under the general misdemeanor statute.

C. Aggravated Assault

Aggravated assault is a felony punishable by confinement from one to twenty years. However, aggravated assault is punishable by confinement from three to twenty years when it is committed against an elder person, in a public transit vehicle or station, or between family members. Aggravated assault is punishable by confinement from five to twenty years when it is committed against a correctional officer, by discharging a firearm from within a motor vehicle toward another person without legal justification, or by using a firearm against a student or teacher or other school personnel within a school safety zone. Aggravated assault is punishable by imprisonment from five to twenty years, by a fine from $50,000 to $200,000, or by both fine and imprisonment when it is committed during the theft of a commercial vehicle, its trailer, or its cargo. Finally, aggravated assault with intent to rape against a child under 14 years of age is punishable by imprisonment for not less than 25 nor more than 50 years. In addition, any person convicted of this offense is subject to the sentencing and punishment provisions of § 17-10-6.2, which requires the offender to receive a mandatory split sentence including a minimum sentence of imprisonment.

If the victim of an aggravated assault is a peace officer engaged in the performance of his official duties, the possible punishment is increased to not less than five nor more than twenty years. The case of Bundren v. State made it clear that a defendant must know his victim is a police officer for a conviction of the greater offense of assaulting a police officer. The court found that § 16-5-21(c) does not establish a separate crime of aggravated assault upon a police officer, but rather simply enhances the punishment when the victim happens to be a police officer. "Since it is necessary to prove intent, it therefore follows that knowledge is an essential element to the offense of the aggravated assault of a police officer." While this reasoning is less than clear, the result seems clearly correct in light of the statutory language which punishes those who "knowingly" make an assault on a police officer. The court concluded that "the jury must be charged that knowledge is an essential element to the crime."

The defendant's knowledge that the person he assaulted was a police officer can be established by direct and/or circumstantial evidence. The state is not required to prove the victim's certification in order to make a prima facie showing that he was acting as a police officer within the contemplation of the statute.

The Georgia Court of Appeals has held that it was not the intent of the legislature to create the offense of aggravated assault upon a police officer as a separate offense from aggravated assault. Its intent was to provide for a greater punishment for the offense of aggravated assault when the victim is a police officer. Thus, an indictment charging the defendant with aggravated assault is not required to identify the victim as a police officer in order for the greater punishment to be imposed.

A defendant who has inflicted a serious, disfiguring injury on the victim as a result of an aggravated assault can be ordered by the trial court upon conviction to pay restitution to the victim's insurance company. The amount of restitution ordered can not exceed the victim's damages. The defendant is not absolved from paying restitution caused by his assault merely because some of the victim's medical expenses had been discharged in bankruptcy. A defendant who has been acquitted of the aggravated assault of a victim cannot be held responsible for damages arising out of the aggravated assault. Thus, the defendant cannot be ordered by the trial court to pay restitution for the victim's injuries that were inflicted by a co-defendant.

BATTERY

See also ASSAULT; ATTEMPT AND SOLICITATION; SEXUAL BATTERY.

I. Generally

The Georgia criminal code has codified the common law of battery into the crimes of simple battery, battery, and aggravated battery, replacing such statutes as wife whipping and punishment of convicts without authority. Simple battery involves the offensive touching or intentional physical harming of another individual. Battery is committed when a person intentionally causes substantial physical harm or visible bodily harm to another. Aggravated battery, which replaces the old mayhem statute, is committed when a person renders a member of the victim's body useless or severely disfigures the victim.

II. Simple Battery

A. Generally.

There are three elements to simple battery: intent, causation, and a touching which is insulting, provoking, or harmful. Although prior law defined only one type of battery, § 16-5-23, while not altering the total content of the crime, provides for two separate offenses: one involving insulting or provoking contact and the other physical harm. The Court of Appeals has indicated that the offenses are distinct.

Although consent or lack thereof would be relevant in a case involving insulting or provoking contact, it would not be relevant in a case involving physical harm. It is the act and intent and results of the defendant's act which constitute the crime of simple battery involving physical harm. The attitude of the victim is not called into issue by these elements.

B. Intent

The defendant must intend to touch the victim in an insulting, provoking or harmful manner. Circumstantial evidence, of course, can be used to prove the element of intent. Evidence of the victim's wounds or the perpetrator's actions, for example, may show that the defendant was angry and possessed the requisite intent while touching the victim. Anger, however, need not be present, as intent may be shown without this emotion. Indeed, the courts have gone so far as to permit criminal negligence to satisfy the mens rea requirement. In J.A.T. v. State the court stated that even if the defendant were "sicking" his dog on the victim in sport, not intending to injure him, a battery could be found if such action amounted to criminal negligence.

Prior violent conduct that is sufficiently similar to the charged offense of simple battery is admissible for the limited purpose of establishing the defendant's bent of mind and course of conduct. Also, a prior difficulty between the defendant and the victim is admissible to show their relationship and to show the defendant's motive, intent, and bent of mind. The probative value of such evidence is not outweighed by any unfair prejudice.

C. Causation

In addition to intending to cause a prohibited touching, the defendant must also actually cause such contact. In the case of harmful contact, direct physical contact between the perpetrator and the victim is not necessary to prove this element, however. Because the statute provides that the defendant need only cause harm to the victim, the harm can be inflicted through an instrumentality which is set into motion by the defendant. Courts have found, for example, that this element was satisfied when a defendant set his dog on a victim, when the defendant drove an automobile which struck the victim, when a defendant drove his motorcycle into a victim, when the defendant threw bags at the victim, and when a victim was struck with a rock thrown by the defendant.

In the case of insulting or provoking contact, the statute requires that the defendant make "physical contact" with the victim. In light of the expansive reading historically given the language of the simple battery statute, the Georgia Court of Appeals has held that there is nothing in the statutory language which requires that the physical contact with the victim be made by the body of the defendant. Because direct physical contact is not required by the statute, an insulting or provoking contact can be caused by the defendant through the use of an instrumentality he has set in motion. For example, the Court of Appeals found that the state proved the occurrence of a physical contact with the victim when the evidence showed that the defendant brushed up against the victim with his camcorder while attempting to film under her dress in a store parking lot.

D. Prohibited Contact

Cases decided under the law prior to 1968, reading quite broadly the prior statutory definition of battery as "the unlawful beating of another," established that any intentional, nonconsensual physical contact may constitute a battery, and this appears to be the rule under the 1968 criminal code as well. Prior law, however, defined only one type of battery, "beating," which was broadly construed, while § 16-5-23 distinguishes between battery committed by causing physical harm to another and battery committed by making an insulting or provoking physical contact.

The Court of Appeals has indicated that conviction under an indictment charging a battery of the physical harm type is improper if only an offensive, but not painful, contact is shown.

Physical contact of an insulting nature is a form of simple battery separate from causing physical harm, and it must be charged specifically. Thus, a charge that simple battery may be committed either by intentionally making physical contact of an insulting or provoking nature or by causing physical harm, while a true statement of the elements of battery, is not a true statement of facts or law under which one can be convicted in the face of an accusation alleging only one form of simple battery. Such a charge is reversible error, unless the trial court in his charge to the jury also makes it clear that the defendant cannot be convicted of a form of simple battery other than what is set out in the accusation.

It is not necessary that the victim suffer great physical harm; the infliction of pain is sufficient harm under the statute.

IIA. Battery of Unborn Child

A person commits the offense of battery of an unborn child when he, without legal justification, intentionally inflicts physical harm upon an unborn child. For the purposes of this offense, an unborn child is a member of the species homo sapiens at any stage of development who is carried in the womb. It should be noted that this definition has not adopted the common law limitation that affords protection only to those unborn children who are so far developed as to be ordinarily called "quick," i.e., so far developed as to be able to move or stir in the mother's womb. Rather, it affords protection to all unborn children at any stage of development.

III. Battery and Family Violence Battery

A person commits battery when he intentionally causes: (1) substantial physical harm to another or (2) visible bodily harm to another. "Visible bodily harm" means bodily harm capable of being perceived by a person other than the victim and may include, but is not limited to, substantially blackened eyes, substantially swollen lips or other facial or body parts, or substantial bruises to body parts. Since the state is not limited by this statutory definition, it does not have to allege the specific visible bodily harm in order to make the indictment sufficiently technical and correct.

If the battery is committed against a past or present family member, then the battery constitutes the offense of family violence battery. It should be noted that a second conviction for family violence battery against the same or another family member carries a more severe punishment than a second conviction for battery. In no event is this proscription against family violence battery applicable to reasonable corporal punishment administered by a parent to a child.

When the General Assembly enacted the provision defining the offense of family violence battery in 1996, it did not create a new offense but rather a separate category of an existing offense. This provision simply enhances the penalty for the already prohibited act of battery when such involves family members. This definition also redefines any past battery conviction involving a family member to be a family violence battery conviction which can serve as basis for enhancing a defendant's penalty.

It is the act and intent and results of the defendant's act which constitute the crime of battery. The attitude of the victim, i.e., his consent or lack thereof, is not called into issue by these elements.

Whether or not a victim of intentional injury by another heals from his injuries is not the test of whether the victim suffered substantial physical harm. Whether substantial physical harm occurred is instead a question of fact for the jury to decide. Another question of fact the jury must decide is whether the defendant caused the victim's bodily injuries under circumstances constituting the offense of battery.

Evidence of prior difficulties between the defendant and the victim is admissible to illustrate the defendant's motive, intent, or bent of mind in committing a battery on the victim. Prior violent conduct that is sufficiently similar to the charged offense of battery is admissible for the limited purpose of establishing the defendant's bent of mind and course of conduct. Testimony as to the victim's statements regarding previous incidents of abuse made shortly after the infliction of her injuries is admissible as part of the res gestae even if such evidence incidentally places the defendant's character in evidence.

IV. Aggravated Battery

A person commits aggravated battery when he maliciously does any one of three things: (1) deprives a victim of a member of his body; (2) renders a member of a victim's body useless; or (3) seriously disfigures a victim.

The intent to maim, which was an element of the former offense of mayhem, is not an element of the offense of aggravated battery, which replaced the offense of mayhem in 1968. The mens rea language of the current statute requires that the defendant "maliciously" cause bodily harm to another. Evidence of a malicious intention to do one of the prohibited actus reus acts satisfies this requirement. Because the term "maliciously" has such obvious significance and common understanding, there is no need to define it in a jury charge.

Where the evidence shows that the defendant acted intentionally and without justification or serious provocation in firing a shot which struck an innocent bystander, the jury would be authorized to conclude that he acted maliciously. Although the defendant may not have intended to shoot the bystander, when the bystander has lost the use of his eye as a result of being struck by a bullet intended for another, the law transfers the original intent from the one against whom it was directed to the bystander who actually suffered from the shooting.

A prior offense that is sufficiently similar to the aggravated battery charged is admissible for the limited purpose of showing the defendant's bent of mind. However, if the purpose for which the prior offense is offered involves an issue which was resolved in the defendant's favor by a verdict of acquittal in the prior trial, evidence of the prior offense would be irrelevant and inadmissible.

For actus reus purposes, the focus of the statute is upon whether the defendant has maliciously caused the victim to suffer an enumerated physical injury, and the means employed so as maliciously to cause such an injury is not a mitigating factor that would serve to render the defendant guilty of any lesser crime. Also, the fact that the defendant's initial contact with the victim was not an immediate cause of the victim's bodily harm is not a mitigating factor. If the defendant by his initial contact sets in force a motion that ultimately results in the victim's bodily harm, he has committed an aggravated battery.

Also, for actus reus purposes, the courts have defined bodily members as any bodily part or organ, making an eye, a finger, a tooth, a genital organ, the brain, the rectum, or the nose a bodily member for purposes of the statute. There is no requirement that the bodily member be permanently rendered useless in order to constitute the crime of aggravated battery. Thus, the victim's substantial, albeit temporary, loss of use of a bodily member would be sufficient to support a conviction.

Medical testimony is not required to demonstrate the loss of use of a bodily member. The victim's testimony would be sufficient to establish her injuries.

There are no well-defined guidelines for the serious disfigurement element. The statute simply provides that any serious disfigurement of another person's body or member thereof constitutes aggravated battery. There is no requirement that, in addition to being serious, the disfigurement of the victim be permanent or immediately visible. Because the circumstances of each aggravated battery vary, what constitutes serious disfigurement will almost always be a question for the jury to resolve. This does not mean, however, that no threshold exists for determining whether disfiguring injuries meet the requisite level of seriousness for an aggravated battery charge. The serious disfigurement element requires an injury more severe than the visible wounds used to illustrate the visible bodily harm required to support a battery conviction. In other words, the injury must be more than a superficial wound, such as a scrape, bruise, discoloration, or swelling. Thus, where the state has adduced no evidence from which the jury can infer that the victim's injuries are more significant, grave, or severe than the superficial, visible wounds that would typically support a battery conviction, it has failed to carry its burden of proving the serious disfigurement element.

Where an indictment charges the defendant with committing an aggravated battery by a specific method, a charge to the jury that aggravated battery may be committed by alternative methods, emphasizing a method of committing the crime not specified in the indictment, is reversible error. Yet the charge as a whole would not be erroneous if the trial court has also given a curative instruction limiting the jury's consideration to the method specified in the indictment.

A victim who dies instantaneously from the first blow cannot be subjected to an aggravated battery.

If the victim of the aggravated battery is a peace officer as opposed to a civilian, then the crime carries a more severe punishment. If the victim is a state peace officer acting in concert with federal officials, then the defendant may also incur federal criminal liability.

An essential element of aggravated battery on a peace officer is that the defendant knew the victim was a peace officer. Thus, the jury must be charged that knowledge is an essential element of the crime.

IVA. Female Genital Mutilation

Any person who knowingly circumcises, excises, or infibulates, in whole or in part, the labia majora, labia minora, or clitoris of a female under 18 years of age is guilty of female genital mutilation. If the parent, guardian, or custodian of the minor female knowingly consents to or permits the mutilation, that person would likewise be guilty of this offense. Moreover, anyone who knowingly removes or causes or permits the removal of the minor female from this state for the purpose of mutilating her genitals would be guilty of the offense.

The statutory privileges provided by Chapter 9 of Title 24 do not apply to proceedings in which one of the parties to the privilege is charged with a crime against a female under 18 years of age. However, such person is compellable to give evidence only on the specific act for which the defendant is charged.

V. Relationship to Other Offenses

Important Notice about Repudiation of Actual or Same Evidence Test: The Georgia Supreme Court repudiated the actual evidence test in Drinkard v. Walker, 281 Ga. 211, 636 S.E.2d 530 (2006), because it found this test to be inconsistent with the statutory framework governing the prohibition against multiple convictions for included offenses in Georgia. This inconsistency resulted in years of confusion and unpredictable results. In its place, the court adopted the required evidence test and overruled any prior case law that is inconsistent with it. Thus, any prior case law applying the actual evidence test is no longer controlling and should not be relied upon to determine whether one offense is included in another under § 16-1-6(1). The discussion of such case law is included below only insofar as it may still be applicable to pending prosecutions that arose before the Drinkard decision. See MULTIPLE CONVICTIONS, II. Tests to Determine Presence of Multiple Convictions, for a complete discussion of the Drinkard decision.

The elements of battery are closely related to many other crimes which include elements of unpermitted physical contact. In cases where a battery is charged in conjunction with one of these other crimes, the verdicts must be consistent. If, for example, a defendant is charged with simple battery and obstructing a peace officer (by biting and kicking him), the defendant cannot be acquitted of the battery and convicted of the obstruction. Consistency was required because the conduct which constituted the battery was also the basis of the obstruction charge.

Battery is a lesser included offense of several crimes. The determination of whether an offense is a lesser included offense of another is especially important because that determination governs the possible liability of the defendant to double punishment as well as the jury charges to which he is entitled. A requested charge on simple battery need not be given, however, unless the evidence reasonably raises the issue or unless simple battery is, as a matter of law, an offense included in the specific crime for which the defendant was indicted. A defendant is not entitled to a jury charge on simple battery as a lesser included offense where his defense is essentially that no offense occurred or where his defense constitutes an absolute defense to any criminal liability whatsoever.

The question of merger will arise when a death occurs subsequent to a battery. The issue of whether there may be only one conviction of murder or two convictions, one for murder and the other for battery, ought to hinge on whether the death is the result of a single violation of the battery statute. If so, the battery ought to merge into the murder under the rule against multiple convictions. Whether a battery has been committed as part of the same transaction as the murder will often be a difficult factual question.

The crime most closely related to simple battery is simple assault; assault is often described as an attempted battery. Although former GCA § 27-2508 provided that a defendant may not be convicted of an assault where the evidence shows a completed battery, that section was implicitly repealed by § 16-5-22, which provides that a defendant may be convicted of an aggravated assault with intent to commit a major crime, even though the substantive crime itself was completed. Furthermore, former GCA § 27-2508 was repealed when it was not included in the O.C.G.A., effective November 1, 1982. Now, a defendant may be convicted for aggravated assault with intent to rape, for example, even if the rape was completed. This analysis and § 16-4-2, which states the same rule with respect to attempts generally, were applied to permit a conviction of simple assault, even though the battery was completed. Under § 16-5-22, a defendant cannot be convicted of both aggravated assault and the completed crime, and § 16-4-2 would similarly preclude a conviction for both simple assault and the resulting battery.

Simple battery may be as a matter of fact a lesser included offense of child molestation. It may also be as a matter of fact a lesser included offense of aggravated assault. Affray, as statutorily defined, is not a lesser included offense of simple battery.

The offense of simple battery merges into the offense of rape where the same impermissible touching—the hitting and slapping which constitutes simple battery—also supplies the element of force necessary for conviction of rape. If a jury finds a defendant guilty of the lesser included offense of simple battery at his rape trial, this finding amounts to an implicit acquittal of the defendant on the rape charge. Where the evidence shows that there was either a rape or that there was consensual sexual intercourse which was interrupted when the couple changed their minds, such evidence would not authorize charges on battery and simple battery as lesser included offenses. Where the evidence shows either the commission of a rape or no crime at all, such evidence would not authorize charges on battery and simple battery as lesser included offenses.

Where the evidence shows either the commission of the completed offenses of aggravated assault with intent to rape and child molestation or the commission of no offense, there is no error in the trial court's failure to charge the jury on the lesser offenses of battery and simple battery.

Simple battery could be a lesser included offense of battery, when the defendant is charged with intentionally causing visible bodily harm and the state does not prove that the harm was visible. If it is undisputed that the harm was visible, a charge on simple battery would be inapplicable.

The offense of simple battery merges into the offense of battery where each offense is established by proof of the same facts, except that the offense of battery requires proof that the defendant caused visible bodily harm. However, simple battery does not merge into battery as a matter of fact where the evidence independently establishes physical contact of an insulting and provoking nature separate from the infliction of visible bodily harm.

Simple battery is not a lesser included offense of felony obstruction of an officer. It is a separate and independent offense wherein the intent is to make physical contact or cause physical harm. Simply because the separate offense of simple battery could be prosecuted under the same set of facts that might support an obstruction conviction does not make simple battery a lesser included offense of obstruction under the law.

Since false imprisonment does not necessarily require an offensive touching as is required with simple battery, simple battery is not, by definition, a lesser included offense of false imprisonment.

The offense of battery is not a lesser included offense of false imprisonment, and the offenses do not merge as a matter of law. Nor do the offenses merge as a matter of fact where proof of each offense is distinct from proof of the other. That a distinct, separate offense, like battery, occurs during the ongoing course of another completed offense, like false imprisonment, does not in itself preclude conviction and sentence for each.

Since the offense of kidnapping with bodily injury is completed when the kidnapping and some bodily injury occurs, a prior or subsequent aggravated battery against the victim would constitute an offense separate from the kidnapping with bodily injury as a matter of fact. Similarly, where the offense of simple kidnapping is completed before the simple battery of the victim occurs, the simple battery constitutes an offense separate from the simple kidnapping as a matter of fact and law. However, where evidence of the battery is used to establish that the defendant injured the victim during the commission of the kidnapping, the battery is included in the offense of kidnapping with bodily injury as a matter of fact.

Under the required evidence test, aggravated assault, aggravated battery, and kidnapping each require proof of at least one different element. Where the state presents independent evidence to prove each of these individual crimes as set forth in the indictment, the aggravated assault and aggravated battery can not be considered part of the single completed act of kidnapping with bodily injury and therefore do not merge with the kidnapping charge.

Although the element of physical or bodily harm is a requisite for battery, where the physical or bodily harm is committed with a deadly weapon, battery is not a lesser included offense. Where the indictment alleges assault with a deadly weapon and the evidence shows that an assault was committed with a deadly weapon, aggravated assault is proved beyond a reasonable doubt, and the evidence does not support a finding that the defendant committed a battery. Therefore, a trial court is not required to charge the jury on battery as a lesser included offense.

Where there is no evidence whatsoever that the defendant's beating of the victim was a separate act but rather was part and parcel of the collective fatal attack on the victim, neither battery nor simple battery are lesser included offenses of malice murder as a matter of fact. Even if battery and simple battery are considered to be lesser included offenses, when the evidence shows completion only of the greater offense of malice murder, it is unnecessary for the trial court to charge on the lesser offenses.

If the evidence used to prove the defendant committed an aggravated battery is the same as that used to prove he committed a malice murder, the aggravated battery merges into the malice murder as a matter of fact, and a separate judgment of conviction and sentence for the aggravated battery should be vacated. If the aggravated battery of the victim is independent of the malicious act causing the victim's death, however, the aggravated battery does not merge with the malice murder as a matter of fact.

Where the facts adduced to support an aggravated assault charge in an indictment are the same facts used to support an aggravated battery charge in an indictment, the aggravated assault is a lesser included offense of the aggravated battery and the defendant may be convicted only for the aggravated battery. Where the aggravated assault and the aggravated battery are established by proof of different facts, the offenses do not merge in fact and the defendant may be convicted and sentenced for both offenses.

The rule of lenity applies when two statutes governing the same conduct are conflicting with respect to their prescribed punishments, i.e., where one statute punishes the same conduct to a lesser degree than the other statute. In such a situation, a defendant would be entitled to have the lesser of two penalties administered. Since aggravated assault and aggravated battery are both felonies, differing grades of punishment are not involved. Thus, the rule of lenity would not apply to a defendant's sentences for aggravated assault and aggravated battery.

Where the same evidence is used to support both obstruction and aggravated battery charges, one crime is included in the other, and the defendant cannot be sentenced for both.

A defendant is not entitled to a charge on the lesser offense of battery where the evidence establishes without dispute the commission of the greater offense of aggravated battery.

It has been held that aggravated battery may as a matter of fact merge with the greater offense of armed robbery or robbery by force. However, where the evidence shows that the robbery was complete before the aggravated battery occurred and where the evidence of neither offense was necessary to prove the other, there is no merger.

If the facts alleged in the indictment and the evidence presented at trial to establish the charged offense of cruelty to children are sufficient to establish the lesser included offense of battery as well, it is not error for the trial court to charge the jury on the offense of battery.

Cruelty to children, but not aggravated battery, requires proof that the victim was a child under the age of 18 who was caused cruel or excessive physical or mental pain. Aggravated battery, but not cruelty to children, requires proof that the victim was deprived of a member of his body or that such member was rendered useless or seriously disfigured. Therefore, each crime requires proof of at least one additional element which the other does not. Furthermore, the two crimes are not so closely related that multiple convictions are prohibited under other provisions of §§ 16-1-6 and 16-1-7. Accordingly, even if the same conduct establishes the commission of both aggravated battery and cruelty to children, the two crimes do not merge. Moreover, when the evidence establishes that the victim was subjected to multiple injuries in addition to the injury supporting an aggravated battery conviction, these additional injuries would support a cruelty to children conviction and the trial court's failure to merge the two offenses would not be erroneous.

The crime of reckless conduct is an instance of criminal negligence, rather than a culpable act of either general or specific criminal intent. Thus, where the evidence shows that the defendant committed a culpable act with criminal intent which resulted in the aggravated battery of the victim, a charge on reckless conduct is not authorized by the evidence.

VI. Defenses and Exemptions

A. Simple Battery.

There are three defenses to simple battery which, under most circumstances, are also applicable to simple assault. First, it is a defense to the crimes of assault and battery that the defendant was exercising his lawful authority as a police officer to make an arrest. The officer is justified in using only enough force to effect the arrest, however. Thus, the officer may use enough force to compel submission of the arrestee and, if need be, to defend himself.

Second, it is a common law defense to simple battery that the victim consented to the physical contact. A doctor who operates on a patient who consented to surgery, for example, has a defense to what would otherwise constitute a battery. Similarly, willing participants in contact sports cannot be convicted of battery when the contact is not likely to injure seriously or kill and is within the rules of the game. Although there is a dearth of Georgia cases on the subject, this defense is given substantial recognition by commentators.

Finally, under § 16-5-25, it is a defense to both simple assault and simple battery that the victim used opprobrious or abusive language. There has been very little recent indication as to just what kind of words constitute "opprobrious" or "abusive" language, but there are some limitations to the defense. If the defendant was the first person to use opprobrious words, then he is not entitled to invoke the defense. The defense is available only when the opprobrious words were uttered by the victim in the presence of the defendant. The defense of opprobrious language has been held unavailable to a police officer who commits a battery on his prisoner. It has also been held that this defense, being limited to the offenses of simple assault and simple battery, does not apply to the offenses of battery and aggravated battery.

Whether the assault or battery was justified by the victim's use of opprobrious words is a matter for the trier of fact to determine. The identity of the person who spoke the opprobrious words and the surrounding circumstances can be considered in order to make this determination. The Georgia Supreme Court held, for example, that opprobrious words uttered by a nine-year-old child did not justify an assault or battery upon that child by an adult. Presumably, opprobrious language by an insane or physically disabled person likewise would not justify an assault or battery.

Without any claim whatsoever by the defendant that he committed the offense because of abusive language, he is not entitled to a jury charge on abusive language as a justification for his committing the offense

The three defenses discussed above are not the only defenses available to a person on trial for the offense of simple battery. A defendant is entitled to assert the defense of self-defense/justification where there is some evidence presented which would authorize the consideration of this defense.

A charge of simple battery on an officer is subject to the affirmative defense that the person was resisting an unlawful arrest. However, a defendant's testimony that he did not resist the arrest would justify the trial court's refusal to give a jury charge on this affirmative defense.

In Pruitt v. State, the court held that the trial court erroneously admitted evidence of the battered woman syndrome in a case where the victim was a woman. The court did point out, however, that the Georgia Supreme Court has admitted such evidence where the defendant was a female asserting self-defense as a defense.

A.1. Battery of Unborn Child

There is nothing in the Code section outlining the offense of battery of an unborn child that permits the prosecution of (1) any person for conduct relating to an abortion for which the consent of the pregnant woman, or person authorized by law to act on her behalf, has been obtained or for which such consent is implied by law; (2) any person for any medical treatment of the pregnant woman or her unborn child; or (3) any woman with respect to her unborn child.

B. Family Violence Crimes.

In a domestic dispute, a sibling who commits a simple battery or an aggravated battery against another sibling living or formerly living in the same household would be exempt from the enhanced punishment prescribed by the Crimes Against Family Members Act of 1999. Furthermore, a parent, guardian, or person acting in loco parentis who administers corporal punishment to a child would be exempt from the Act's enhanced punishment for simple battery. However, if the corporal punishment constitutes an aggravated battery, the parent would not be exempt under the Act.

C. Female Genital Mutilation.

The proscription against female genital mutilation found in § 16-5-27 does not apply to procedures performed by or under the direction of a physician, a registered professional nurse, a certified nurse midwife, or a licensed practical nurse when necessary to preserve the physical health of the female. Also, this proscription does not apply to any autopsy or limited dissection as defined by § 45-16-21.

Consent of the minor female or of her parent, guardian, or custodian is not a defense to the offense of female genital mutilation. Moreover, religion, ritual, custom, or standard practice is not a defense to this offense.

VII. Punishment

A. Simple Battery

Simple battery is a misdemeanor punishable under the general misdemeanor statute. However, simple battery is punishable as a misdemeanor of a high and aggravated nature when it is committed (1) against an elder person or a pregnant female; (2) in a public transit vehicle or station; (3) against a police officer, law enforcement dog, correction officer, or detention officer engaged in carrying out official duties; (4) between family members; (5) against a person who is admitted to or receiving services from a health care facility for disabled adults or elder persons; (6) against a sports official while he is officiating an amateur contest or while he is on or exiting the property where he will officiate or has completed officiating an amateur contest; or (7) against a public school employee engaged in official duties or on school property.

A.1. Battery of Unborn Child

Battery of an unborn child is a misdemeanor punishable under the general misdemeanor statute.

B. Battery

Battery is a misdemeanor punishable under the general misdemeanor statute. Upon the second conviction for battery against the same victim, the defendant is punishable by imprisonment for not less than ten days nor more than 12 months, by a fine not to exceed $1,000, or both. Upon a third or subsequent conviction for battery against the same victim, the defendant is guilty of a felony punishable by imprisonment for not less than one nor more than five years. A person convicted of a second or subsequent offense of battery shall have his notice of conviction and photograph published in the legal organ of the county where he resides or where he was convicted.

A battery committed in a public transit vehicle or station, against a pregnant female, against an elder person, or against a sports official is punishable as a misdemeanor of a high and aggravated nature. A battery committed against a teacher or other school personnel, engaged in the performance of official duties or while on school property, is felony punishable by imprisonment for not less than one nor more than five years or by a fine of not more than $10,000, or both. Finally, a battery committed against a person who is admitted to or receiving services from a health care facility for disabled adults or elder persons is a felony punishable by imprisonment for not less than one nor more than five years or by a fine of not more than $2,000, or both.

C. Family Violence Battery

Upon a first conviction of family violence battery, the defendant will be guilty of and punished for a misdemeanor. Upon a second or subsequent conviction of family violence battery against the same or another victim, the defendant will be guilty of a felony and will be punished by imprisonment for not less than one nor more than five years. Moreover, a person convicted of a second or subsequent offense of family violence battery shall have his notice of conviction and photograph published in the legal organ of the county where he resides or where he was convicted.

With respect to conviction under recidivist statutes, the law recognizes that a nolo plea can constitute proof of a prior conviction. Thus, a trial court's consideration of a defendant's previous nolo contendere plea to the offense of battery for the purpose of adjudicating him guilty of felony family violence battery would not be error.

D. Aggravated Battery

Aggravated battery is normally a felony punishable by imprisonment for not less than one nor more than 20 years. However, an aggravated battery committed between family members is punishable by imprisonment for not less than three nor more than 20 years. An aggravated battery committed against an elder person, in a public transit vehicle or station, or upon a student or teacher or other school personnel within a school safety zone is punishable by imprisonment for not less than five nor more than 20 years. Finally, an aggravated battery committed upon a peace officer or a correctional officer, who is a victim in or on account of the performance of his official duties, is punishable by imprisonment for not less than ten nor more than 20 years.

E. Female Genital Mutilation.

Female genital mutilation is a felony punishable by imprisonment for not less than five nor more than 20 years.

VIII. Double Jeopardy

Although the General Assembly has enacted legislation vesting municipal courts with jurisdiction over various state misdemeanor offenses, it has not done so with respect to simple battery and battery, both state offenses. Because a municipal court lacks jurisdiction over these offenses, any prosecution of the offenses before such court is void and without effect as to a subsequent state court prosecution. The subsequent state court prosecution would not be barred on grounds of double jeopardy.

CRUELTY TO CHILDREN AND RELATED OFFENSES

See also DELINQUENCY, UNRULINESS, OR DEPRIVATION OF MINOR, CONTRIBUTING TO; PARENTAL DISCIPLINE DEFENSE; PARENTS AND CHILDREN, CRIMES RELATING TO.

I. Cruelty to Children

Prior to the 1968 revision of the criminal code, the cruelty to children statute applied to anyone who engaged in certain prohibited acts or omissions directed at a child. The 1968 statute, however, was limited in its application to a "parent, guardian, or other person supervising the welfare of or having immediate charge or custody" of a child under 18. The rationale for limiting the reach of the 1968 statute to individuals having control of the child was that the behavior proscribed by the statute prior to 1968 would be punishable under the general penal provisions relating to causing bodily harm. A special provision was desired, however, to punish a parent or one standing in loco parentis "who might seek to defend against outrageous acts toward a child by taking refuge in the concept of necessary corrective discipline."

In an apparent abandonment of the rationale on which the 1968 statute was based, the cruelty to children statute was amended by the General Assembly in 1978. Subsection (a) of § 16-5-70, which punishes willfully depriving a minor of necessary sustenance so as to jeopardize his health or well-being, still applies only to parents, guardians, or others "supervising the welfare of or having immediate charge or custody" of a minor. Subsection (b), however, now punishes any person who maliciously causes a minor "cruel or excessive physical or mental pain."

The cruelty to children statute was amended again by the General Assembly in 1996 so as to provide for first and second degrees of the offense. The General Assembly added language to subsections (a) and (b) of the statute which classified the offenses defined in those subsections as cruelty to children in the first degree and added a sentence to subsection (b) defining the offense of cruelty to children in the second degree. This sentence was added to protect children from witnessing violent crimes.

In 1999, the General Assembly changed the definition of cruelty to children in the second degree and set out this definition in subsection (c). When the General Assembly amended the statute again in 2004, it redesignated this definition as subsection (d) and reclassified this offense as cruelty to children in the third degree.

In an effort to further protect the well-being of this state's children, the General Assembly in 2004 enacted a child endangerment law. As part of this law, it enacted a new child neglect provision as subsection (c) of the statute and classified this new offense as cruelty to children in the second degree.

For statutes related to the offense of cruelty to children, see §§ 19-15-1 et seq., Child Abuse.

A. Elements

1. Cruelty to Children in the First Degree

As defined in subsections (a) and (b) of § 16-5-70, there are two types of cruelty to children in the first degree: (1) willfully depriving a child of necessary sustenance and (2) maliciously causing a child cruel or excessive physical or mental pain.

a. Willfully Depriving Child of Necessary Sustenance

In order to sustain a conviction of the first type of cruelty, the state must establish that (1) the defendant is a parent, guardian, or other person in charge of the child, (2) the child is under the age of 18, (3) the defendant willfully deprived the child of necessary sustenance, and (4) this deprivation jeopardized the child's health or well-being.

The Georgia Supreme Court in Caby v. State defined "necessary sustenance" as that which supports life. The defendant must be shown to have deprived the victim of "that necessary food and drink which is sufficient to support life and maintain health." Given that construction, the words used in the statute were held by the court not to be unconstitutionally vague. In addition, the Caby decision emphasizes that subsection (a) requires physical harm to the child, not mere neglect.

Whether the deprivation of necessary sustenance was done willfully is an issue for jury resolution.

The denial of necessary and appropriate medical care for a child under 18 years of age can constitute cruelty to a child when it causes the child "cruel or excessive physical or mental pain," but it does not constitute a denial of "sustenance." Being afraid because one might get in trouble is neither justification nor excuse for refusing to obtain medical care for one's injured child.

Where the defendant was indicted only for violation of § 16-5-70(a), the deprivation of necessary sustenance, charging the remainder of the Code section with respect to other offenses for which the defendant was not indicted might constitute reversible error. In such a case, the failure to charge the entire Code section on cruelty to children would not be erroneous.

b. Maliciously Causing Child Cruel or Excessive Physical or Mental Pain

In order to sustain a conviction of the second type of cruelty, the state must establish that (1) the child is under the age of 18, (2) the child suffered physical or mental pain, (3) the pain was cruel or excessive, (4) the defendant caused the pain, and (5) the defendant acted maliciously in doing so. A jury charge that recites the entire statutory definition of this type of cruelty does not constitute reversible error if the jury has also been given an instruction which confines the elements of the crime charged to those material allegations in the indictment.

The determination of what is cruel or excessive physical or mental pain is to be made by the jury. This determination need not depend solely on the victim's testimony.

Since the details of any cruel treatment inflicted on the victim are merely descriptive of the offensive act, it is not necessary that the state prove that the victim was injured in every way set forth in the indictment.

One method of proving the statutory element that the defendant caused cruel or excessive physical or mental pain would be the presentation of evidence that the child exhibited signs of suffering pain. However, evidence of the child's suffering may be unavailable in some cases. For instance, in one case there was expert testimony that the blows inflicted on a child were of such severity that the child was immediately rendered unconscious and was thereby incapable of exhibiting signs of suffering pain. The Georgia Supreme Court, however, held that the presentation of expert testimony that a particular action on the part of the defendant caused a child cruel or excessive physical pain was unnecessary since it was within the ken of the average juror presented with evidence that the child died after being subjected to multiple severe blows to the head by an adult to decide whether that adult caused the child cruel or excessive physical pain. Evidence of the child's age, the extent of her injuries, the nature of the assault to which the child was subjected, and the force with which the child was struck would be sufficient evidence from which a jury, applying generally accepted societal norms, could conclude whether the defendant caused the child cruel or excessive physical pain.

A jury charge on the offense of cruelty to children that includes as elements of the offense the infliction of both physical and mental pain does not constitute error where a jury, applying generally accepted societal norms, could deduce from the evidence that the child who endured a beating from the defendant suffered cruel and excessive mental pain in addition to the physical pain caused by the beating.

An indictment charging a defendant with first degree cruelty to children for unlawfully and maliciously causing cruel and excessive physical pain to the victim by touching his penis would sufficiently contain the elements of the offense intended to be charged and would apprise the defendant of what he must be prepared to meet. While it is true that touching does not necessarily entail pain, it would be clear from such a charge as a whole that the defendant is accused of touching the victim's penis in such a manner as to inflict pain. Such an indictment would not be subject to a special demurrer.

The malice element of the offense imports the absence of justification or excuse and the presence of actual intent to cause the harm produced or the wanton and willful doing of an act with the awareness that it is likely to produce the particular harm. The jury usually determines whether there was malice and such malice can be inferred from circumstantial evidence. There is no requirement that the jury find "actual hatred and ill will" in the heart of the defendant. Malice, for purposes of the statute, can be found on much less than deliberate intent to inflict the cruel act and by less than an abandoned and malignant heart. Where the defendant is charged with maliciously failing to seek medical care for the victim, there is no requirement that the jury find that the defendant had actual knowledge of the victim's specific injuries requiring care. Malice under § 16-5-70(b) does not require actual knowledge of the victim's injuries. The term "malice" is of such obvious significance and common understanding that there is no need to define it in a charge to the jury.

The offense of cruelty to children may be committed by raising a child in such unsanitary conditions that the child suffers cruel or excessive physical or mental pain. However, the basic elements of the offense must be shown by the evidence. Evidence of unsanitary conditions, alone, cannot serve to prove the element of malice in a prosecution for cruelty to children. There must be other evidence which would establish either that the defendant intended to cause harm to the child or that the defendant acted with awareness that such conduct was likely to cause harm.

c. Children Protected by Statute

By their terms, both subsections (a) and (b) of § 16-5-70 are designed to protect "child[ren] under the age of 18." While the statute's language could be construed to protect any person under the age of 18, by use of the word "child" rather than "person," it is arguable that the General Assembly may have been indicating less than total inclusion of all persons under the age of 18. In Collins v. State, a case decided before the statute had an age limit, the Georgia Supreme Court indicated that the cruelty to children statute was designed to protect those who are unable to protect themselves from the cruelty of older people because of their physical immaturity. Arguably, therefore, emancipated or married persons under the age of 18 may not be protected by the current statute. This point has not, however, been addressed by the appellate courts.

d. Corporal Punishment

Section 16-5-70 does not prohibit normal punishment of a child, and has traditionally been construed to provide a substantial amount of discretion in a parent's decision with respect to punishment. Some punishment, however, is simply impermissible as a matter of law. In Davis v. State, for instance, the defendant whipped a two-year-old child with a belt and then placed the child in scalding water as "punishment" for the child's having "violated the terms of toilet training." The court indicated that such treatment of the child could not be justified as punishment.

e. Mother's Voluntary Relinquishment of Newborn Child

The General Assembly enacted the Safe Place for Newborns Act of 2002 in order to prevent injuries to and deaths of newborn children caused by mothers who abandon them. Under this Act, a mother who leaves her newborn child in the physical custody of an employee, agent, or staff member of a medical facility is not subject to prosecution for the crime of cruelty to children. This exemption from prosecution is available only if the newborn child is no more than one week old at the time of relinquishment and only if the mother shows proof of her identity, if available, to the person with whom the newborn is left and provides her name and address.

1.1. Cruelty to Children in the Second Degree

In an effort to further protect the well-being of this state's children, the General Assembly in 2004 enacted a child endangerment law. As part of this law, it enacted a new child neglect provision as subsection (c) of the statute and classified this new offense as cruelty to children in the second degree. At the time of this enactment, Georgia was the only state without a child neglect statute. Without a statute proscribing criminally negligent conduct toward children, prosecutors had a difficult time prosecuting defendants for child neglect. Instead, they had to invoke other provisions of the Code in order to maintain such a prosecution. With the enactment of this new subsection (c), however, prosecutors now clearly have the statutory authority to prosecute defendants for neglecting children.

This new provision provides that a person commits the offense of cruelty to children in the second degree when he with criminal negligence causes a child under the age of 18 cruel or excessive physical or mental pain.

The General Assembly defined criminal negligence as "an act or failure to act which demonstrates a willful, wanton, or reckless disregard for the safety of others who might reasonably be expected to be injured thereby." While this provision certainly could not be used to prosecute a person for merely allowing a child to reside in a dirty house, it could be used to prosecute a person for allowing a child to reside in such unsanitary conditions that the child's health or safety would be endangered. Similarly, someone could not be prosecuted under this provision for failing to have a trigger lock on his gun but could be prosecuted for allowing a child to have access to a loaded gun that the child subsequently used to shoot himself. In both situations, a trier of fact could find criminal liability for willful, wanton, or reckless disregard for the child's safety.

The negligence necessary to constitute a crime is something more than that degree of negligence necessary to authorize recovery in a suit for damages. In construing the involuntary manslaughter statute prior to the 1968 Criminal Code, the Georgia Supreme Court held that "the negligence necessary . . . to constitute a crime is the equivalent of and, in fact, is recklessness . . . . Criminal negligence must be such as shows an indifference to the injurious results of the negligent acts. It must be inconsiderate of others. In order for one to be held to have been indifferent to the safety of others or inconsiderate of their welfare, it must appear that he knew, or that an ordinarily prudent person under similar circumstances would have known, that his act might probably endanger others." This construction would likewise be applicable to the "criminal negligence" requirement in subsection (c) of the cruelty to children statute.

2. Cruelty to Children in the Third Degree

In 1991, a majority of the Georgia Supreme Court held in Hall v. State that where the evidence showed that the defendant's two surviving children were present and witnessed their only brother being murdered by the defendant, the jury was entitled to conclude beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant's two surviving children suffered "cruel and excessive mental pain" and that the defendant maliciously caused this pain by wantonly and willfully shooting his son "with an awareness of a plain and strong likelihood that such harm may result." Thus, the evidence was sufficient to support the defendant's conviction on two counts of cruelty to children.

In dissent, Justice Benham argued that the majority's interpretation of § 16-5-70(b) was overbroad. It was apparent from the language of this provision, Justice Benham argued, that the General Assembly intended to protect children from cruel conduct directed at them. This provision was not enacted to protect children from witnessing a violent crime. Thus, under Justice Benham's interpretation, the defendant's conduct did not constitute cruelty to children.

In 1996, the General Assembly added a sentence to § 16-5-70(b) to provide that "[a] person commits the offense of cruelty to children in the second degree when he intentionally allows a minor to witness the commission of a forcible felony." It appears that this sentence was added in response to Justice Benham's dissent. With this addition, the General Assembly manifested its intent not only to protect children from cruel conduct directed at them but to protect them from witnessing violent crimes as well.

In its enactment of the Crimes Against Family Members Act of 1999, the General Assembly eliminated the definition of cruelty to children in the second degree from subsection (b) and added a new definition of the offense in subsection (c) of the statute. When the General Assembly amended the statute again in 2004, it redesignated this definition as subsection (d) and reclassified this offense as cruelty to children in the third degree. Under the current definition, cruelty to children in the third degree is committed when the primary aggressor in a domestic dispute (1) intentionally allows a minor to witness the commission of a forcible felony, battery, or family violence battery or (2) commits any of these offenses knowing that a minor is present and sees or hears the act. This definition places the culpability for the offense solely on the primary aggressor in a domestic dispute. Thus, any victim of domestic violence who acts violently in self-defense during the dispute would not be punishable for this offense.

Children who see a battery are not mere witnesses to the crime, rather they are victims under the child cruelty statute. If a defendant knows that more than one child is present and that each child sees the same battery, there is more than one victim, and the defendant may be charged with more than one count of third degree cruelty to children. Moreover, notwithstanding the fact that each of the crimes is predicated on the children seeing the same battery, the crimes do not merge as a matter of fact or law for sentencing purposes.

A claim of self-defense by a victim of domestic violence would negate the essential element of intent if believed by the jury. Thus, where self-defense is the victim's sole defense to a cruelty charge, the trial court's failure to charge on self-defense would be harmful as a matter of law, even absent a request.

B. Reporting Statute; Temporary Protective Custody of Child

Section 19-7-5 is designed to protect children whose health and welfare are adversely affected and threatened by the conduct of those responsible for their care and to aid in the enforcement of § 16-5-70. The statute requires certain individuals who have reasonable cause to believe that a child has been abused to report or cause reports of that abuse to be made. Any other person may make such a report, but is not required to do so. Any person who makes such a report in good faith is immune from civil or criminal liability. Furthermore, a person who is required to report a suspected case of child abuse and who wilfully and knowingly fails to do so is guilty of a misdemeanor.

Although it is the intent of the reporting statute to cause the protective services of the state to be brought to bear on the situation in an effort to prevent further abuses, the state has no constitutional duty to protect a child against further violence. Its failure to do so does not constitute a violation of the Due Process Clause. Also, the reporting statute does not purport to create a private cause of action in tort in favor of a victim of child abuse whose death allegedly resulted from a physician's failure to discover and report the abuse.

A physician who is treating a child may take or retain temporary protective custody of the child without a court order and without parental consent if he has reasonable cause to believe that the child's life or health is in imminent danger as a result of suspected abuse or neglect. Any physician who is acting in good faith and in accordance with acceptable medical practice in the treatment of the child is immune from any civil or criminal liability that might otherwise be incurred or imposed as a result of taking or failing to take any action.

C. Evidentiary Matters

1. Direct Evidence of Mistreatment

a. Sufficiency of Evidence

The eyewitness testimony of a child's mother is sufficient, in and of itself, to support inferences that the accused acted with malice and that his acts caused the child cruel and excessive physical pain.

In Stone v. State the evidence showed the defendant had whipped his 14-year-old daughter for several hours with an ox whip while shouting abusive language, such as "damn you, I intend to kill you." The court noted that while "cruel," "unreasonable," and "malicious" are relative terms, the jury was authorized to find they included this conduct. The court upheld the conviction for cruelty to children even though the child bore no physical marks from the beating, and even though the child herself had testified that her father did not beat her cruelly.

In Messer v. State, the defendant beat a 13-year-old child with boards and poked her with needles so that she could not even remember going to bed. As a result of this treatment, the child required extensive medical care. The Court of Appeals held the evidence was sufficient to sustain a conviction for assault with intent to murder. It seems clear, that such evidence would, therefore, be sufficient to affirm a conviction for the lesser offense of cruelty to children.

In Remine v. State, the evidence established that the defendant beat his seven-year-old son with a metal studded belt for a period of 15 to 20 minutes as punishment for perceived misbehavior, inflicting severe bruises on his lower back, buttocks and legs. Photographs of the bruises were presented to the jury, and a police officer and a protective services worker testified as to the severity of the bruises. The court held that from this evidence the jury could have concluded that the defendant was guilty of cruelty to children.

In Weeks v. State, the victim testified that the defendant burned him with cigarettes. Photographs of the small circular sores corroborated this assertion. Even though a physician tentatively diagnosed the lesions as impetigo, that physician discredited the innocent explanation of poison ivy as the cause. The court held that this evidence was sufficient to authorize the jury's verdict that the defendant was guilty of cruelty to children.

In Glenn v. State, the evidence showed that the defendant caused her seven-year-old son to experience the physical and mental pain associated with forced anal sodomy so that she could obtain drugs from a dealer. The court held that the evidence was sufficient to support a conviction for cruelty to children.

In Mitchell v. State, the evidence showed that the defendant disciplined his eight-year-old son for bed wetting by forcing him to sit naked in a bathtub filled with very hot water and bleach (or some other caustic chemical) to wash his soiled bed linens. The child suffered severe burns to his feet, buttocks, and knuckles, which went untreated for five days. The court held that the evidence was sufficient to sustain the defendant's conviction.

In Boyce v. State, the evidence showed that the mother, who was later convicted of shooting her not quite two-year-old son, accused her daughter of the shooting from the outset. The court held that the mother's blaming of the little girl for such a violent act against a loved one which resulted in the girl manifesting observable psychological pathology could have authorized the jury to conclude that the mother inflicted on her daughter mental pain which was unreasonably cruel or excessive.

b. Admissibility of Evidence

In cruelty to children prosecutions, the direct evidence of mistreatment is often highly prejudicial. To the extent the evidence is offered for the sole purpose of arousing the passion or prejudice of the jury, it should be excluded. The scope of such a rule is, however, necessarily limited, because the prosecution must be given an opportunity to prove its case. To the extent the abuse was gruesome, the evidence will necessarily be equally gruesome. In Lister v. State, for example, the state offered photographs of the child's corpse. It was asserted that the admission of such pictures was inflammatory and irrelevant. The court held, however, that the state could properly introduce the photographs for the purpose of showing rope marks, bruises, and the denial of necessary sustenance. In Harmon v. State, the state exhibited the victim to the jury. The defendant asserted on appeal that the victim's physical presence had no probative value. The court disagreed. The victim had been shaken violently and choked by the defendant and as a result of her injuries, the victim was severely retarded, had cerebral palsy, and was permanently blind. The court held that the jury's observation of the victim could have either confirmed or contradicted the testimony regarding her condition.

In a § 16-5-70 prosecution tried in federal court under the Assimilative Crimes Act, which provides that crimes committed on federal reservations are tried in federal court under the relevant state criminal provisions, the district court had to decide whether evidence concerning the battered child syndrome was admissible. The battered child syndrome refers to a pattern of injuries which indicates that they were caused by intentional parental action rather than by accident. Relying on cases in other jurisdictions, the trial court admitted this evidence and was affirmed on appeal.

Where witnesses are qualified as experts in the field of child abuse and their testimony concerns the physical extent of the beatings, such evidence is relevant to the issue of excessive physical pain, an essential element of the crime of cruelty to children. However, where it is not beyond the ken of the average juror to determine from the evidence whether the defendant has caused the child excessive physical or mental pain, it is not permissible to present expert opinion testimony to the effect that the child has in fact suffered excessive physical pain and emotional abuse.

Expert testimony describing possible future trauma of children who have witnessed the murder of a sibling by a parent is admissible to counter an anticipated defense contention that, because the children exhibit no overt manifestations of trauma, they have not experienced cruel and excessive mental pain.

Expert testimony on the battered child syndrome is admissible to demonstrate that a child's fatal injuries were the result of an intentional act by someone, and not an accident. However, expert testimony that the childhood maltreatment syndrome or abused child syndrome was the "manner" in which the fatal injuries occurred, and that the fatal injuries occurred "in the process" of the childhood maltreatment syndrome is not admissible, since such testimony constitutes an opinion that the fatal injuries in fact resulted from child abuse, a conclusion that jurors would have the ability to reach for themselves.

Expert testimony, based on the expert's experience, that the type of injury sustained by the victim resembled those that she had seen before which were not accidental has been held admissible. Such testimony does not infringe upon the jury's role in deciding the ultimate issue.

An expert's testimony that the results of her professional observations and testing of the victim were "consistent with a child who has been . . . abused" has been held to be within the bounds of permissible expert testimony.

An expert may testify that a two-year-old child would not be physically capable of lifting a four-month-old baby out of a crib and throwing him on the floor because such a conclusion requires a specialized knowledge of the development and motor skills of infants and children that would be beyond the knowledge of the average juror.

Even though a treating physician may not be able to identify the specific cause of the child's injury, he may be versed enough to eliminate the defendant's theory as contraindicated. In Mitchell v. State, the court held that the trial court did not err in allowing the treating physician to rule out diaper rash as the cause of the child's buttocks burns, even though he could not identify which particular agent caused the burns.

A demonstration conducted by an expert witness in conjunction with his testimony as a means of illustrating the type of shaking involved in shaken infant syndrome is admissible. A showing of similarity in head and neck strength, control, and movement between the doll used in the demonstration and the real infant is not required as part of the foundation. While there should be substantial and reasonable similarity between the facts proved in the case and the facts upon which the demonstration is based, the facts need not be identical. If the doll and infant are sufficiently similar to assist the jury in considering the issue of how injuries of the type suffered in the case can result from violent shaking, the foundation is sufficient. Any dissimilarity between the conditions of the demonstration and the actual occurrence affects the weight rather than the admissibility of the evidence.

Where a witness has extensive experience and training with respect to fatal child abuse and specifically shaken baby syndrome, that background would be sufficient to allow the witness to give expert testimony regarding her professional evaluation of the victim's symptoms. The fact that she does not hold a medical degree would go only to the weight the jury may give her testimony.

2. Circumstantial Evidence of Mistreatment

The issue in Polk v. State, was whether there was sufficient circumstantial evidence to find that the injuries inflicted on a child occurred in Georgia. At the time of arrest in Brooks County, the child had fresh blood on its mouth and nose, indicating that some injury had been inflicted. Additionally, the defendant, the child's mother, displayed a complete lack of concern for the child and failed to get any aid. The court held that constituted sufficient circumstantial evidence that the cruel treatment occurred. While the precise issue before the Polk court was whether a crime had been committed in Georgia, as opposed to whether a crime had been committed at all, the case gives an indication of the type of circumstantial evidence the court will look to in a cruelty to children case. A cruelty to children conviction clearly can be sustained solely on the basis of circumstantial evidence.

In Morris v. State, the victim, the two-and-one-half-year-old son of the woman with whom the defendant was living, was brought to a hospital with bruises on his face, back, extremities, and buttocks. The court found the circumstantial evidence sufficient to have authorized the jury to believe the testimony of the doctors rather than that of the defendant regarding the nature of the injuries, and that the testimony would support an inference of malice. Moreover, given that the defendant admitted he was the only one present when the injuries occurred, the jury would have been authorized to infer as well that the defendant caused the injuries.

In King v. State, the victim, the defendant's 15-month-old son, died as a result of a blunt head trauma resulting in a skull fracture. The defendant testified that the child was well when he awoke on the morning in question and that the only persons present in the apartment that day were herself, her three-year-old son and the victim. There was evidence that the defendant told a neighbor that the child "fell and bumped his head." The results of the post mortem examination revealed a four-inch fracture in the thickest area of the skull, and a substantial area of bruising on the left side of the scalp. The medical examiner testified that such injuries could not result from a fall of one or two feet, but would require the force of an unbraced fall onto a concrete surface from a height of at least ten feet. The autopsy also showed a previous fracture of the left thigh bone and that the child suffered from failure to thrive. The court held that the evidence, although circumstantial, was sufficient to support the defendant's felony murder conviction, based on the underlying felony of cruelty to children. In Powell v. State, the evidence showed that the defendant cared for the two-month-old baby while her mother worked in the evenings. The baby had suffered nine fractured ribs, a fractured shin bone, retinal hemorrhages, swelling of the brain, and bleeding inside her head from two separate incidents of abuse. The pathologist testified that the cause of death was head injuries due to the shaken baby syndrome. His opinion was that the most recent incident would have been immediately apparent to any observer and occurred within two hours of her receiving medical attention. The court concluded that a rational trier of fact could have found the defendant guilty of felony murder and cruelty to children.

In Hooker v. State, the defendant was convicted of cruelty to children based on an incident which occurred while the defendant was changing the victim's diaper. At the next diaper changing, the victim was found to have a one-half centimeter bruise on the head of his penis. The examining physician opined that the injury was caused by a discrete blunt force, a pinching action, and that it was unlikely a child of the victim's age could have mustered sufficient force to create the bruise. The court concluded that the jury rationally could have found that the evidence excluded every reasonable hypothesis except that of the defendant's guilt.

In Harris v. State, the court found that there was ample evidence from which any rational trier of fact could have found beyond a reasonable doubt that the child's injuries were not accidental and that the defendant was guilty of cruelty to children. The burn marks on the child were inconsistent with the theory that the grease had been spilt or dripped on the child from above. Also, the child had more than 20 whip marks on his inner thighs, buttocks, and near his perineum. The defendant admitted that she got mad about her son constantly "messing in his diaper" and that she usually just "pop[s] him with her hand."

In Johnson v. State, the court concluded that the evidence was insufficient to support the defendant's conviction for felony murder, with cruelty to children being the underlying felony, in connection with the bludgeoning death of his infant nephew who was upstairs in the apartment with his mother and her boyfriend. No direct evidence was introduced at trial to establish that the defendant acted with malicious intent toward the baby or caused the baby to suffer physical pain. Nor was there any circumstantial evidence from which the jury could infer that the defendant mistreated the baby. It was shown only that the defendant was present in the apartment on the night of the murder, denied having committed the murder, called 911, and failed to assist in the police investigation.

3. Testimony or Statements of Child

Prior to 1989, the victim's testimony might have been inadmissible because the child was unable to understand the nature of an oath. Now, the competency statute permits child victims who do not understand the nature of an oath to testify and have their credibility judged by the jury. Under this statute, although a child is subject to a competency challenge on the ground that he does not have the use of reason, a child is not incompetent as a matter of law because of his infancy. This statute, however, does not expand the circumstances under which hearsay statements of a child may be admitted in evidence.

Because of the close relationship which often exists between the defendant and the victim in a cruelty to children prosecution, the direct testimony of the victim is often suspect. In Stone v. State, for example, the court upheld a cruelty to children conviction despite the testimony of the 14-year-old victim that her father had not cruelly beaten her. The court discounted such testimony indicating it was probably influenced by the child's fear of her father.

A child's declarations at the time of the incident are often admissible through testimony of another witness as exceptions to the hearsay rule, if they are part of the "res gestae." The res gestae includes excited utterances, declarations of physical feelings, and declarations concerning state of mind and motive.

Under the patient history exception to the hearsay rule, a victim's statements to a licensed professional counselor about being abused by the defendant are admissible. However, because these statements are hearsay, the defendant would be unable to attack the victim's credibility on cross-examination. Therefore, the defendant must be given the opportunity to introduce, without invoking the Child Hearsay Statute, the victim's prior inconsistent statements solely to impeach those statements admitted under the patient history exception.

Prior to 1995, the Child Hearsay Statute provided an exception to the hearsay rule only for statements concerning acts of physical abuse performed on the child making the statement. Thus, the Georgia Supreme Court held that the out-of-court statements of a child who observed the physical abuse of another child, but who was not himself a victim of such abuse, was not admissible as an exception to the hearsay rule under the statute. In 1995, the General Assembly amended the Child Hearsay Statute apparently in response to this holding to provide that statements made by a child concerning the physical abuse of another child which was performed in his presence are admissible as an exception to the hearsay rule. In 1998, however, the Georgia Supreme Court struck down this amendment because it found that it created disparate classes of identically-situated criminal defendants in violation of the Equal Protection Clauses of the state and federal constitutions. The 1995 amendment created a disparity in the substantive evidence admissible against criminal defendants charged with identical acts of physical abuse, based on nothing more than the age of the hearsay declarant. If the declarant were under the age of 14, more evidence would have been admissible against the defendant than if the declarant were over that age. The court found no rational basis for the disparity created by the amended statute. Since the court has struck down this amendment as unconstitutional, it cannot be used as a basis for admitting a child's statements as a witness to physical abuse committed in his presence. However, if the statements are merely cumulative of other evidence of the physical abuse, their admission does not constitute reversible error. Because the statute allows statements only from a victim of physical abuse, it would be inapplicable as a ground for admitting statements from a victim of mental cruelty. However, the statements of such a victim may be admitted as part of the res gestae.

Testimony concerning the techniques used in a videotaped interview of the victim involves an area of expertise beyond the ken of the average layman and, therefore, the defendant in a cruelty to children case is entitled to introduce expert testimony for the limited purpose of providing the jury with information about proper techniques for interviewing children and whether the interviewing techniques actually utilized were proper. The fact that this testimony indirectly involves the child's credibility does not render it inadmissible.

For a discussion of the Child Hearsay Statute and other related statutes, see SEXUAL OFFENSES AGAINST CHILDREN, IV. CHILD HEARSAY STATUTE.

4. Similar Offenses or Prior Difficulties

Where evidence is proffered showing similar offenses committed by the defendant against the same victim, the evidence is admissible to show motive, intent, plan, identity, bent of mind, or course of conduct.

Evidence of prior instances of neglect or abuse of the victim may be admitted as rebuttal evidence for impeachment purposes. The failure to comply with the notice requirements of Uniform Superior Court Rule 31.3 does not render such evidence inadmissible.

The defendant's prior cruel acts toward the victim are admissible as evidence demonstrating motive, intent, or bent of mind toward the victim, thereby establishing a logical, probative connection between the crime charged and the prior difficulty. Since Uniform Superior Court Rule 31.3 is not applicable to occurrences categorized as prior difficulties between the defendant and the victim, the failure to comply with the notice requirements of this rule does not render this evidence inadmissible. However, the admission of this evidence must be accompanied by an instruction from the trial court explaining the limited use to which the jury may put this evidence.

5. Defendant's Impaired Perception

Where the defendant's sole defense is that she suffered from a psychological condition that impaired her knowledge and perception of the abuse her spouse was inflicting on her child, expert testimony would be admissible to show that the defendant was not aware of the signs and symptoms of the abuse, even though a normally perceptive person would have been aware of it. This evidence would be admissible, just as evidence of a vision impairment or other sensory difficulty would be admissible, not as evidence of diminished capacity but as evidence of impaired perception. Learned sources from the expert's profession and the expert's psychological testing and interview of the defendant can serve as the factual basis for this testimony. It need not be based on evidence of any childhood abuse administered to the defendant. Furthermore, this testimony would be admissible even though it would go to the ultimate issue of whether the defendant had knowledge of her spouse's abuse, because the jury would have no way of reaching a conclusion on this issue without it.

D. Relationship to Other Offenses

Important Notice about Repudiation of Actual or Same Evidence Test: The Georgia Supreme Court repudiated the actual evidence test in Drinkard v. Walker, 281 Ga. 211, 636 S.E.2d 530 (2006), because it found this test to be inconsistent with the statutory framework governing the prohibition against multiple convictions for included offenses in Georgia. This inconsistency resulted in years of confusion and unpredictable results. In its place, the court adopted the required evidence test and overruled any prior case law that is inconsistent with it. Thus, any prior case law applying the actual evidence test is no longer controlling and should not be relied upon to determine whether one offense is included in another under § 16-1-6(1). The discussion of such case law is included below only insofar as it may still be applicable to pending prosecutions that arose before the Drinkard decision. See MULTIPLE CONVICTIONS, II. Tests to Determine Presence of Multiple Convictions, for a complete discussion of the Drinkard decision.

Aggravated assault is committed when one assaults another with intent to murder, rape, or rob, or assaults with a deadly weapon; cruelty to children is committed when one maliciously causes a child cruel or excessive pain. Depending on the allegations and proof in a particular case, therefore, cruelty to children is sometimes a lesser included offense of aggravated assault. In Williams v. State, the defendant, a babysitter, allegedly whipped a child fiercely after tying her hands and feet to a bed. The court upheld the conviction, holding that under the facts of the case cruelty to children was a lesser included offense of aggravated assault, the crime for which the defendant had been indicted.

It is clear that simple battery can be a lesser included offense of cruelty to children. But it must be clear that the evidence in the case can support a finding of simple battery. Thus, in Newton v. State, the court held that it was not error to fail to charge on simple battery. The defendant denied the allegations in the indictment and testified that the injuries to the child resulted from accident. On this evidence, therefore, the jury would have been authorized either to find the defendant guilty of the offense of cruelty to children or find him not guilty on the basis of accident. Under no view of the evidence would a conviction for simple battery have been authorized. It should be noted that if the defense is, for example, a claim that excessive pain or deprivation had not been shown, an instruction on simple battery would be authorized.

If the facts alleged in the indictment and the evidence presented at trial to establish the charged offense of cruelty to children are sufficient to establish the lesser included offense of battery as well, it is not error for the trial court to charge the jury on the offense of battery.

Where there is evidence that the defendant intended his actions and intended to cause pain, he would not be entitled to a charge on reckless conduct as a lesser included offense of cruelty to children in the first degree. Moreover, where the evidence shows either the commission of cruelty to children as charged, or the commission of no offense, the trial court is not required to charge the jury on the lesser included offense of reckless conduct.

Cruelty to children, but not aggravated battery, requires proof that the victim was a child under the age of 18 who was caused cruel or excessive physical or mental pain. Aggravated battery, but not cruelty to children, requires proof that the victim was deprived of a member of his body or that such member was rendered useless or seriously disfigured. Therefore, each crime requires proof of at least one additional element which the other does not. Furthermore, the two crimes are not so closely related that multiple convictions are prohibited under other provisions of §§ 16-1-6 and 16-1-7. Accordingly, even if the same conduct establishes the commission of both aggravated battery and cruelty to children, the two crimes do not merge. Moreover, when the evidence establishes that the victim was subjected to multiple injuries in addition to the injury supporting an aggravated battery conviction, these additional injuries would support a cruelty to children conviction and the trial court's failure to merge the two offenses would not be erroneous.

Where the offense constituting cruelty to children is based upon and committed in a way different from the offenses of child molestation and assault with intent to rape and is not satisfied by the introduction of the same evidence, there is no merger and the trial court may enter a separate conviction on cruelty to children.

Where the evidence demonstrates that cruelty to children and sexual battery counts are supported by separate facts, the two offenses do not merge as a matter of fact.

The offense of cruelty to children is separate and distinct from the offense of rape as a matter of fact, where the evidence used to established cruelty to children is not used to establish the rape.

Since the offense of cruelty to children requires the proof of at least one fact, the age of the victim, in addition to the facts used to establish the offense of malice murder, the offense of cruelty to children is not included as a matter of fact in the offense of malice murder.

Because malice murder does not include all of the essential elements of the offense of cruelty to children, the latter is not an included offense of malice murder, and a conviction for cruelty to children would not be authorized under a malice murder count of an indictment. It follows that the refusal to give a requested charge on cruelty to children as an included offense of malice murder would not be error.

While a conviction for cruelty to children may be authorized as an included offense of felony murder, if the defendant is convicted of malice murder, the erroneous failure to charge cruelty to children as an included offense of felony murder would be harmless.

Even if a jury finds a defendant guilty of the involuntary manslaughter of a child, a trial court would not be required to direct a verdict of acquittal on a cruelty to children charge. The two verdicts could indeed be consistent because the jury could have found from the evidence that the defendant maliciously caused the child excessive pain and that his actions caused the child's death, but that he may not have intended to kill the child.

Where two sequential but entirely different acts of cruelty have been committed against the same victim, a conviction and sentence for each would be authorized.

Even if the offenses of cruelty to children and contributing to the deprivation of a minor are based on similar facts, they have differing elements, and each requires proof of a fact not required to prove the other. Thus, the two offenses do not merge, and the jury would be authorized to find the defendant guilty of both.

E. Statute of Limitations

In 1987, the General Assembly amended § 17-3-1(c) by extending the limitations period for felonies against victims under 14 years of age from four to seven years. The age limitation of 14 years, however, was inconsistent with the age of majority specified in § 16-5-70(a) and (b). This inconsistency created disparate classes of identically-situated criminal defendants in violation of the Equal Protection Clauses of the state and federal constitutions. It created a disparity in the limitation periods applicable to identical felonies based on nothing more than the age of the victim. For instance, if a victim of first degree cruelty to children were under the age of 14, the limitations period for the prosecution against the defendant would have been seven years, rather than four years had the victim been over that age. Although identically-situated, a defendant committing the offense against a victim under the age of 14 would have had the disadvantage of a longer limitations period for his crime than a defendant committing the same offense against an older victim. There was no apparent rational basis for this disparate treatment of identically-situated defendants.

In order to cure § 17-3-1(c)'s constitutional infirmity and to eliminate this disparate treatment, the 2002 General Assembly increased the age limitation for the seven-year limitation period from 14 to 18 years of age. The increased age limitation in this provision is now consistent with the age of majority specified in § 16-5-70(a) and (b). Thus, all offenses of cruelty to children in the first degree are subject to the same seven-year limitation period for acts occurring on or after July 1, 2002. The four-year limitation period is no longer applicable to such acts occurring on or after that date.

At trial, the date of the offense need not be proved with preciseness, but only that it occurred during the period of limitations. It may be established by circumstantial evidence.

The state is not restricted to proving that the offense occurred on the date alleged in the indictment when the indictment does not specifically allege that the date of the offense is material.

F. Punishment

Cruelty to children in the first degree, according to § 16-5-70(e)(1), is a felony punishable by imprisonment for not less than five nor more than 20 years.

Cruelty to children in the second degree, according to § 16-5-70(e)(2), is a felony punishable by imprisonment for not less than one nor more than ten years.

Cruelty to children in the third degree, according to § 16-5-70(e)(3), is punishable as a misdemeanor upon the first or second conviction. A third or subsequent offense is a felony punishable by a fine not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000 or imprisonment for not less than one year nor more than three years or punishable by both fine and imprisonment.

A defendant's continuing neglect, that is, his causing excessive physical or mental pain by failing to procure medical treatment for a child during a four-day period, cannot be punished as separate units of prosecution under § 16-5-70(b). Without evidence of a legislative intent to allow multiple punishments for the same course of conduct, acts that constitute a continuing criminal course of conduct are not punishable separately. Thus, the defendant's criminal conduct would constitute a single course of conduct spanning four days, not a separate offense for each day. In such a case, the four counts of cruelty to children should be merged for sentencing purposes.

II. Tattooing Body of Person Under Age of 18

It is unlawful for any unauthorized person to tattoo the body of any person under the age of 18. This offense is punishable as a misdemeanor.

III. Piercing Body of Person Under Age of 18

It is unlawful for any person to pierce the body, with the exception of the ear lobes, of any person under the age of 18 for the purpose of allowing the insertion of earrings, jewelry, or similar objects into the body, unless the prior written consent of a custodial parent or guardian is obtained. This prohibition does not apply if (1) the piercer has been furnished with proper identification showing that the individual is 18 years of age or older and (2) the piercer reasonably believes the individual to be 18 years of age or older. This offense is punishable as a misdemeanor.

IV. Reckless Abandonment of Child Under Age of One Year

A parent, guardian, or other person supervising the welfare of or having immediate charge or custody of a child under the age of one year commits the offense of reckless abandonment of a child when the person willfully and voluntarily physically abandons the child with the intention of severing all parental or custodial duties and responsibilities to the child and leaving the child in a condition which results in the death of the child. Reckless abandonment of a child is a felony punishable by imprisonment for not less than ten nor more than 25 years.

Where one leaves a child in a condition which results in the child's death, such act is to be accounted as the efficient, proximate cause of the death whenever it is made to appear that the act materially contributed to or accelerated the cause of death. In In Interest of B. L. M., a 15-year-old juvenile gave birth to a baby girl at her home. She placed the baby in a trash bag and placed the bag with the garbage on the porch. After the baby was discovered by the juvenile's mother, it was taken to the hospital where it died four days later. The pathologist who participated in the autopsy on the baby testified that the baby had numerous health problems. However, he consistently testified that the cause of death was a combination of the baby's prematurity and its exposure to the elements, and that he could not separate those two factors. The Court of Appeals held that although the baby's exposure was not the sole proximate cause of death, the trial court was authorized to find that it materially contributed to or accelerated the cause of death. Accordingly, the trial court was authorized to find that the juvenile's actions legally resulted in the baby's death.

V. Child Endangerment: Manufacturing Methamphetamine or Possessing Chemical Substance with Intent to Manufacture Methamphetamine in Presence of Child

In an effort to further protect the well-being of this state's children, the General Assembly in 2004 enacted a child endangerment law. As part of this law, it enacted § 16-5-73 to prohibit the manufacture of methamphetamine in the presence of children.

Any person who intentionally causes or permits a child under the age of 18 years to be present where he is manufacturing methamphetamine or possessing a chemical substance with the intent to manufacture methamphetamine is guilty of a felony punishable by imprisonment for not less than two nor more than 15 years.

If the child receives serious injury as a result of this offense, the person is guilty of a felony punishable by imprisonment for not less than five nor more than 20 years.

DEFENSE OF PROPERTY AND HABITATION

I. Generally

The use or threatened use of force to protect nonhabitation property is justified when and to the extent that the actor reasonably believes that it is necessary to prevent a trespass on or other tortious or criminal interference with real or personal property lawfully in the possession of the actor or a member of his immediate family or belonging to one whose property he is under a legal duty to protect. The use of deadly force to protect nonhabitation property, however, is not justified unless the actor reasonably believes it is necessary in order to prevent a forcible felony. In the context of the defense of property, the law of Georgia appears to conform generally to the principles followed in the majority of American jurisdictions.

This defense is not available to a spouse attempting to recover personal property taken by his estranged spouse. Under our current theft statutes, one spouse can never be guilty of the theft of property of the other spouse. Accordingly, where an estranged spouse takes personal property from the lawful possession of the other spouse, such conduct is neither tortious nor criminal interference within the meaning of the statute defining the defense, and therefore, the other spouse would not be justified in using force to regain possession of his personal property.

Where the defendant has failed to establish the defense of nonhabitation property as his sole defense, the trial court's failure to charge the jury sua sponte on this defense would not be erroneous.

The use or threatened use of force to protect a habitation is justified when and to the extent that the actor reasonably believes that it is necessary to prevent or terminate an unlawful entry into or attack upon a habitation. The use of deadly force to protect a habitation, however, is not justified unless (1) the actor reasonably believes that an entry that is made in a violent and tumultuous manner is attempted or made for the purpose of assaulting or offering personal violence to any person dwelling or being therein and that such force is necessary to prevent the assault or offer of personal violence; or (2) the actor, knowing or having reason to believe that an unlawful and forcible entry of his residence has occurred, uses that force against an intruder who is neither a family nor household member; or (3) the actor reasonably believes that the entry is made or attempted for the purpose of committing a felony therein and that such force is necessary to prevent the commission of the felony. The lack of limiting language in items (1) and (3) above similar to the language in item (2) that expressly excludes application of the habitation defense between family and household members shows that the General Assembly intended the habitation defense as outlined in items (1) and (3) to apply between co-inhabitants.

If the jury is to determine correctly whether a defendant's justification defense is authorized because he was defending himself against the use of unlawful force by a homeowner, it needs to know the law which authorizes a homeowner to use force to defend his home. Under these circumstances, a charge on the defense of habitation can be given even though that defense is not asserted by the defendant.

Defense of habitation is not available where there is no evidence that the victim was attempting to enter or attack a habitation when he was injured.

II. Lawful Possession

The first limitation on the use of force in the defense of property is the requirement of lawful possession of the property by the actor or a member of his family, or the existence of a legal duty on the actor's part to protect the property. This limitation, set forth in § 16-3-24, may permit the use of force in more situations than the rule in many jurisdictions, in that it allows the use of force to defend the property of another, not a member of the actor's family, to whom the actor owes a legal duty to protect his property.

The Georgia courts do not appear to have considered the existence of possession or legal duty either before or since the enactment of the 1968 criminal code, but § 16-3-24 is sufficiently clear on this point that it should raise few questions. The § 16-3-24 requirement of possession of the defended property can be contrasted with § 16-3-23 which deals with defense of habitation. The latter section contains no requirement that the habitation defended be that of the actor or of someone in a special relationship to him. Presumably, then, one is justified in using force to protect the habitation of a stranger to the same extent as in the case of one's own home. The courts have not addressed this aspect of § 16-3-23.

III. Deadly Force

A. Defense of Property

The major limitation on the use of force in the defense of property is the rule against using deadly force (that which is intended or likely to cause death or great bodily harm) to protect nonhabitation property where there is no apparent need to use such force to prevent a forcible felony. It is this limitation, formerly a part of the justifiable homicide statutes, which has received the most attention from the courts. An early case held that a killing to prevent the taking of a small amount of meat would be justified if the taking amounted to robbery, a felony "by violence or surprise" but the court seemed more concerned with the doctrine of voluntary manslaughter occasioned by provocation arousing an uncontrollable passion.

This rather broad justification for the use of deadly force in the defense of property was put in doubt by a later holding that one is never justified in killing to effect the recapture of stolen property, even if the original theft had been a felony, and by cases stating that to justify the use of deadly force, the injury threatened by the victim must be grave or severe, whether the threatened harm is to person or to property. This ambiguity in the description of the rule in this situation reflects the fact that permitting the use of deadly force in the defense of property raises significant policy questions concerning the conflict between property rights and personal rights: it can be argued persuasively that, although his act is unlawful, a thief ought not by his act be seen to forfeit his right to live.

The present requirement of a threatened forcible felony to justify the use of deadly force seems to balance properly these interests, restricting the use of deadly force to those situations in which personal safety is endangered. It should be noted that § 16-3-24 does not require a belief that the forcible felony is to be committed against the actor. Thus, the actor could justify his use of force to protect a spouse's property because of the threat of a forcible felony against the spouse.

B. Defense of Habitation

The use of deadly force in the defense of a habitation is less restricted than it is in the defense of other property. Prior to 2001, a resident's use of deadly force against an intruder was justified under two conditions: (1) if the resident reasonably believed that a violent and tumultuous entry was made for the purpose of assaulting or offering violence to a person within the residence or (2) if the resident reasonably believed that the entry was made for the purpose of committing a felony therein. The resident had to be acting under a reasonable belief that the deadly force was necessary to thwart the attack or felony in order for his actions to be justified. However, because home invasions generally are unexpected and often occur too quickly for a resident to make a reasonable decision about using deadly force, the General Assembly added a third condition to § 16-3-23 in 2001 in order to permit a resident's use of deadly force against an intruder without having to satisfy either of the two reasonableness requirements. Now, the justification for a resident's use of deadly force against an intruder can be based on the resident's mere knowledge or belief that the entry was unlawful and forcible. This amendment, of course, makes it "easier" for a resident to use deadly force because it contains no reasonableness requirement. "Essentially, homeowners can shoot first and ask questions later." This defense, however, is not available when the deadly force is used against a family or household member. Nor is the defense available when the deadly force is used against a unarmed neighbor who, after leaving the resident's home as instructed, tumultuously reenters it.

The lack of limiting language in § 16-3-23(1) and (3) similar to the language in subsection (2) that expressly excludes application of the habitation defense between family and household members shows that the General Assembly intended the habitation defense as outlined in subsections (1) and (3) to apply between co-inhabitants.

Section 16-3-23 seems to dispel some of the confusion that prevailed in this area prior to 1968. A number of cases decided under the prior law, which was a part of the law of justifiable homicide, were concerned with the question of whether the intended harm protected against had to be a felony in order to justify the use of deadly force. A complicated and somewhat confusing structure of rules was thus developed. For instance, if two or more persons sought entry into a habitation "in a riotous and tumultuous manner," manifestly intending to inflict serious injury upon the person of someone therein, the use of deadly force to repel the entry was justified, although the intended injury might not have amounted to a felony. If only one person sought unlawful entry, however, or if entry was sought in a manner not "riotous and tumultuous," a manifest intent to commit a felony had to be shown, unless the defender first unsuccessfully attempted to prevent entry by persuasion or other gentle means.

Because a resident awakened in the middle of the night by a stranger forcing entry into his home is unlikely to bear all of these factors in mind in deciding whether to respond with deadly force, the present law introduces a welcome simplicity to the defense of habitation, which should accord better with the expectations of the public. In the ordinary situation of a resident being awakened by stirrings in the night, there can be no doubt of a reasonable belief that a felony is in progress.

For purposes of § 16-3-23, a person's habitation can be a particular space in a jointly-occupied dwelling provided that the person has obtained the right to occupy that space and exclude any co-inhabitants therefrom. While this right can be obtained by clear agreement, the fact that a person sometimes locked herself in the master bedroom in the weeks preceding her shooting of the victim would be insufficient to establish a clear agreement between herself and the victim that the victim could not enter the bedroom. Under these circumstances, the bedroom would not constitute a habitation and breaking down the bedroom door would not constitute an unlawful entry into or attack upon a habitation. Accordingly, a jury charge on the defense of habitation would not be authorized.

C. Retreat Rule, No Duty to

In Johnson v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court observed that although the Code was silent as to the duty to retreat in self-defense cases, under the common law, a defendant claiming self-defense had no duty to retreat if he was not the aggressor. The General Assembly finally codified this common law principle when it enacted § 16-3-23.1 in 2006. This Code section provides that any person who uses threats or force in accordance with the law relating to self-defense, defense of habitation, or defense of property other than a habitation has no duty to retreat and has the right to stand his ground and use force, including deadly force.

IV. Unlawful Entry

For the defense of habitation to be applicable, it is essential that the entry defended against be unlawful. Thus, where a police officer investigating a wife-beating complaint was threatened with a shotgun if he entered the house, the denial of defendant's motion for a directed verdict of not guilty of aggravated assault was proper, as there was evidence from which a jury could find that the officer was making a lawful entry. Furthermore, the "mere fact that an arrest by an officer may be unlawful, without more, does not authorize the killing of the arresting officer." Also, where the defendant and his victim are married to each other (either by ceremonial or common law marriage), the defense is unavailable, presumably on the ground that the victim's entry is lawful. Similarly, the right to defend one's home from unlawful entry does not authorize the defendant to defend against an invited visitor who becomes unruly. If the entry was unlawful, however, the right to defend the habitation does not disappear once entry is gained, and if the necessity of force remains apparent, its use is justified.

The Georgia cases are silent on the question of whether one may use deadly force to resist dispossession of his home, as apparently are the cases from other jurisdictions. In the realm of non-deadly force, however, a landlord in Georgia enjoys no special status permitting him forcible entry. Thus, where a landlady went to her tenant's trailer to demand more rent and tried to force her way in, and the tenant slammed the trailer door on her fingers and threw water on her, the tenant's conviction by a judge without a jury of simple battery was reversed.

The general rule in most jurisdictions is that, just as one is not privileged to use deadly force in defense of property where there is no danger to persons involved, so one may not use a deadly trap or spring gun to defend his property from theft. In Bishop v. State, the defendant was found guilty of malice murder where an acquaintance of the defendant died as a result of wounds received from the defendant's spring gun or trap gun set up in the defendant's trailer. The court held that the use of deadly force to protect a habitation is justified only when the inhabitant "reasonably believes" the entry is made for the purpose of committing a felony. However, it was impossible for the defendant to form a reasonable belief in light of his absence from the trailer. Also, the courts have imposed civil liability for such conduct where a trespasser is injured, even if the trespasser is a thief. In the more recent of these cases, the court of appeals indicated that the defendant might be guilty of murder or manslaughter, but the issue was not squarely presented by a civil action for wrongful death.

V. Hot Pursuit

It is generally recognized that one may use force to regain possession of property wrongfully taken if done immediately after the taking or while in hot pursuit. No recent cases have addressed this issue, but early Georgia cases support this proposition, with the caveat that deadly force may never be used to effect recapture. While there is nothing in the current statutes that specifically authorizes such hot pursuit recapture, § 16-3-24 does specifically cover personal property and such hot pursuit recapture would certainly be aimed at the termination of the continuing trespass. As for a possible argument that once the taking had taken place the actor was no longer in possession, the court could very well find that possession had not moved to the wrongdoer, but only custody, with legal possession remaining in the wronged actor.

VI. Use of Force Against Property

The use of force in defense of property was applied in a relatively unusual setting. In State v. Moore, the defendant had been accustomed to using a driveway across the property of another for a number of years. When he was told by the other party that he could no longer use the driveway, he consulted an attorney and concluded that he had obtained a private way by prescription. The owner of the land across which the driveway ran also consulted an attorney, then constructed a chain link fence around his property, secured by a padlocked gate.

When the defendant ran his truck into the gate to open it, he was charged with criminal damage to property and convicted of criminal trespass. On appeal, the defendant claimed that the refusal of the trial judge to instruct the jury on § 16-3-24 was error. The trial court's refusal to instruct was apparently based on the section's language which authorizes the use of force "against another." The trial judge interpreted this to mean against the person of another. The court of appeals reversed, indicating that the defendant would be entitled to an acquittal if the jury was convinced that the defendant was acting under a reasonable belief that this was needed to protect his property in the prescriptive easement.

The Georgia Supreme Court, however, reversed the court of appeals and affirmed the conviction, relying on the criminal code definition of "another" as "person or persons other than the accused." While the supreme court did not mention it, additional support for its decision could be drawn from the requirement of § 16-3-24 that the property be in the defendant's possession. The notion of a prescriptive right being in a defendant's possession is hard to conceptualize. It might be argued that Moore reflects a strange ordering of values in that it protects the "victim's" property more than it protects his person. It seems, however, that the determination of such disputes as that in Moore ought to be left to civil litigation, rather than self-help. None of the immediacy which underlies the § 16-3-24 defense is present in Moore.

A different situation, however, might be presented if the use of force was directed at property in the aggressor's immediate possession. For example, if an intruder were entering the defendant's property and the defendant used force against the aggressor's dog which was accompanying him, for the purpose of repelling the trespass, it can be argued that § 16-3-24 would be a permissible defense. If confronted with that kind of situation, the court might be forced to rethink its Moore reliance on the definition of "another" and expand it to property owned by the aggressor. In either the Moore situation or the proposed hypothetical, it can be argued that the general justification defense of § 16-3-20(6) ought to be analyzed for possible applicability.

VII. Burden of Proof

As affirmative defenses, the burden of proof with regard to defense of habitation and defense of property rests upon the state. Thus, once the defendant has introduced enough evidence to raise the possibility of the applicability of § 16-3-23 or § 16-3-24, the state will have the burden of proving the non-existence of these defenses beyond a reasonable doubt.

VIII. Immunity from Civil Liability

A person who is justified in threatening or using force against another under the provisions of § 16-3-23, relating to the use of force in defense of a habitation, or § 16-3-24, relating to the use of force in defense of property other than a habitation, has no duty to retreat from the use of such force and is not liable to the person against whom the use of force was justified or to any person acting as an accomplice or assistant to such person in any civil action brought as a result of the threat or use of such force.

IX. Immunity from Criminal Prosecution

A person who uses threats or force in defense of a habitation or property other than a habitation or in accordance with the no duty to retreat rule is immune from criminal prosecution unless in the use of deadly force that person utilizes a weapon the carrying or possession of which is unlawful.

This statute must be construed to bar criminal proceedings against persons who use force under the circumstances set forth in § 16-3-23 or § 16-3-24. Further, as the statute provides that such person "shall be immune from criminal prosecution," the decision as to whether a person is immune under § 16-3-24.2 must be determined by the trial court before the trial of that person commences.

A convicted felon in possession of a weapon may not as a matter of law benefit from the pretrial immunity outlined in § 16-3-24.2.

As a potential bar to criminal proceedings which must be determined prior to a trial, immunity represents a far greater right than any encompassed by an affirmative defense, which may be asserted during trial but cannot stop a trial altogether. To avoid trial, a defendant bears the burden of showing that he is entitled to immunity under § 16-3-24.2 by a preponderance of the evidence. If a defendant cannot meet his burden of proving immunity prior to trial, he may nonetheless pursue an affirmative defense at trial, even though the affirmative defense may be based on the same statutory provision underlying a prior immunity motion. In this instance, the well-established burden of proof for affirmative defenses would be applicable during trial.

DISORDERLY CONDUCT CRIMES

See also CRIMINAL DEFAMATION; HARASSING PHONE CALLS; LOITERING OR PROWLING; TERRORISTIC THREATS AND ACTS; WEARING MASKS.

I. Generally

Disorderly conduct has been described as a petty offense chiefly against public order and decency. Whether conduct will violate a disorderly conduct statute will depend not only on the nature of the act and the accompanying mens rea, but also on the surrounding circumstances.

The offenses discussed below are grouped into categories generally along the lines of the evil which the statutes seek to avoid.

II. Disorderly Conduct Which Involves or Threatens Mob or Group Violence

A. Riot

A riot is defined by § 16-11-30 as a combination of two or more persons performing "an unlawful act of violence or any other act in a violent or tumultuous manner." Because the offense of rioting has undergone very little change since its initial codification in 1861, pre-1968 case law is helpful in understanding the meaning and coverage of the current statute.

The crime of riot has three elements: (1) a shared intent among two or more people (2) to do an unlawful act of violence or some other act in a violent and tumultuous manner and (3) a concert of action in furtherance of such an intent. Because these elements must coalesce, if only one of the rioters has the requisite intent, or if only one of the rioters acts in furtherance of the intent, there is no riot.

When proving the existence of a shared intent, it should be noted that it is not necessary to prove independently the existence of a previous plot or conspiracy on the part of the rioters. Rather, both a shared intent and a concert of action may be inferred from the manner in which the unlawful act of violence is committed. Because cooperation and joint action are required, however, two people fighting against each other does not constitute a riot.

The requirement of an intent to engage in an act of violence precludes a conviction for rioting upon proof that the defendant merely engaged in noisy or tumultuous behavior. The courts have, however, held that "violent behavior" short of a violent act is a sufficient act for riot. Therefore, people gathered together who commit no overt acts of violence but do commit some other act which is calculated to bring about a breach of the peace or to terrify people were held guilty of the offense of riot. This act was held to be violent and tumultuous conduct within the meaning of the statute.

A criminal riot does not require chaos or bedlam, notwithstanding the common connotation of the term "riot." For example, there was found to be sufficient evidence to support riot convictions when the defendants threatened their father, when the defendants chased their fishing partner and hurled objects at him, and when the defendants beat another person, giving him a bloody nose.

Because riot is a crime which involves multiple offenders, certain procedural guidelines must be noted. Section 17-8-4 adopts the traditional approach with regard to the severability of trials for joint offenders by providing for discretionary severance. If severance is granted and separate trials held, the acquittal or conviction of one party to the offense does not operate as an acquittal or conviction of others not tried even though joint action and the concurrence of two or more persons are required. On the other hand, if several persons were indicted and tried together for a riot and the proof showed the guilt of only one, all must be acquitted because the required multiplicity of action is missing. One may be convicted, however, even if his co-indictee has been exonerated if the indictment names persons unknown as co-rioters.

Rioting is a misdemeanor punishable under the general misdemeanor statute.

B. Inciting to Riot

Encouraging others to riot is also a crime. Section 16-11-31 punishes one who, with the intent to riot, advises or urges others to riot under circumstances which create a clear and present danger of a riot. This section covers intentional inciteful acts or conduct aimed at one's opponents as well as one's supporters.

The "clear and present danger" requirement in the statute was an obvious attempt to codify the First Amendment constitutional requirements for punishment of inciteful speech as they stood at the time of codification in 1968. However, the "clear and present danger" language has been interpreted in conformity with the most recent United States Supreme Court reformulation of the constitutional standard. In 1993, the Georgia Supreme Court applied this standard in Land v. State and held that since the defendant's conduct constituted inciting to riot and the evidence showed that a riot was imminent, the defendant's speech was not afforded any constitutional protection.

Inciting to riot is a misdemeanor punishable under the general misdemeanor statute.

C. Affray

Under § 16-11-32, the misdemeanor of affray has three elements. They are: (1) two or more people intentionally fighting (2) in a public place and (3) to the disturbance of the public tranquility.

The requirement that the people intentionally fight shields one from an affray conviction if his automatic reflexes would cause him to push back that which is about to destroy him. That is, for an assailant to be guilty of affray, he must be a "willing participant" in the conflict, as opposed to being the victim of an assault exercising the right of self-defense. Thus, the Court of Appeals vacated a conviction when the evidence showed that the "victim" was actually the aggressor and had approached the defendant in a menacing manner with a pool cue.

In order to find a violation of § 16-11-32, it must be shown that two willing participants engaged in a fight. Because both participants must have entered into the fight willingly and intentionally, the defense of one will inure to the benefit of the other. Thus, if the evidence shows that one of the two participants in a fight acted entirely in self-defense, while the other participant was the aggressor, neither is guilty of an affray. The Georgia Supreme Court has further held that the fight must include physical harm, so that an affray may not be committed by words alone.

The second element of affray is that the fight occur in a public place. "Public place" is defined by the criminal code as a "place where the conduct involved may reasonably be expected to be viewed by people other than members of the actor's family or household." The full meaning and import of the term "public place" for purposes of the statute has yet to be addressed by the Georgia Supreme Court.

The third element of affray is that the acts must tend to breach the peace and public tranquility. It is hard to envision what independent relevance this element has. It will invariably be satisfied if the other elements are met.

Where both participants are charged with affray, the successful defense of one of the participants operates as an acquittal of the other.

The fact that an aggravated assault took place in the context of an affray does not require the trial court to charge the jury on affray, where the indictment charged the defendant with aggravated assault. Affray, as statutorily defined, is not a lesser included offense of aggravated assault or even simple battery.

Ultimate Fighting matches encompass boxing, kick boxing, or contact karate. Under certain circumstances, the participants in an Ultimate Fighting match held in a public place and not regulated by the state boxing commission may be charged with the offense of affray.

D. Unlawful Assembly

Section 16-11-33 proscribes two separate types of unlawful assembly. Both are misdemeanors punishable under the general misdemeanor statute, § 17-10-3. The first type occurs when two or more persons assemble for the purpose of committing an unlawful act and fail to withdraw from the assembly upon a lawful command by a peace officer and before any member of the assembly has inflicted injury to the person or property of another. This type of unlawful assembly is in the nature of attempted riot. The second type occurs when two or more persons assemble, without authority of law, for the purpose of doing violence to the person or property of one supposed by the accused to be guilty of a violation of the law, or for the purpose of exercising correctional or regulative powers over any person by violence. This type of unlawful assembly can best be described as a lynch mob offense.

It should be noted that there is an affirmative defense of withdrawal. The defendant is not guilty if he withdraws either at any time before injury is inflicted or in response to a lawful order by a peace officer. The latter provision would indicate that an order to withdraw which was obeyed would be a defense even if the order came after injuries had been inflicted, as the defenses are written in the disjunctive, rather than the conjunctive.

Inasmuch as the proscriptions of § 16-11-33 are limited to assemblies which have an unlawful or violent purpose, § 16-11-33 would most likely withstand a First Amendment challenge.

On the facts of a particular case, unlawful assembly may be a lesser included offense of obstruction of a public passage.

No conviction for unlawful assembly may be had where the accused (or, indeed, any member of the assembled group) is also convicted of a completed crime against the person or property of another, where that completed crime was the purpose of the assembly. Thus, in Kerr v. State, the court held that because the defendants were properly convicted of criminal trespass, their convictions for unlawful assembly for the purpose of committing criminal trespass merged into the criminal trespass convictions.

E. Refusal to Disperse

Section 16-10-30 makes it a misdemeanor for a person in a gathering to refuse to obey the reasonable official request or order of a peace officer or firefighter to move, for the purpose of promoting the public safety by dispersing those gathered in dangerous proximity to a fire or other emergency.

F. Obstruction of Highways, Streets, Sidewalks, or Public Passages

It is a misdemeanor to obstruct purposely or recklessly any public passageway so that the passage is rendered impassable without unreasonable inconvenience or hazard. Liability does not attach, however, until the person so obstructing the passageway fails or refuses to cease the obstruction after receiving a reasonable official request or an order of a peace officer to do so.

In 1990 and 1991, two cases concerning the violation of this statute by abortion protesters were decided. In McMonagle v. State, the court held that a public passage that is temporarily barricaded by the police, that is not completely closed off to public access, and that is still usable and is used by the public does not cease to be a public passage so that in effect it cannot be protected from criminal obstruction. The court also held that the refusal of protestors to remove themselves after warning and their going "limp" and playing "dead" constitutes obstruction under the statute. Thus, anyone who exhorts protestors to go "limp" would be guilty of obstruction as a party to the crime. In Hoover v. State, the court held that an abortion conducted in compliance with the law would not constitute "imminent use of unlawful force" so as to justify the defendants' obstruction of a public passage during an abortion protest.

On the facts of a particular case, unlawful assembly may be a lesser included offense of obstruction of a public passage.

G. Criminal Interference with Government Property

Section 16-7-24(b) makes it a misdemeanor to forcibly interfere with or to obstruct the passage into or from government property. This statute is designed to replace pre-1968 GCA § 26-5502, which made it a misdemeanor to picket or demonstrate in a riotous manner on, around, or adjacent to state property.

III. Disorderly Conduct Which Involves Public Disturbance

A. Public Disturbance

"A person who recklessly or knowingly commits any act which may reasonably be expected to prevent or disrupt a lawful meeting, gathering, or procession is guilty of a misdemeanor." The crux of this offense is the creation of a public disturbance.

In State v. Fielden, the Georgia Supreme Court held that the language of § 16-11-34(a) is not unconstitutionally vague. Rather, it is clear and unambiguous. Reading the provision according to the natural and obvious import of its language, the court concluded that it provides a sufficiently definite warning to a person of ordinary intelligence of the prohibited conduct and further that it is not susceptible to arbitrary and discriminatory enforcement.

The court held, however, that § 16-11-34(a) is unconstitutionally overbroad because it stifles expression or conduct that is otherwise protected by the federal constitution. Under the literal language of the provision, any recklessly or knowingly committed act that could reasonably be expected to prevent or disrupt a lawful meeting, gathering or procession is a misdemeanor, regardless where it is committed, how trivial the act, its impact, or the intent of the actor other than the intent to commit the act itself. This provision thus applies to the reckless or knowing commission of such acts as heckling a referee at a sports venue, leaving on the audible ringer of a cellphone during a business symposium, changing lanes into a funeral procession on a rainy day, even playing the stereo loudly in an apartment while a neighbor hosts a dinner party. These examples demonstrate that the literal language of § 16-11-34(a) reaches conduct that is at once innocent and protected by the guarantees of free speech, thereby affecting and chilling constitutionally protected activity. Based on this analysis of the statutory language in § 16-11-34(a), the court concluded that it significantly impacts constitutionally permitted conduct without the requisite narrow specificity and fails to balance in a reasonable way the First Amendment rights of those desiring to express opposing points of view. Accordingly, the court found its overbreadth to be both real and substantial. Finding that curing the overbreadth in § 16-11-34(a) would be less a matter of reasonable judicial construction than a matter of substantial legislative revision, the court found that it lacked the authority to rewrite the provision to avoid its constitutional infirmities.

A paradigmatic case under § 16-11-34(a) is Washington v. State, where the defendants were protesting students whose conduct was held to be a public disturbance because the noise they created disrupted normal classroom activities. The conduct in question was singing and shouting which was considered to be a disturbance because it could not easily be ignored. The court indicated that if the conduct prosecuted had been merely the organizing activity, it would not in itself constitute a disturbance cognizable under the statute. The court implicitly found that students attending classes in the school to be a gathering or meeting, for clearly it was not a procession.

The Washington convictions were upheld based on circumstantial evidence connecting the disturbance to the defendants. While noting that the evidence was sharply conflicting, the court relied heavily on the testimony of the school principal that the singing and shouting appeared to emanate from the center of the group, where the defendants were situated. The court distinguished Tinker v. Des Moines Community School District, where the Supreme Court of the United States found a school protest to be constitutionally immune from disciplinary action on the basis of the non-disruptive nature of the silent protest at issue in Tinker.

A violation of § 16-11-34 was found to exist in Porter v. State where the defendants' conduct disrupted an ongoing church service. The defendants' conduct consisted of yelling, laughing, mocking and mimicking the service. Additionally, two co-participants who did not appeal their convictions brought copperhead snakes into the church. (Snake handling was not a part of the church service.) Under the foregoing circumstances, the Court of Appeals held that the evidence demonstrated that the behavior had a "disconcerting and disturbing effect" on the congregants and was sufficient to support the convictions.

Section 16-11-34 does not affect the powers which have been delegated to counties or to municipal corporations to pass ordinances to punish disorderly conduct within their jurisdiction. Where a municipality charges the defendant by using merely the words "disorderly conduct," it cannot be ascertained whether he is charged with the state offense or with a local ordinance; consequently, the charge against the defendant is too vague and indefinite to apprise him of the offense he allegedly committed.

B. Disruption of Senate or House of Representatives

Section 16-11-34.1 makes it unlawful for a person to recklessly and knowingly prevent or disrupt a session or meeting of the Senate or House of Representatives or any of its committees. It is unlawful to enter, occupy, or remain in the state capitol building or related buildings while one is in possession of a deadly weapon. It is unlawful to purposely and recklessly obstruct any passageway in Capitol Square. It is unlawful to willfully and knowingly without authorization enter or remain upon the floor or in any adjacent area of the Senate or House. It is unlawful to parade, demonstrate, or picket in the state capitol or its related buildings with intent to disrupt.

The first violation of § 16-11-34.1 is a misdemeanor. A second violation is a misdemeanor of a high and aggravated nature. A third or any subsequent violation is a felony punishable by imprisonment for not less than one nor more than three years.

B1. Disruption of Funeral or Memorial Services

1. Legislative Intent

In 2006, the General Assembly declared that the interest of persons in planning, participating in, and attending a funeral or memorial service for a deceased relative or loved one without unwanted impediment, disruption, disturbance, or interference was a substantial interest. The General Assembly further recognized the need to impose content neutral time, place, and manner restrictions on unwanted acts carried out with the intent to impede, disrupt, disturb, or interfere with such funeral or memorial service. In order to implement these restrictions, the General Assembly enacted § 16-11-34.2.

2. Prohibited Conduct

Under § 16-11-34.2, it is unlawful to engage in any disorderly or disruptive conduct with the intent to impede, disrupt, disturb, or interfere with the orderly conduct of any funeral or memorial service or with the normal activities and functions carried on in the facilities or buildings where the funeral or memorial service is taking place. Any or all of the following constitutes such disorderly or disruptive conduct:

(1) Displaying any visual images that convey fighting words or actual or imminent threats of harm directed to any person or property associated with the funeral or memorial service within 500 feet of the ceremonial site or location being used for the service at any time one hour prior to, during, or one hour after the posted time for the service;

(2) Uttering loud, threatening, or abusive language or singing, chanting, whistling, or yelling with or without noise amplification including, but not limited to, bullhorns, automobile horns, and microphones, such as would tend to impede, disrupt, disturb, or interfere with a funeral or memorial service within 500 feet of the ceremonial site or location being used for the service;

(3) Attempting to block or blocking pedestrian or vehicular access to the ceremonial site or location being used for a funeral or memorial service at any time one hour prior to, during, or one hour after the posted time for the service; or

(4) Conducting a public assembly, parade, demonstration, or other like event, either fixed or processional, within 500 feet of the ceremonial site or location being used for a funeral or memorial service at any time one hour prior to, during, or one hour after the posted time for the service.

3. Punishment

The disruption of a funeral or memorial is punishable a misdemeanor under the general misdemeanor statute.

C. Disruption of Activities of School Campus or Facility

Apparently in the wake of campus disorders, the General Assembly enacted § 16-11-35 in 1972. This Code section makes it a misdemeanor of a high and aggravated nature for a person, who is not a student or school employee, to enter a school campus or facility and fail to leave as directed by an administrative officer when it reasonably appears to the officer that the person is committing an act likely to interfere with the peaceful conduct of school activities or that the person has entered the campus or facility for the purpose of committing a disruptive act. The person must receive an order to leave from the school's chief administrative officer or his designee and must fail to leave before he is guilty of violating § 16-11-35.

The elements of this offense are almost identical to those for criminal trespass. Despite this similarity, the statutes defining the two offenses are not conflicting but coexist in harmony. The criminal trespass statute protects school campuses from unauthorized use, and § 16-11-35 protects school activities from unauthorized disruption. With the enactment of § 16-11-35, the General Assembly did not intend to exempt school campuses from the ambit of the criminal trespass statute. In other words, it did not intend that the act of remaining on school campuses for other than authorized educational purposes be criminalized only in the event that such presence also coincides with the commission or intent to commit "any act likely to interfere with the peaceful conduct of the activities of the campus." Thus, a defendant may be found to have violated the public property interest protected by the criminal trespass statute, regardless of the fact that his unauthorized activities may have posed no threat to the otherwise peaceful conduct of educational activities protected by § 16-11-35.

D. Public Drunkenness

The offense of public drunkenness is committed when an individual appears in an intoxicated condition in any public place and makes his intoxicated condition known by boisterousness, by indecent condition or act, or by vulgar, profane, loud, or unbecoming language. The requisites of § 16-11-41 are classically illustrated by the case of Moore v. State. In Moore, the defendant was discovered, uninvited, in the driveway of a private residence. The defendant's intoxicated condition was manifested by her blowing the horn of her automobile and by playing the radio at a high volume. Additionally, the defendant resisted police assistance, and was belligerent, using abusive and obscene language. The conviction was affirmed.

Merely appearing in public in a drunken condition does not violate § 16-11-41, because the public drunkenness statute is designed as a protection against the drunkard's conduct and not his mere presence. Consequently, drunkenness manifested by extreme stupor or a deep sleep is not a violation of state law. Thus, an individual who had "passed out" on the bench of an eating establishment with a partially empty fifth of liquor beside him, who was unsteady on his feet, and whose speech was slurred when he spoke was not guilty of public drunkenness. Likewise, a conviction would not be authorized where the evidence demonstrated only that the defendant had pulled off the road in his car and slept therein.

A conviction for public drunkenness is unauthorized where it appears that the defendant, although drunk, was not voluntarily in a public place. Involuntary presence would mean that the defendant had not committed the requisite actus reus. Thus, one cannot be removed by police officers or by anybody else from a place which is not a public place within the purview of the statute, be involuntarily placed in a public place, and then be convicted of public drunkenness.

Section 16-11-41 does not affect the powers delegated to counties or to municipal corporations to pass ordinances to punish drunkenness or disorderly conduct within their respective limits. The Court of Appeals has held that a city ordinance which is more restrictive than § 16-11-41 can withstand a challenge based on preemption by the state law so long as the municipal offense has some essential ingredient not an element of the state offense or the municipal offense lacks some element essential to the state offense. The Court of Appeals has also held that the prosecution must prove the existence of the public drunkenness ordinance in order to establish what acts constituted a violation of the ordinance.

Public drunkenness is not, as a matter of fact or law, a lesser included offense of driving under the influence of alcohol to the extent it is less safe to drive.

IV. Disorderly House Kept for Encouragement of Misbehavior or Common Disturbance of Neighborhood

A. Elements

Under § 16-11-44, one who keeps and maintains a disorderly house is guilty of a misdemeanor, punishable under the general misdemeanor statute, § 17-10-3. There are two elements to the crime: (1) the defendant must keep and maintain the house; and (2) the house must be a common, ill-governed, and disorderly establishment kept for the encouragement of gaming, drinking, or other misbehavior or kept in such a manner as to cause the common disturbance of the neighborhood or orderly citizens.

B. Keeps and Maintains

The defendant must be shown to be responsible for the keeping and maintaining of the dwelling in question; consequently, being a mere visitor to a disorderly house is not sufficient. A problem arises, however, when the dwelling is occupied by more than one person. If a family unit is involved, the courts have held that the violator is the head of the household unless he can produce evidence to the contrary. Traditionally, a husband's mere presence in the household was sufficient to establish him as its head even if his wife paid the rent. In light of the United States Supreme Court's decision in Orr v. Orr and the later repeal of Georgia's "head of the household" law, there is no longer a presumption that the male is the head of the household.

When the occupants of a dwelling are not members of the same immediate family, the state must show that the defendant is connected with the illicit activity; merely being an occupant of the quarters in which illicit activities transpire is insufficient. It would appear that the prosecution must show either knowledge of or active participation in the proscribed activity.

So far as § 16-11-44 proscribes the maintenance of a house to the encouragement of gambling or drinking on a general, customary or habitual basis, one of ordinary intelligence is given fair notice of what conduct is prohibited; and this section does not encourage arbitrary and erratic arrests and convictions.

C. Disorderly House

A disorderly house has been defined as "a house in which people abide or to which they resort to the disturbance of the neighborhood or for purposes which are injurious to the public morals, health, convenience, or safety."

In Fanning v. State the court reversed the defendant's conviction because there was no evidence the house was disorderly, even though a substantial amount of liquor was discovered on the premises. Quoting from Palfus v. State the court indicated that to be disorderly, a house must as a normal matter, as opposed to merely occasionally, be noisy, and the disturbance thus caused must be of a general nature, as opposed to merely disturbing one or two people. The court also indicated that merely being a tippling house is insufficient to sustain a conviction for disorderly house based on the phrase "injurious to the public morals, health, convenience or safety." This conception of what a "disorderly house" is was reaffirmed in the case of Clare v. State. In Clare, the court indicated that the defendant's apartment could not qualify as a disorderly house based on the noise emanating from it when the evidence failed to show a regular course of noisiness, or even that the defendant was particularly noisy on this occasion.

The type of proof necessary to prove a house is disorderly based on the phrase "to the common disturbance of the neighborhood" should be contrasted to the type required when the disorderly character is attributable because conduct within the house is alleged to be injurious to the public morality. The latter situation was at issue in Martin v. State. The primary issue on appeal was whether the character of a house may be proved by introducing evidence as to the reputation of the house. Approving this method of proof, the court indicated that under the public morality portion of the disorderly house proscription a house may be found to be disorderly, even if it is operated in a quiet manner, if it operates for purposes which are injurious to the public morality. In Martin, the defendant was apparently operating a bordello.

This interpretation of conduct punishable as contributing to a disorderly house was reiterated in Birdwell v. State. In Birdwell the court indicated "the charge of keeping and maintaining . . . a disorderly house to encourage idleness, gaming, drinking 'or other misbehavior,' may be shown by proof of repeated immoral acts of fornication and adultery committed therein with the knowledge and approval of defendant."

A building open to the public may constitute a disorderly house if the nature of the activity engaged therein tends to produce turmoil. For example, an ice-cream parlor which was the site of much drinking, dancing, fighting and loud cursing was considered to be a disorderly house, as was a restaurant which sold beer and wine, had a nickelodeon and was the scene of frequent arrests of drunken men.

V. Disorderly Conduct Statute

A. Generally

Prior to 1995, § 16-11-39 prohibited (1) the unprovoked use of "fighting words," (2) the unprovoked use of obscene and vulgar or profane language before a person under the age of 14, (3) engaging in indecent or disorderly conduct in a public place, and (4) the making of harassing phone calls.

When the General Assembly rewrote this statute in 1995, it retained the two provisions prohibiting the use of "fighting words" and the use of obscene and vulgar or profane language. It eliminated the provision prohibiting indecent or disorderly conduct, which was held to be unconstitutionally vague by the Georgia Supreme Court in 1990, and added two provisions which now clearly define the conduct that is prohibited under the statute, i.e., acts committed in a violent or tumultuous manner toward another person. The General Assembly also eliminated from the statute the provision prohibiting the making of harassing phone calls but enacted a new statute which now prohibits this offense.

B. Violent or Tumultuous Acts

Prior to 1995, former paragraph (3) of § 16-11-39 punished anyone who engaged in "indecent or disorderly conduct in the presence of another in any public place." The statute was totally silent as to the definition of "indecent or disorderly conduct." In 1990, the Georgia Supreme Court held that because the statute failed to define in any manner what was meant by indecent or disorderly conduct, it did not provide fair warning to persons of ordinary intelligence as to what it prohibited so that they might act accordingly, and it was thus too vague to justify the imposition of criminal punishment for its violation.

In 1995, when the General Assembly rewrote § 16-11-39, it eliminated the vague language of former paragraph (3) and added two provisions which now clearly define what acts constitute disorderly conduct and should provide fair warning as to what acts are prohibited under the statute. Section 16-11-39(a)(1) and (2) provide that one commits the offense of disorderly conduct when he (1) acts in a violent or tumultuous manner toward another person whereby that person is placed in reasonable fear of the safety of his life, limb, or health; or (2) acts in a violent or tumultuous manner toward another person whereby the property of that person is placed in danger of being damaged or destroyed.

C. Fighting Words

Section 16-11-39(a)(3) provides that one commits the offense of disorderly conduct when he uses "fighting words" without provocation in another's presence. These words can be either aimed at or descriptive of the listener in order to be proscribed by the statute. Obscene and vulgar or profane words do not constitute "fighting words" unless those words are also "opprobrious or abusive." It is important to note that actual response by the "victim" is not an element of the offense. Thus, if "fighting words" were used, they are punishable as soon as uttered, even though there is no response.

Specific threats to cause violence can constitute "fighting words" where they tend to provoke violent resentment. Moreover, the circumstances surrounding the incident are relevant to determine whether the defendant's statements were sufficient to incite the victim to take offensive action. Although the circumstances surrounding the utterance of the words can be crucial, circumstances cannot change harmless words into "fighting words."

Section 16-11-39(a)(3) was amended in 1974 in response to the United States Supreme Court's decision in the case of Gooding v. Wilson. The statute at issue in Gooding was similar to the pre-1974 version of § 16-11-39(a)(3), prohibiting the use of opprobrious words or abusive language tending to cause a breach of the peace. In Gooding, the United States Supreme Court, relying on Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire, held that the statute violated the First Amendment. In Chaplinsky, the Supreme Court had held that the First Amendment prohibits the states from punishing an individual for using certain words under a statute which is neither carefully drawn nor authoritatively construed to punish only unprotected speech, i.e., "fighting words." The Court defined "fighting words" as words which men of common intelligence would understand to be words likely to cause an average addressee to fight. Section 16-11-39(a)(3) was amended in 1974 to reflect that decision and is therefore limited by its terms to "fighting words."

The Georgia Court of Appeals in Brooks v. State applied the "fighting words" test in order to find that there was probable cause to arrest the defendant for violation of the opprobrious language statute where he called a policeman a dog in front of a crowd of 100 to 200 people. The Model Penal Code takes the position that "fighting words" directed at a police officer which might cause a personal disturbance on the part of the officer, but not a general disturbance, should not be punished. This, however, reflects a policy decision rather than a rule of constitutional law.

In 1914, the Georgia Court of Appeals in Elmore v. State rejected an argument similar to that adopted by the Model Penal Code. In Elmore the Court of Appeals was responding to the contention that a conviction should not lie for using "opprobrious words or abusive language 'tending to cause a breach of the peace' "if the language is directed at a police officer because a police officer cannot legally respond to vile language by assaulting one in his custody; therefore, the words cannot have a "tendency to cause a breach of peace." The court responded to this argument by indicating that it is perhaps because a police officer cannot respond with force that he should be legally protected from such verbal assault.

In another case, Bolden v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals specifically rejected the position that a different standard should be used when opprobrious and abusive language is directed toward a police officer. The court observed that § 16-11-39(a)(3) makes no distinction based on the target of the utterance. The actus reus is committed when language is used which would be "fighting words" if evaluated against a reasonable person standard, regardless of the response or lack of response by the target of the utterance.

While this is true, the court has distinguished between opprobrious language used while under lawful arrest, and similar language used as "remonstrance against an illegal arrest." In Scott v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals reversed the defendant's conviction for violating § 16-11-39 holding that "[o]pprobrious words heard only by the arresting officer and used in remonstrance to an illegal arrest do not constitute a violation of Code Ann. § 26-2610 [O.C.G.A. § 16-11-39]." Presumably, if others heard the language, that would alter the result.

Section 16-11-39(a)(3) requires the language used to be "without provocation." Because this is an element of the offense, the burden is upon the state to show lack of provocation. Whether the provocation proved is sufficient to justify the use of opprobrious words or abusive language is normally a jury question. Truth is not, however, a legal provocation for the use of opprobrious words.

In Shuler v. State, the defendant was indicted for simple battery and cruelty to children but was convicted only for the offense of using "fighting words." The defendant contended that the use of opprobrious language tending to incite a breach of peace was not a lesser included offense of cruelty to children. The court held, however, that the proof tracked the indictment which set forth words the defendant said to a student which would fall within the perimeter of that forbidden by the "fighting words" statute. While not specifically charged with using "fighting words," the defendant was indicted for using language which would tend to incite an immediate breach of the peace. Although the offense may not have been strictly a "lesser included" one within the scope of cruelty to children, the language of the indictment together with the evidence authorized the jury charge on "fighting words."

In Carroll v. State, the court held that "fighting words" was not a lesser included offense of terroristic threats as a matter of law because the crimes have different elements and prohibit generally different types of conduct. Furthermore, under the narrowly drawn indictment charging the defendant with terroristic threats, the trial court did not have the power to interpret the evidence so as to support a jury charge on the separate, unindicted, alternative offense of "fighting words."

D. Obscene and Vulgar or Profane Language

Section 16-11-39(a)(4) provides that one commits the offense of disorderly conduct when he uses, without provocation, "obscene and vulgar or profane language in the presence of or by telephone to a person under the age of 14 years which threatens an immediate breach of the peace."

The use of obscene and vulgar language may properly be subjected to state regulation. Under the current test established by the United States Supreme Court, material is obscene if the average person, applying contemporary community standards, would find that the material, taken as a whole, appeals to the prurient interest. Because "obscenity" is not subject to a very precise definition, what is obscene will vary over both time and space, rendering the precedential value of prior cases suspect. In the past, violations of § 16-11-39(a)(4) or statutes similar to it have been found when the defendant asked an eleven-year-old girl whether she had ever been laid; when the defendant addressed a female by saying, "Come here baby and kiss me, I am going to get into your pants;" when the defendant asked the female, "Will five dollars be enough. Do you want me to show you?;" and when the defendant inquired of one who was not his wife whether she would go to bed with him.

The last case to deal at length with the definition of the phrase "obscene and vulgar or profane language" pre-dated the Supreme Court's decision in Miller v. California. In Breaux v. State, over a strong dissent, the Georgia Supreme Court stated that "[l]anguage is obscene, vulgar or profane when, under the circumstances and manner in which such utterance was made, it would clearly offend a reasonable person's sense of decency." Although it is clear that a state may regulate obscene and profane speech, it is also clear that any such regulation must be pursuant either to a narrowly drawn statute or to a statute which has been authoritatively construed to reach only unprotected speech. The question then becomes whether § 16-11-39(a)(4) is such a statute.

In Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire the Supreme Court indicated that lewd, obscene and profane language is outside of the protection of the First Amendment. That decision, however, was arguably modified by the Supreme Court in Cohen v. California. In Cohen the Court appeared to indicate the language at issue was not subject to punishment because it did not fall into a category of speech which is regulable, i.e., obscenity, "fighting words," or libel. Apparently, conceding the defendant's statement could properly be classified as "offensive," the Cohen Court held that offensiveness was an insufficient ground to punish the defendant. Despite the Court's indication in Cohen that mere offensiveness is insufficient, an offensiveness standard appears to be the rule in Georgia as established in Breaux. As so construed, § 16-11-39(a)(4) is probably susceptible to a successful First Amendment challenge.

The relationship between paragraphs (3) and (4) of § 16-11-39(a) should be noted. Paragraphs (3) and (4) specify separate offenses, and a person may in one transaction so conduct himself as to be guilty of both of these offenses. The fact that the same language supports an element in each offense does not warrant merging of the convictions where other mutually exclusive elements of the offenses remain.

As currently construed under Breaux, paragraph (4) has a considerably broader sweep than paragraph (3). For example, in Rozier v. State the defendant was charged with violating § 16-11-39(a)(3) apparently for saying in the presence of a 16-year-old female and a five-year-old male, "How about some pussy?" The Georgia Court of Appeals reversed the conviction, indicating that "[t]his remark, when considered under the circumstances and in the context in which it was made, did not constitute 'fighting words.' " While the court did not discuss whether the defendant could have been convicted under § 16-11-39(a)(4), presumably, under Breaux, he could have been.

The mere use of obscene and vulgar or profane language does not constitute "fighting words" unless such language is also "opprobrious or abusive." In Crolley v. State, the defendant employed obscene, vulgar, and profane language in the course of venting his anger at one of his employees. However, the language employed by the defendant did not subject the employee to personal epithets or personal abuse. Giving § 16-11-39(a)(3) the required narrow and limited application, the court held that the evidence did not indicate that the defendant's conduct was sufficiently belligerent to incite an immediate breach of the peace. His language could not be fairly characterized as "fighting words" under the circumstances of the case. Accordingly, his conviction was reversed. The court stated, however, that had the employee been under the age of 14 and had the defendant been indicted for a violation of § 16-11-39(a)(4), the evidence might have possibly authorized a conviction.

As is the case with paragraph (3) of § 16-11-39(a), in order to violate paragraph (4) the language used must have been without provocation. Because the apparent intent of paragraph (4) is to protect children from scurrilous epithets, it might seem the provocation exception would apply only when the speaker is provoked by a member of the protected class. The court rejected such an argument in Ray v. State, however, permitting the provocation to come from a third party.

E. Presence Requirement

Paragraphs (3) and (4) of § 16-11-39(a) require the actus reus to occur in the presence of another. "Presence" has been construed to be conterminous with one's ability to hear. The presence requirement is not a strict liability element of the offense, however. Rather the prosecution must show the defendant knew, or that a reasonable person would have known, of the presence of others. This may be proved by circumstantial evidence, including the language the defendant used. Although the courts have never held that the victim must hear the offensive language, in Breaux v. State, the court said that the jury could have found that the victim understood the meaning of the defendant's language. If the victim's understanding of the language is an element of the offense, it would appear that hearing is likewise an element.

F. Venue

In those instances under § 16-11-39 where communications such as mailing, telegraphing or telephoning are necessary elements of the offense, venue is proper in the county where the "victim" is.

G. Jurisdiction

A state court does have jurisdiction to preside over the trial of the misdemeanor offense of disorderly conduct.

H. Punishment

The offense of disorderly conduct is a misdemeanor and is punishable under the general misdemeanor statute.

I. Disorderly Conduct Ordinances of Counties or Municipalities

Section 16-11-39 does not affect or limit the powers of counties or municipal corporations to adopt ordinances or resolutions prohibiting disorderly conduct within their respective limits.

Neither the trial courts nor the appellate courts may take judicial notice of the provisions of a disorderly conduct ordinance. Where such ordinance is relied upon, it must be pleaded and proved in the trial court. A prosecutor's failure to introduce the ordinance under which the defendant is charged results in a failure of proof, and the evidence would be insufficient as a matter of law to warrant the defendant's conviction for the ordinance violation.

DRUG-RELATED CRIMES

See MOTOR VEHICLE CRIMES; PENAL INSTITUTION CRIMES.

I. Generally

The Georgia Controlled Substances Act was enacted in 1974 at which time the Uniform Narcotic Drug Act was repealed. The Georgia Controlled Substances Act was contained in former GCA Title 79A. With the enactment of the Official Code of Georgia Annotated (O.C.G.A.), the Georgia Controlled Substances Act was incorporated in the criminal code of Georgia, effective November 1, 1982. This Act is now contained in chapter 13 of Title 16 of the O.C.G.A. The Dangerous Drug Act, provisions dealing with the sale or possession of model glue, and other general provisions dealing with drugs were also incorporated in this chapter of the Georgia criminal code.

The statutory framework of the Act will be dealt with first, followed by a brief discussion of related criminal provisions dealing with the licensing of pharmacists and pharmacies, dangerous drugs, model glue, and the Georgia Drug and Cosmetic Act. Because of the prevalence of prosecutions under the Act, this topic contains a detailed look at the case law interpreting the provisions of the Act. This topic concludes with a discussion of the punishment provisions of the Act and of the civil sanctions that may be imposed for a violation of the Act.

II. Controlled Substances Act

The Act contains five schedules of controlled substances each of which collects substances which are similar in their potential for abuse, medical importance and level of safety. Schedule I includes the most dangerous drugs and Schedule V the least dangerous. Section 16-13-30(a) enacts a broad prohibition of the purchase, possession, or control of any controlled substance. Section 16-13-30(b) prohibits the manufacture, delivery, distribution, dispensing, administration, possession with intent to distribute and sale of any controlled substance.

Schedule I drugs have a high potential for abuse, have no currently accepted medical use in treatment in the United States, and there is a lack of accepted safety for use under medical supervision. Schedule I includes certain opiates, opium derivatives, and hallucinogens (including LSD, mescaline, peyote phencyclidine, and tetrahydrocannabinol).

Schedule II drugs have a high potential for abuse, have currently accepted medical uses in treatment in the United States, and, if abused, may lead to severe psychological or physical dependence. Included in Schedule II are opium and opiates (including raw and powdered opium, codeine and morphine), cocaine, coca leaves, certain opiates (including methadone), stimulants (including amphetamine) and depressants (including amobarbital, secobarbital and pentobarbital).

Schedule III drugs have a potential for abuse less than those in Schedules I and II, have currently accepted medical uses in the United States, and, if abused, may lead to moderate or low physical dependence or high psychological dependence. Included in Schedule III are certain stimulants, certain depressants, substances containing limited narcotic concentrations, and anabolic steroids.

Schedule IV contains drugs with a low potential for abuse relative to the drugs in Schedule III, with currently accepted medical uses in the United States, and, if abused, may, relative to Schedule III drugs, lead to limited physical or psychological dependence.

Schedule V includes drugs with a low potential for abuse relative to Schedule IV drugs, with currently accepted medical uses in the United States, and, relative to Schedule IV drugs, if abused, may lead to limited physical or psychological dependence. Substances with very limited narcotic concentrations are included in Schedule V.

The specific drugs included in each schedule are listed in §§ 16-13-25 through 16-13-29. While the General Assembly enacted the original listings and has since modified them, the Act also provides for new inclusions or rescheduling through administrative action of the Board of Pharmacy. While the Supreme Court of Georgia, in Sundberg v. State, held a similar delegation of authority in a prior drug statute to be unconstitutional under the State Constitution, the delegation under the current Act has not yet been successfully challenged. In Harmon v. State, the court avoided ruling on the question because the defendant was convicted of the sale of a substance which had not been affected by any action of the Board of Pharmacy. It should be noted that, unlike the statute struck down in Sundberg, § 16-13-22 of the current Act contains a detailed list of factors which are to be considered by the Board of Pharmacy in rescheduling or adding substances. The 4-3 Sundberg decision stressed the fact that there were no guidelines in the delegation provision of that statute.

The most important criminal provisions of the Controlled Substances Act appear in §§ 16-13-30, 16-13-31, and 16-13-33. Section 16-13-30(a) prohibits the purchase, possession, or control of a controlled substance and subsection (b), the more serious crime, prohibits the manufacture, delivery, distribution, dispensing, administration, sale or possession with intent to distribute all controlled substances. Subsections (c) through (h) outline the punishment provisions for subsection (a) and (b) offenses with regard to each of the five schedules. Generally, subsection (b) offenses are more heavily punished than subsection (a) offenses and crimes involving the Schedule I and II substances are treated more severely than those involving Schedules III, IV and V. All are felonies and several provide enhanced punishment for recidivists.

Subsection (i) of § 16-13-30 outlines a felony for the possession, manufacture, delivery, distribution, dispensing, administration, purchase, sale or possession with intent to distribute of a counterfeit controlled substance. Subsection (j) broadly prohibits the possession, manufacture, delivery, distribution, dispensing, administration, purchase, sale or possession with intent to distribute of marijuana, an unscheduled drug. This offense is a felony, punishable by one to ten years imprisonment, with enhanced punishment for those whose violation involves more than 10 pounds of marijuana. Subsection (k) makes it unlawful for any person to hire, solicit, engage, or use an individual under the age of 17 years, in any manner, for the purpose of manufacturing, distributing, or dispensing, on behalf of the solicitor, any controlled substance, counterfeit substance, or marijuana unless the manufacturing, distribution, or dispensing is otherwise allowed by law. This offense is a felony punishable by imprisonment for not less than five years nor more than 20 years or by a fine not to exceed $20,000, or both. Subsection (l) outlines the punishment provisions for subsection (a) and (b) offenses with regard to flunitrazepam, a Schedule IV controlled substance. These offenses are punishable as felonies, and enhanced punishment is provided for recidivists.

Section 16-13-31 prohibits and punishes trafficking in (1) cocaine, (2) illegal drugs such as morphine or heroin, (3) marijuana, (4) methaqualone, and (5) methamphetamine or amphetamine. This Code section creates a schedule of punishments scaled to the amount of contraband involved, and there is a mandatory punishment for each gradation of the crime.

Section 16-13-31.1 prohibits and punishes trafficking in the amphetamine or methamphetamine commonly known as MDMA or ecstasy. This Code section creates a schedule of punishments scaled to the amount of MDMA or ecstasy involved, and there is a mandatory punishment for each gradation of the crime.

Section 16-13-33 makes it a crime to conspire or attempt to commit any offense under the Act. Unlike the general attempt and conspiracy crimes, however, the § 16-13-33 offenses are punishable to the same extent as the object offenses toward which they are directed. Under the Act, the conspiracy offense and the object offense are separate crimes and do not merge.

There are several other sections in the Act which define criminal offenses. Sections 16-13-32 through 16-13-32.2, the "Head Shop Act," make it a misdemeanor for any person or corporation, knowing the drug related nature of the object, to distribute to any person any drug related object.

Section 16-13-30.1 punishes the counterfeiting of controlled substances. The punishment provision imposes imprisonment of one to ten years and/or fine of up to $25,000. Section 16-13-30.2 provides that anyone who knowingly manufactures, distributes, or possesses with intent to distribute an imitation controlled substance is guilty of a misdemeanor of a high and aggravated nature. Where under the evidence § 16-13-30.2 cannot be considered a lesser included offense of § 16-13-30.1, one who has been charged with violating § 16-13-30.1 would not be entitled, upon request, to a charge on § 16-13-30.2 as a lesser included offense.

Both § 16-13-30.1 and § 16-13-30.2 prohibit the sale of fake illegal drugs. Using the same evidence, a reasonable trier of fact could find beyond a reasonable doubt that a defendant's conduct violates both § 16-13-30.1, a felony, and § 16-13-30.2, a misdemeanor. Because the same conduct constitutes both a felony and a misdemeanor, therefore, the rule of lenity requires that the defendant be subjected to the penalties for the misdemeanor, rather than the felony.

Section 16-13-30.3(b) prohibits any person, other than a pharmacist, medical practitioner, or retail distributor, from knowingly possessing any product that contains an excessive amount of ephedrine, pseudoephedrine, or phenylpropanolamine. In addition, this provision prohibits any person from possessing any amount of these substances with the intent to manufacture amphetamine or methamphetamine. A violation of § 16-13-30.3(b) is a felony punishable by imprisonment for not less than one nor more than ten years.

Section 16-13-30.3(b.1) limits the sale and manner of sale of products containing pseudoephedrine so as to limit their use in the unlawful manufacture of methamphetamine. This Code provision makes it a misdemeanor to offer such products for retail sale without blister packaging and by self-service. In addition, it is a misdemeanor under this provision to deliver in a single over the counter sale more than three packages of any product containing pseudoephedrine or any number of packages that contain a combined total of more than nine grams of pseudoephedrine. A knowing violation of either of these prohibitions is punishable by a fine of not more than $500. A second or subsequent violation is punishable by not more than six months' imprisonment or a fine of not more than $1,000, or both. In a prosecution for a violation of either of these prohibitions, a retailer who is in compliance with Georgia Meth Watch would be entitled to a defense if it can establish that the violation occurred unknowingly.

Section 16-13-30.3(b.1) also makes it a misdemeanor for a retail distributor to purchase any product containing pseudoephedrine from any person or entity other than a licensed manufacturer or a licensed wholesale distributor. A second or subsequent violation is punishable as a misdemeanor of a high and aggravated nature.

Section 16-13-30.3(d) prohibits any person from possessing, controlling, manufacturing, delivering, distributing, dispensing, administering, purchasing, selling, or possessing with intent to distribute any substance containing any amount of ephedrine, pseudoephedrine, phenylpropanolamine, or any of their salts, optical isomers, or salts of optical isomers which have been altered from their original condition so as to be powdered, liquefied, or crushed. This prohibition does not apply to any substance which is possessed or altered for a legitimate medical purpose. A violation of § 16-13-30.3(d) is a felony punishable by imprisonment for not less than one nor more than ten years.

The prohibitions in § 16-13-30.3 do not apply to certain pediatric products and products exempted by the Georgia State Board of Pharmacy.

Section 16-13-30.4(g)(1) prohibits any person who sells, transfers, receives, or possesses a product containing pseudoephedrine from (1) knowingly failing to comply with the statute's reporting requirements, (2) knowingly making a false statement in a required report or record, or (3) knowingly or deliberately failing to obtain a required license or permit. A violation of § 16-13-30.4(g)(1) is punishable as a misdemeanor on the first offense and as a misdemeanor of a high and aggravated nature on the second and subsequent offenses.

Section 16-13-30.4(g)(2) prohibits any person from possessing, selling, transferring, or otherwise furnishing a product containing pseudoephedrine with the knowledge or intent that the product will be used in the unlawful manufacture of a controlled substance. A violation of § 16-13-30.4(g)(2) is punishable as a felony by imprisonment for not less than one nor more than 15 years or by a fine not to exceed $100,000, or both.

Section 16-13-30.5(a) prohibits any person from possessing, whether acquired through theft or other means, any substance with the intent to (1) use such substance in the manufacture of a Schedule I or Schedule II controlled substance, or (2) knowingly convey such substance to another for use in the manufacture of a Schedule I or Schedule II controlled substance. A violation § 16-13-30.5(a) is punishable as a felony by imprisonment for not less than one nor more than 15 years or by a fine not to exceed $100,000, or both. Section 16-13-30.5 does not apply where possession was by a person authorized by law to dispense, prescribe, manufacture, or possess the substance in question.

The purpose of § 16-13-30.6 is to prohibit the purchase and sale of marijuana flavored products to minors in this state. Section 16-13-30.6 makes it a misdemeanor for any person knowingly to sell, deliver, distribute, or provide to a minor or knowingly to possess with intent to sell, deliver, distribute, or provide to a minor any marijuana flavored product. This offense is punishable by a fine of $500 for each offense. Each sale in violation of § 16-13-30.6 constitutes a separate offense. Section 16-13-30.6 also prohibits any minor from falsely representing to any person that such minor is 18 years of age or older with the intent to purchase or otherwise obtain any marijuana flavored product.

Sections 16-13-42 and 16-13-43 establish felonies for the violation of registration requirements for controlled substance manufacturers and dispensers, for the failure to keep required records, for the refusal to permit an entry for inspection, for the failure to comply with prescription requirements, and for other similar acts. Included in § 16-13-42 is a provision which makes it a felony knowingly to keep or maintain a structure which is used for violation of the Act. There apparently is very little criminal litigation under §§ 16-13-42 and 16-13-43 and their primary thrust apparently is administrative.

Section 16-13-32.3 makes it unlawful for any person knowingly or intentionally to use any communication facility in committing or in causing or facilitating the commission of any act or acts constituting a felony under the Controlled Substances Act. In the absence of circumstantial evidence that would exclude every other reasonable hypothesis save that of the defendant's guilt, the state must present direct evidence that the defendant used the communication facility to arrange the commission of the prohibited acts. While the state is required to present evidence that a communication facility was actually used, it is not required to present a transcript of monitored conversations in order to sustain a conviction. The identity of the callers and the content of the conversations may be inferred from the circumstances. Also, there must be evidence from which it can be inferred that the prohibited acts were carried out. However, the defendant does not have to directly participate in the subsequent prohibited acts that he had initially facilitated in order to be guilty of this offense. Each separate use of a communication facility is a separate offense. Each offense is punishable by a fine of not more than $30,000 or by imprisonment for not less than one nor more than four years, or both.

Section 16-13-32.4 makes it unlawful for any person to manufacture, distribute, dispense, or possess with intent to distribute a controlled substance or marijuana in, on, or within 1,000 feet of any real property owned by or leased to any public or private elementary school, secondary school, or school board used for elementary or secondary education. The first offense is punishable by imprisonment for not more than 20 years or a fine of not more than $20,000, or both. A second or subsequent offense is punishable by imprisonment for not less than five years nor more than 40 years or a fine of not more than $40,000, or both. It is mandatory for the court to impose a minimum sentence of five years which may not be suspended unless otherwise provided by law. A conviction for this offense will not merge with a conviction arising under any other provision of the Georgia Controlled Substances Act. Also, a sentence imposed for this offense will be served consecutively to any other sentence imposed.

It is no defense to a prosecution for this offense that (1) school was or was not in session at the time of the offense; (2) the real property was being used for other purposes besides school purposes at the time of the offense; or (3) the offense took place on a school vehicle. However, it is an affirmative defense that the prohibited conduct took place entirely within a private residence, that no person 17 years of age or younger was present in such private residence at any time during the commission of the offense, and that the prohibited conduct was not carried on for purposes of financial gain. This affirmative defense is not a defense with respect to any other offense involving a controlled substance or marijuana.

Section 16-13-32.5 makes it unlawful for any person to manufacture, distribute, dispense, or possess with intent to distribute a controlled substance or marijuana or a counterfeit substance in, on, or within 1,000 feet of any public park, playground, recreation center, or housing project, unless the manufacture, distribution, or dispensing is otherwise allowed by law. Because § 16-13-32.5(b) does not designate simple possession of contraband within 1,000 feet of a housing project as a prohibited act, a conviction for simple possession is not authorized under this provision. The first offense is punishable by imprisonment for not more than 20 years or a fine of not more than $20,000, or both. A second or subsequent offense is punishable by imprisonment for not less than five years nor more than 40 years or a fine of not more than $40,000, or both. It shall be mandatory for the court to impose a minimum sentence of five years which may not be suspended unless otherwise provided by law. A conviction for this offense will not merge with a conviction arising under any other provision of the Controlled Substances Act. Also, a sentence imposed for this offense will be served consecutively to any other sentence imposed. Where a defendant's prior convictions are only for violations of § 16-13-32.5, he is subject, as a habitual offender of this statute, to the specific recidivist provisions of § 16-13-32.5(c)(2), but where his prior convictions are for a mixed variety of felonies, he is subject, as a habitual felon, to the general recidivist provisions of § 17-10-7.

It is an affirmative defense to a prosecution for this offense that the prohibited conduct took place entirely within a private residence, that no person 17 years of age or younger was present in such private residence at any time during the commission of the offense, and that the prohibited conduct was not carried on for purposes of financial gain. This affirmative defense is not a defense with respect to any other offense involving a controlled substance, marijuana, or counterfeit substance.

Section 16-13-32.6 makes it unlawful for any person to illegally manufacture, distribute, dispense, or possess with intent to distribute a controlled substance or marijuana in, on, or within any real property designated as a drug-free commercial zone. The first offense is punishable by imprisonment for not more than 20 years or a fine of not more than $20,000, or both. A second or subsequent offense is punishable by imprisonment for not less than five years nor more than 40 years or a fine of not more than $40,000, or both. A sentence imposed for this offense will be served consecutively to any other sentence imposed. Also, a conviction for this offense will not merge with a conviction arising under any other provision of the Controlled Substances Act.

The Controlled Substances Act also includes detailed provisions outlining procedures for administrative inspections of "controlled premises" and procedures for the forfeiture of property involved in drug-related offenses. Among other things, all controlled substances and marijuana which have been manufactured, distributed, dispensed, held or acquired in violation of the Act are subject to forfeiture.

State and local agencies are subject to the requirements of the Controlled Substances Act, §§ 16-13-20 et seq., but are not subject to the requirements of the Dangerous Drug Act, §§ 16-13-70 et seq.

III. Related Criminal Provisions

In addition to the criminal provisions of the Controlled Substances Act, there are a number of criminal provisions outside of the Act which make it unlawful to engage in certain activities relating to drugs. Section 16-13-3 makes it a misdemeanor for any person to abandon, in a public place, any dangerous drug, poison, or controlled substance. Section 16-13-4 provides that a failure to obtain FDA approval for the sale of a controlled substance or a dangerous drug is a felony punishable by imprisonment of not less than one nor more than five years. Additionally, subsection (a) of § 16-13-2 provides for the conditional discharge of first offenders for the possession of a controlled substance. Moreover, subsection (c) provides for the conditional discharge of first offenders for controlled substance possession offenses as well as for nonviolent property offenses that are related to an accused's addiction to a controlled substance or alcohol. Although Georgia's appellate courts have consistently rejected addiction as a defense to a criminal act, the General Assembly with the enactment of § 16-13-2(c) in 2004 is obviously authorizing sentencing courts to consider addiction in mitigation of an addict's punishment as a first offender for controlled substance possession and nonviolent property offenses.

Under the law regulating pharmacists and pharmacies, it is a felony to engage in the practice of pharmacy without a license; to violate the law regulating drug researcher permits; and to violate the law regulating drug wholesalers, distributors, and suppliers. Otherwise, any violation of the law regulating pharmacists and pharmacies constitutes a misdemeanor. Specifically, it is a misdemeanor to sell or dispense prescription drugs through a vending machine; to distribute or deliver drugs or devices to or to receive drugs or devices from an unlicensed person or firm; to violate the law regulating the registration of third-party prescription program administrators; and to violate the law regulating the sale of poisons.

Under the Dangerous Drug Act, it is a misdemeanor to fail to place a required label on a "dangerous drug;" to write a prescription for a dangerous drug in violation of the statutory requirements; to obtain or attempt to obtain a dangerous drug by fraud, forgery, concealment of a material fact or use of a false name or address; for anyone to prescribe or order the dispensing of a dangerous drug except those who are licensed to do so, are doing so in the usual course of professional practice, and are doing so for a legitimate medical purpose; and to possess, have under one's control, manufacture, deliver, distribute, administer, sell, or possess with intent to distribute a counterfeit dangerous drug.

Under the Dangerous Drug Act, it is a felony to distribute or possess with the intent to distribute nitrous oxide, an anesthetic commonly known as "laughing gas," for any use other than for a medical treatment prescribed by the order of a licensed medical practitioner. This offense is punishable by imprisonment for not less than one year nor more than three years or by a fine not to exceed $5,000 or both. It is also a felony to distribute or possess with the intent to distribute to any person under 18 years of age nitrous oxide for any use other than for a medical treatment prescribed by the order of a licensed medical practitioner. This offense is punishable by imprisonment for not less than two years nor more than six years or by a fine not to exceed $10,000 or both. The Dangerous Drug Act, however, does not apply to any person who possesses, distributes, sells, or uses nitrous oxide for food preparation in a restaurant, for food service, or in household products.

Prior to 1991, the distribution of or possession with intent to distribute an anabolic steroid was punishable under the Dangerous Drug Act. In 1991, the General Assembly changed the classification of "anabolic steroid" from a dangerous drug to a Schedule III controlled substance. The distribution of or possession with intent to distribute an anabolic steroid is now punishable under the Controlled Substances Act. However, § 16-13-27.1 provides that certain anabolic steroid containing compounds, mixtures, or preparations have been exempted as Schedule III controlled substances by the United States Drug Enforcement Administration, as listed in 21 C. F. R. 1308.34, and are therefore exempted from § 16-13-27(6), the list of anabolic steroids included in Georgia's Schedule III controlled substances.

It is a misdemeanor to violate any provision of the Drug and Cosmetic Act. That Act is the state counterpart to the Federal Food, Drug and Cosmetic Act. Essentially, it makes unlawful the mislabeling of drugs, the adulteration of drugs, the sale or delivery of such drugs, the dissemination of false advertising and the giving of a false guaranty concerning a drug.

Section 16-13-96 makes it a misdemeanor for anyone to intentionally smell or inhale the fumes from any model glue or to intentionally possess, buy, sell, transfer possession, or receive possession of any model glue for the purpose of smelling or inhaling it.

Section 16-11-111 makes it a felony for any person to (1) purchase, possess, transfer, or distribute any amount of anhydrous ammonia knowing that it will be used unlawfully to manufacture a controlled substance; (2) possess, maintain, or transport any quantity of anhydrous ammonia in a container or receptacle other than a tank truck, tank trailer, rail tank car, bulk storage tank, field (nurse) tank, field applicator, or any other approved container; or (3) tamper with equipment manufactured to hold, apply, or transport anhydrous ammonia without the express consent of the owner of the equipment. A violation of § 16-11-111 is punishable by imprisonment for not less than one nor more than ten years and by a fine not to exceed $100,000. Furthermore, any person who violates the prohibition outlined in item (2) above is subject to civil penalties in accordance with § 40-16-6.

IV. Case Law

A. Possession

1. Possession and Possession with Intent to Distribute Distinguished

Although § 16-13-30 punishes many activities with regard to controlled substances, including manufacturing, delivering, distributing, dispensing, administering, selling, and purchasing, the most common charges are possession and possession with intent to distribute.

Possession (§ 16-13-30(a)) and possession with intent to distribute (§ 16-13-30(b)) should be distinguished. While it is clear that there is the common element of possession in both crimes, the state is required to prove the additional element of specific intent to distribute in order to establish a charge of possession with intent to distribute. A trial court's failure to instruct the jury correctly on this essential element is reversible error.

The prosecution may establish the defendant's intent to distribute without presenting any evidence of a drug transaction. The intent to distribute may be established by circumstantial evidence. This intent may be inferred from the quantity of the drug possessed and the manner in which it was packaged. In close cases, expert opinion testimony may be necessary to establish that the quantity and packaging of the drug would generally be for distribution, as opposed to personal use. Other evidence useful in establishing an intent to distribute is the presence of drug paraphernalia, the presence of a large amount of cash, the defendant's presence in an area where arrests for drug dealing are frequently made, and the defendant's criminal activity prior to his arrest. The defendant's criminal intent may also be established by evidence of his commission of a similar offense. However, the state must make a sufficient showing of similarity before the other offense can be introduced for the purpose of showing intent, and the trial court, upon request, must give a limiting instruction to the jury about the specific purpose for which the other offense can be considered. Where none of this additional evidence of intent is offered, a conviction for possession with intent to distribute cannot be sustained.

2. Equal Access Rule

a. Presumption or Inference of Possession.

"In the absence of any circumstances to the contrary, a presumption arises from proof of ownership and control of premises, an automobile, or other property that the owner is in control and possession of contraband found therein."

In the case of an automobile found containing contraband, no presumption arises that the driver or owner is in possession of the contraband, where there is any competent evidence that persons other than the accused have had access to or control of the vehicle for a period of time prior to the discovery of the contraband. When the accused presents competent evidence of equal access, a charge to the jury on presumption of possession is reversible error.

The presumption that the driver or owner of an automobile is in possession of all that is in the automobile is a rebuttable presumption of guilt against an driver or owner and may not be used as a presumption of innocence by an occupant of the automobile. The presumption applies only when the driver is in exclusive possession of the automobile and does not apply in a case involving evidence of joint possession with others. However, where the defendant's sole defense is that he was a mere passenger in the car, and that he was in neither actual nor constructive possession of the contraband, a full and complete charge on the law concerning possession is necessary, which requires, at a minimum, that the jury be informed of the elements of actual and constructive possession and the rebuttable presumption that all items found inside a vehicle belong to the owner and/or driver. The failure to give a requested charge on this rebuttable presumption is reversible error.

Where the evidence shows other persons had equal access to the contraband, and there is no evidence the defendant had complete possession and control of the car at any time, no presumption of possession arises. Without the presumption of possession and control, what is left is mere presence at the scene of a crime or, more to the point, mere presence near hidden contraband. As a matter of law, this is not enough to support a finding of criminal possession of the contraband beyond a reasonable doubt and to the exclusion of every other reasonable hypothesis. It should be noted that where the state does establish more than the defendant's mere presence in a vehicle in which contraband was found, neither the presumption of possession nor the equal access rule is applicable.

b. Application of Rule

A presumption of possession may be overcome by the application of the equal access rule. The equal access rule is simply a defense available to a defendant to whom a presumption of possession flows. Thus, the equal access rule is triggered only where the sole evidence of possession of the contraband found in a vehicle is the defendant's ownership or possession of the vehicle. The equal access rule is not available as a defense where there is no evidence of the defendant's ownership or exclusive control of the vehicle in which the contraband was found.

The equal access rule is inapplicable where the state's evidence is that the defendant actually and physically possessed the contraband. Nor does the rule apply, and no charge regarding the rule need be given, when the "contraband is not in an open, notorious and equally accessible area." Also, the equal access rule has no application where all persons allegedly having equal access to the contraband are alleged to have been in joint constructive possession of that contraband. The fact that some of the persons have pled guilty to an indictment does not necessarily defeat the inference that another person was in joint possession of the contraband with them, absent some indication that they or anyone else had claimed exclusive possession of it.

The equal access rule is inapplicable where the defendant must have had knowledge of the presence of the drug. Thus, in Quarles v. State, the court rejected an equal access defense based upon proof that marijuana plants were growing between corn plants, that the defendant had rented the field, that the marijuana plants had been carefully planted and cultivated, that the plants were clearly visible, and that the defendant was cultivating the crop at the time of his arrest. The equal access rule generally does not apply to cases involving marijuana plants growing on the land outside the owner's or lessee's residence, on the basis that such contraband is stationary. If the plants are not portable, the equal access rule is not applicable. Also, the equal access rule is not applicable to marijuana plants growing outside, because they, like other vegetation, require a period of months to grow, mature, and be harvested.

Evidence of the defendant's mere proximity to contraband in a vehicle to which someone else had earlier access along with his refusal to consent to a search of the vehicle is not sufficient, by itself, to overcome the equal access rule. Furthermore, the defendant's refusal to consent to the search of his vehicle cannot be used as evidence of guilty knowledge to support a conviction for possession.

c. Evidence of Access

In order to support a defense of equal access, the evidence must show that others actually had access to the premises and had the opportunity to commit the crime. Gee v. State presents the prototypical fact situation. In Gee, the defendant's conviction for possessing drugs was wholly dependent upon the proposition that the contraband was found at a place under the defendant's possession and control. In light of evidence that persons other than the defendant had liberal access to the place, the defendant's conviction was reversed. The court held that merely finding contraband on premises occupied by a defendant is not sufficient to support a conviction if it affirmatively appears from the evidence that persons other than the defendant had equal opportunity to commit the crime.

The evidence did not support a defense of equal access in Warren v. State. In this case, there was no evidence of anyone other than the defendant with equal access to the house. The defendant testified that he had locked the door to the house where the drugs were found. Also, there were no signs of an intruder when the door was unlocked on the day of the search. In light of this evidence, the court held that it did not affirmatively appear that someone other than the defendant had equal opportunity to commit the crime. Therefore, a failure to charge on equal access was not error.

Others merely being somewhere within the premises for a relatively short but unspecified time before drugs subsequently are found therein does not reasonably raise the defense of equal access. In Jones v. State, the court held that although there was a scant amount of evidence that some persons might have entered the premises to purchase drugs during the time when police surveillance was being conducted, there was no evidence these persons had equal access to that area where the closed paper bag containing the drugs was seized. Because the defense was not reasonably raised by the evidence, an instruction on the equal access defense was held not to be necessary.

Evidence of access to the premises by an unknown individual who accomplished a break-in is not that "equal access" which would shield a defendant from the presumption of possession of contraband found on the premises.

The equal access rule requires affirmative evidence of access to the defendant's residence by persons other than the defendant and members of his immediate household. In the absence of such evidence, an instruction on equal access is not authorized. Furthermore, even if the defendant demonstrates that nonresidents had equal access to his residence, other evidence demonstrating the defendant's possession of the contraband may be enough to make the instruction unnecessary.

When the evidence does not reasonably raise the issue of equal access, the trial court's refusal to instruct the jury on this issue is not error. Likewise, when the trial court elects not to instruct the jury on presumption of possession, an equal access instruction is not required.

The equal access rule requires affirmative evidence of access to a vehicle by persons other than the driver or owner of the vehicle. The fact that a vehicle may have been unlocked for a short time does not, standing alone, establish the "equal access" which would preclude the application of the presumption of possession of contraband found in the vehicle. Also, the fact that a vehicle was parked in another individual's driveway does not show that the other individual or anyone else had "equal access" to the vehicle and does not raise a reasonable doubt by rebutting the presumption of possession of contraband found in the vehicle.

Evidence of equal access is not an absolute defense to a charge of possession. The defendant is not entitled to a verdict of acquittal on grounds of equal access where there is other evidence of possession besides the defendant's ownership or possession of the vehicle. In other words, evidence of equal access does not necessarily exculpate the defendant. The totality of the evidence may be sufficient to connect the defendant to the possession of the drugs even though the evidence would have authorized a finding that others had equal access to them. Whether the evidence of equal access is sufficient to rebut the presumption of possession arising from the discovery of drugs in the premises or vehicle is a question properly left to the jury, under the totality of the evidence in the case. If the presumption of possession and control is unrebutted, the jury can then rationally find by inference that the driver and owner of the vehicle had direct physical control over the drugs, so as to be in actual possession of them; or that he had the power and intention to exercise dominion or control so as to be in constructive possession. Furthermore, if there is no credible evidence to support the defendant's claim that others in fact had access to the vehicle, the jury may disbelieve the claim and conclude that the only reasonable hypothesis is that the defendant had possession of the drugs.

Evidence of the defendant's commission of a similar drug offense can be used by the state to negate the defendant's claim of equal access.

3. "Head of Household" Doctrine

The "head of the household" doctrine is an old rule which provides a presumption that contraband found in a house belongs to the head of the household. The traditional head of household presumption in drug cases when combined with the statutory presumption that the husband is the head of the household (this statutory presumption was repealed by Acts 1983, p. 1309), came before the Georgia Supreme Court in Knighton v. State. The trial court had instructed the jury that contraband found in the house occupied by the defendant and his wife was presumed to be his. On appeal, the defendant asserted that the head of the household statute was gender-based discrimination in violation of the Constitution and, at any rate, the presumption, if valid at all, is only valid as a rebuttable presumption and the trial court erred in not informing the jury of that fact.

It must be emphasized that the Knighton court's holding affects only a particular type of head of household presumption, that is, one which is based on the gender of the participants. The general head of household presumption, that the head of the household is the possessor of contraband, still survives and can be charged to the jury so long as the identity of the head of the household is not based on the gender of the parties. For example, in Knighton itself, the court approved a gender neutral head of household instruction which states that "if you find that a person owns or is the lessee of a house or premises, you will be permitted, but not required, to presume that such person is in possession of the entire premises and all the property thereon or therein. However, this is a rebuttable presumption and may be overcome by evidence in the case that others had access to the premises." Thus, the head of the household still will be charged with a rebuttable presumption that he or she is the owner and possessor of the contraband found therein, subject to the equal access rule. In other words, notwithstanding the unconstitutionality of a rebuttable presumption of possession as against a husband, there is a viable rebuttable presumption of possession, without regard to gender or marital status, as against the owner or lessee of the premises where the contraband is found.

This gender-neutral head of household presumption has been upheld by the Court of Appeals. In Burdett v. State, the court held that the presumption was constitutional in that it is more likely than not that the head of household possesses items found in the house. The court held that so long as the jury is informed that the presumption may be rebutted it is not an unconstitutional burden-shifting instruction.

Where there is overwhelming evidence that a defendant had a possessory interest of some sort in the subject property, the state's failure to prove his specific interest and the giving of a head of household instruction constitutes, at most, harmless error.

4. Circumstantial Evidence of Possession

The gravamen of a possession charge is proof that the defendant actually or constructively possessed the substance. There is, however, no invariable requirement that the substance itself be produced.

a. Actual Possession

Actual possession, if present, is relatively easy to prove. Its proof generally consists of evidence that the substance was found on the defendant's person or circumstantial evidence pointing to actual possession.

As an example of the latter, in Phillips v. State, the court held actual possession had been proven. The evidence showed the following: the defendant had been observed drinking beer, he fled when the police approached, he had a brown paper bag in his hand, the police observed him holding the bag, ducking behind a trailer and emerging without the bag. The bag was subsequently discovered hidden under the steps to the trailer and containing drugs. Though circumstantial, the court held this sufficient to sustain a finding of actual possession by the defendant.

b. Constructive Possession

It is clear that circumstantial evidence can be sufficient to sustain a finding of constructive possession. In Gainer v. State, the evidence showed that the defendant was standing behind a counter and hesitated to move his foot. When he did a red triangle was observed sticking up between the floor boards. The police pulled up the loose boards and found marijuana. The conviction was affirmed. Likewise, the conviction in Clark v. State was affirmed, where evidence showed that the defendant was arrested in a room with two other men sitting around a low table on which there were drugs worth approximately $20,000 and devices for measuring, weighing, cutting and packing the drugs. In Reese v. State, the evidence showed that detectives found a brown paper bag that contained cocaine wrapped in aluminum foil near a church. A fingerprint examiner for the State Crime Lab testified that several fingerprints that matched the defendant's prints were found on pieces of the aluminum foil containing cocaine found in the bag, and that a white powdery substance, cocaine, was visible on three of the prints developed on the foil. The conviction was affirmed. In Brewster v. State, the evidence showed that a piece of cocaine was found in the yellow packet immediately after the defendant dropped the packet, after the defendant was seen to handle the contents of that same yellow packet by dumping them in his hand while participating in two apparent exchanges from that same packet. No one else was seen to handle the yellow packet. The court held that this evidence was at least circumstantial evidence of possession of the cocaine found in the balled-up candy wrapper, beyond a reasonable doubt and to the exclusion of every other reasonable hypothesis. In Williams v. State, the two officers testified that as they approached the group in front of the pool hall, they saw the defendant bend over the area in the fence where they later found the cocaine hidden. The officers observed the defendant's behavior and heard his response when his co-defendant told him that the cocaine was not in the cavity in the fence. The court held that there was sufficient evidence from which a rational trier of fact could have found that the defendant was guilty beyond a reasonable doubt of possessing the cocaine.

A case which may demonstrate the limits of the constructive possession doctrine is State v. Lewis. Here, the defendant was arrested as he opened or was about to open the door of a plane which contained marijuana. The lower court had reversed the conviction on the grounds that the defendant had not obtained possession of the contraband at the point of arrest. The Supreme Court disagreed, concluding that the evidence showed either that the defendant was in constructive possession of the marijuana at that point or that he was aiding and abetting another party in his constructive possession of the contraband.

In Gamble v. State, even though the defendant did not have actual physical control over the car at the time it was stopped, the court held that a rational jury could have concluded beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant at least was in constructive possession of the contraband found in the car based on the circumstances surrounding the defendant's acquisition of the car; his nervousness upon seeing that the car had been stopped; the fact that he occupied the car immediately before turning it over to his co-defendant; and the evidence demonstrating that he exercised dominion and control over the car during the trip to and from Miami.

In Brooks v. State, the court held that the state failed to prove that the defendant was in joint constructive possession of the cocaine which another person hid in or near a cactus bush. The state's evidence, while showing the defendant's predisposition towards selling cocaine and even that he was dressed in a fashion common to street vendors of illicit substances, nonetheless failed to establish anything more than speculation as to a possible conspiracy with the other person.

In Merritt v. State, on the other hand, the court held that evidence of "drug sales" was part of the events witnessed by police, tying the defendant directly to the possession of cocaine found in the apartment. The sale of a plastic bag, believed in common experience to contain drugs, in exchange for money was an aspect of the charged criminal act and was admissible as res gestae although the defendant was, to his good fortune, not prosecuted for the sale of drugs. This evidence of "drug sales" and of cocaine and weighing scales in the apartment was sufficient to convict the defendant of possession of cocaine.

In Nolton v. State, the court held that although there was evidence in the case that other employees besides the defendant had access to the premises, the jury could reasonably have concluded that, as the employee in charge of the premises, the defendant enjoyed a right of access which was superior to that of anyone else other than the owner of the business, who denied any knowledge of the presence of the contraband.

In Daughtery v. State, the court held that evidence of the defendant's possession of approximately 58 grams of crack cocaine found in a briefcase hidden in the same room where the undercover officer made his purchase was sufficient to sustain the defendant's conviction on the cocaine trafficking charge. It was clear to the police officers conducting the search that the defendant was the individual in control of the scene inside the house. While the presence of others in the house might have been viewed as inculpating those individuals, their presence need not have been viewed as exculpating the defendant. It was for the jury to decide how to weigh and view that evidence.

In O'Neill v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court held that the Court of Appeals erroneously upheld the defendant's conviction for possession of methamphetamine based on his unconscious condition on a bed where the arresting officers found an ashtray containing two glass pipes used for smoking methamphetamine and a ring-sized jewelry box containing 2.8 grams of the drug. No evidence was introduced that the defendant's unconscious state was the result of smoking methamphetamine. Nor was any evidence introduced that excluded the possibility that the defendant was passed out on the bed for a reason unrelated to methamphetamine, such as from an excessive consumption of alcohol. Under these circumstances, the fact that the defendant was passed out could not have established that he had smoked methamphetamine as this fact did not exclude the reasonable possibility that the defendant's condition resulted from alcohol intoxication, exhaustion, or the ingestion of some legal substance other than methamphetamine.

c. Mere Presence at Crime Scene vs. Constructive Possession

Although circumstantial evidence may be enough to sustain a conviction, it is not enough if the court finds only "mere presence" has been shown. In Mitchell v. State, the court held the evidence proved presence alone. There the defendants were arrested in a house where cocaine and marijuana were found. The court reversed because there was no proof the defendants occupied or had control of the premises. In Myers v. State, the only evidence presented at trial in regard to the defendant was that he, a seventeen-year-old minor, lived in his mother's apartment where the contraband was found and circumstantial evidence that he fled the apartment when armed officers broke down the front door. The court held that the evidence was insufficient to form the basis of a conviction. No evidence was presented that the defendant participated in any activity associated with trafficking in cocaine. The court also held that the defendant's flight was a reasonable response and was not necessarily indicative of guilt. In Reid v. State, the court held that nothing more than mere presence at the scene of the crime was shown by the evidence. The informant did not testify, and the investigator's testimony regarding the substance of the information he received from the informant was inadmissible hearsay without probative value. Further, the evidence showed only that a certain amount of crack cocaine was found on the floorboard between the seat and the door on the passenger side of the car near where the defendant had been sitting and that the defendant denied he had seen the driver with any drugs that day. In Paden v. State, the court held that the circumstantial evidence and the reasonable inferences derived therefrom were insufficient to connect the defendant to the crack cocaine found at the residence of an admitted crack cocaine user, premises that the defendant did not regularly occupy. Moreover, others resided in the same house as the user and other residents used drugs in the user's bedroom. The fact that the defendant possessed over $200 when arrested and that he deposited money in the user's jail account did not connect him to the cocaine. The defendant offered a reasonable hypothesis for the events, and the state failed to prove he was in constructive possession of cocaine sufficient to sustain a conviction for possession with intent to distribute. In In Interest of A. D. C., the court found that there existed only a mere suspicion of the juvenile's participation as a party in the alleged offense of possessing with intent to distribute marijuana in, on, or within 1,000 feet of a public high school. The juvenile was in the same dressing room with another boy and departed the area just before marijuana was discovered on the other boy. Although the juvenile was found to have $269 in his possession, he was not found to be in possession of any controlled substances. Since a reasonable, unrebutted explanation was offered for the juvenile's lawful possession of this amount of money, his mere possession of it did not establish beyond a reasonable doubt that he was a party to the drug offense. In Brookshire v. State, the court concluded that the evidence presented failed to show that the defendant constructively possessed the marijuana. The evidence did not authorize, as a matter of law, a reasonable inference that the defendant knowingly exercised power and dominion over any portion of the marijuana in her son's car at the time of the arrest. Her son's statements showed only that he intended to meet the defendant that day and, at some point in the future, give her two ounces of marijuana in exchange for later payment. These statements were direct evidence of her son's intent to sell marijuana and did not show possession of marijuana by the defendant. Furthermore, since the statements were uncorroborated by other evidence, they could not support the defendant's conviction.

There are times, however, when the distinction between mere presence and constructive possession is very close. In Granger v. State, the convictions of two defendants were reversed on a "mere presence" theory. The evidence showed five individuals in a motel room. One tried to flush an armload of substances down the toilet; another had been observed earlier trying to rake something which appeared from the outside to be marijuana into a drawer where marijuana residue was subsequently discovered. The Granger court held that as to the two defendants, neither of whom had tried to flush the substances or rake them, only mere presence had been proven. In In the Interest of A. H., on the other hand, the convictions of two defendants were affirmed. The evidence showed six individuals in an apartment. Two of the individuals were caught in the rear of the apartment, apparently attempting to dispose of cocaine in the bathroom. However, because the defendants were found in the same small room in which cocaine was being prepared for retail sale and because there was evidence that they arrived only after the delivery of the cocaine was arranged, but well before the actual delivery took place, the court held that a rational trier of fact would be justified in concluding from this evidence that the defendants were more than merely present but were parties to the conversion of the cocaine from cake form into "rocks" suitably packaged in glassine bags for retail sale.

In Sanders v. State, the court held that there was sufficient evidence for the jury to find that the defendant constructively possessed the drugs, since it was established that he visited the apartment frequently, that he regularly used the bedroom there and that the drugs were in his immediate presence. The court held that this conclusion was not changed by the fact that the evidence would have authorized a finding that others had equal access to the same drugs.

In Widener v. State, the court held that the evidence showed the marijuana was not only within arm's reach of the defendant but in plain view and being smoked in the defendant's immediate presence at the time the police entered the home. Even though the officer did not testify that he saw the defendant or any other person at the coffee table in the act of smoking a marijuana cigarette, the trial court was authorized to find that the defendant was, at the least, in joint and constructive possession of the marijuana.

In McKenny v. State, the officers found rock cocaine in plain view on the kitchen counter and a scale of the type used for dealing drugs and a bag of marijuana in the kitchen cabinet. The court held that the fact that the defendant was in the house alone and possessed the key to the house, in which no evidence was found that any other person occupied it, was certainly sufficient evidence to show the defendant was in possession of the contents of the house.

In Shropshire v. State, the court held that sufficient circumstantial evidence was presented at trial to establish that the defendant had at least joint constructive possession of the contraband in the vehicle. There was evidence from which a jury could have concluded that the crack cocaine was visible, and that the defendant had access to it and the power to exercise control over it.

In Martin v. State, the court held that there was more than mere presence in the vicinity of contraband. There was no evidence that anyone else had equal access to the car, and the items were found in places in close proximity to and within the control of the driver.

In Christopher v. State, far more than "mere presence" at the scene of the crime was shown by the evidence presented at trial, whereby the jury could have concluded that the defendant either had actual physical possession of the contraband or else that the defendant aided and abetted in the crimes charged.

In Ward v. State, the court held that the evidence showed that the defendant's participation and knowledge amounted to something more than a "mere presence" at the scene of the crime and supported the state's theory that the defendant and his wife were both willing participants in the crime of manufacturing marijuana.

In Allen v. State, evidence in addition to the defendant's mere presence at the premises was presented, including the fact that the defendant's identification card was found in the same bag as that containing notes relating to a drug operation and the defendant's incriminating spontaneous statement. The court held that this evidence was sufficient to sustain the defendant's conviction for possession of methamphetamine.

In Okongwu v. State, there was not only proof that the defendant was present when the police raided his trailer, there was proof that he was standing next to the co-defendant just before she fled into the bathroom and stashed 17.8 grams of cocaine in the shower's soap dish. There was also proof that the defendant was monitoring local police activity just before the raid. Further, the state proved that the defendant fled when police officers appeared outside his trailer on another occasion, and that a dose of crack cocaine was found abandoned at the very spot where the defendant was sitting just before the officers appeared. The court held that this evidence was sufficient to sustain the defendant's conviction for possession of cocaine with intent to distribute.

In Blair v. State, the question for the factfinder was whether the defendant was merely present in the car in which marijuana was being smoked or whether he was participating in the smoking of the marijuana and thus in possession of it. Although the defendant maintained that only the driver was smoking the marijuana, the testimony of the two arresting officers, trained in drug detection and identification, established that the defendant's face was flushed, and his eyes were very glassy and bloodshot. Also, the defendant had the odor of marijuana about him, as though he had been smoking it, and he had the appearance of being intoxicated or under the influence of drugs. The green leafy material in the bags seized from the car tested positive for marijuana. The court held that the evidence was clearly sufficient to find the defendant guilty of marijuana possession.

In Hester v. State, the defendant, by his own evidence, showed that he was not merely one of the crowd. He was the one from the group of four males standing together who responded to the call from the car which stopped, ascertained that the occupant wanted to purchase "a good $20," and said he knew where it could be obtained. The trial court correctly ruled that this constituted more than mere presence, so as not to warrant a charge on mere presence.

d. Mere Spatial Proximity to Contraband vs. Constructive Possession

A finding of constructive possession must be based upon something more than the defendant's equal access to contraband or his mere "spatial proximity" to it. When the proximity of the contraband is coupled with such other facts and circumstances which sufficiently prove the defendant's connection to it, the totality of the evidence of the circumstances would be sufficient to establish his possession of the contraband. For instance, evidence of the presence of contraband in a close proximity to the defendant prior to his arrest, which is used to corroborate his confession, would be sufficient to justify his conviction for possession.

e. Controlled Delivery

In Myers v. State, a postal inspector delivered a package addressed to the defendant. The postal inspector told the defendant that he needed to get the parcel delivered to resolve whether it contained narcotics. In response, the defendant said that she would accept the package, although she would not sign for it. She stated that she would give the postal inspector permission to open the parcel so that the matter could be resolved. The postal inspector opened the package and found two baggies containing a green leafy substance later identified as marijuana and an unknown white powder. Drug-related items were later found in the defendant's vehicle and residence. Although the defendant contended that there was no evidence to connect her to the contraband and that she never took physical control of the package, the court held that there was sufficient circumstantial evidence to authorize her conviction for possession of marijuana with intent to distribute.

In Luke v. State, a GBI agent formulated a plan to make a controlled delivery of two packages containing marijuana to the residence of the defendant's father. After the defendant signed for the packages addressed to his father, he was arrested for receiving the marijuana. The court held that there simply was no evidence that the defendant had any knowledge that, when he signed for the delivery, those sealed, opaque packages contained contraband. A statement by another GBI agent that the defendant subsequently provided marijuana to a female was nonprobative hearsay and so could not constitute circumstantial evidence to establish the defendant's state of mind or knowledge at a prior time. In Perkins v. State, however, the court found that because the facts in the case were far different from those in Luke, Luke was not controlling. The court held that when the evidence was considered in its totality, i.e., when the circumstantial evidence connecting the defendant with the packages received during the controlled delivery was considered together with his false account about his relationship with the addressee, it was sufficient to authorize the trial court to conclude that the defendant was in fact the intended recipient of the packages and was aware of their contents. Accordingly, the evidence was sufficient to support the defendant's conviction for possession of marijuana with intent to distribute.

f. Presence of Metabolites in Bodily Fluid

The Court of Appeals has consistently held that the presence of cocaine metabolites in body fluid constitutes direct, positive evidence that the person who produced the body fluid possessed cocaine. The Georgia Supreme Court disapproved of this holding in Green v. State. In Green, the court held that the presence of cocaine metabolites in body fluid is direct evidence only of the fact that cocaine was introduced into the body producing the fluid, and is not direct evidence that the person possessed the cocaine. Rather, the presence of cocaine metabolites in body fluid is only circumstantial or indirect evidence that the person possessed cocaine.

g. Beaten Path Doctrine

In Blitch v. State, the court held that the "beaten path" doctrine allows connection of contraband found in close vicinity to a house so as to authorize rational jurors to conclude beyond reasonable doubt that the primary resident of that house owned or had control over the contraband. In Childers v. State, the court held that it is not essential that there be evidence linking the primary resident to the contraband in addition to the "beaten path" evidence, particularly when there is no evidence that others outside his immediate household had equal opportunity to commit the crime.

5. Similar Offenses

Evidence of a previous conviction for possession is admissible to show intent, motive, similarity of circumstances, and knowledge. In its presentation to the jury, the state must not merely submit into evidence a certified copy of the defendant's previous conviction. While the certified copy may be enough to establish that the defendant committed the independent offense, it does not establish the similarity or connection between that independent offense and the crime charged. The state must also present evidence to the jury to establish that similarity or connection. Although it is error to admit a certified copy of the defendant's previous indictment without any additional showing of similarity, this error is harmless if the evidence of the defendant's guilt is overwhelming.

Because the narratives contained in police reports generated in connection with police investigations do not have the reliability inherent in other documents that the courts have traditionally considered to be business records, the evidence contained in these narratives are not facts that should properly be admitted under the business records exception to the hearsay rule. Thus, it would be erroneous for a trial court to allow a police officer to read into evidence the narrative portion of a police report of which he had no personal knowledge and did not prepare for the purpose of demonstrating a similar transaction.

In order to provide defense counsel an opportunity to investigate the validity, relevance, or admissibility of similar transaction evidence, the state must notify the defense of its intent to introduce this evidence. The notice must specify the transaction to be introduced. In the absence of such notice, the admission of evidence about the transaction would be error. The state is not required to set out in its notice the lawful purposes for which it intends to use the evidence.

A defendant who preemptively introduces evidence of a prior conviction on direct examination may not on appeal claim that the admission of such evidence was error.

Upon request, the trial court must give a limiting instruction to the jury about the specific purpose for which the similar offense evidence can be considered. When a jury is informed that it can consider the similar offense evidence for the purpose of showing "the crimes charged in the case" and in considering an "element of the offense charged in this indictment," a fair risk exists that the jury will be confused and misled as to the proper limited use of this evidence to the prejudice of the defendant. The jury might improperly conclude that this evidence can be directly used to prove the crime charged or one or more of its elements. Since this language substantially expands the limited purposes for which the similar offense evidence can be used, it is overly broad and erroneous on its face.

The defendant's prior conviction for selling cocaine would be admissible in his trial for the possession of cocaine, where the prior conviction is presented not as evidence of bad character but as evidence to rebut a claim by the defendant that he does not fool with drugs.

A defendant who testifies may not be impeached by a prior felony conviction involving moral turpitude unless he first has placed his character into evidence. Thus, without the defendant placing his character into evidence, it would be improper for the state to use similar transaction evidence to attack his credibility.

6. Prescriptions

Prior to 1996, the Dangerous Drug Act provided that the possession of dangerous drugs prescribed for another person was legal only if the dangerous drugs were in the original prescription container. The possession of dangerous drugs prescribed for another person outside the original container was a misdemeanor. This provision of the Dangerous Drug Act applied exclusively to dangerous drugs, and there was no comparable provision which applied to controlled substances. In Black v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals rejected the defendant's argument that because there was no comparable provision applicable to controlled substances, his possession of controlled substances, which were prescribed for his travelling companion but were possessed by the defendant outside the original prescription container, was not unlawful. The court found no indication that the General Assembly intended to authorize the possession of controlled substances (a felony) in these circumstances, while prohibiting the possession of dangerous drugs (a misdemeanor) under the same circumstances. Thus, the court upheld the defendant's conviction for the unlawful possession of controlled substances.

In 1996, the General Assembly, apparently in response to the defendant's argument in Black, amended the provision of the Dangerous Drug Act to make it applicable to controlled substances as well as dangerous drugs. Now, the possession of controlled substances or dangerous drugs prescribed for another person is legal only if such drugs are in the original prescription container and are labeled in accordance with the Georgia Drug and Cosmetic Act. Any person who possesses a controlled substance or dangerous drug prescribed for another person outside the original container or who possesses a drug which is not labeled in accordance with the law is guilty of a misdemeanor under the Dangerous Drug Act. It is interesting to note that with this 1996 amendment the possession of controlled substances under circumstances similar to those in Black would now be treated as a misdemeanor rather than as a felony offense.

In Hulsey v. State, the defendant was found guilty of unlawfully acquiring and obtaining possession of a controlled substance by altering a prescription. The Court of Appeals held that the trial court did not err in denying the defendant's motion for directed verdict of acquittal, because there was evidence linking the drug listed in the indictment (Darvocet) with the actual listed Schedule IV drug (Dextropropoxyphene). For purposes of the Georgia Controlled Substances Act, dextropropoxyphene and propoxyphene are chemically identical analgesics. The evidence showed that Darvocet N-100 is propoxyphene with acetaminophen and dextropropoxyphene is "Propoxyphene Napsylate." This circumstantial evidence was sufficient to authorize the jury's determination that the 90 Darvocet N-100 tablets the defendant fraudulently obtained were in fact the controlled substance dextropropoxyphene as alleged in the indictment.

Section 16-13-41(h) provides that it is unlawful for any practitioner to issue any prescription document signed in blank. In Raber v. State, the defendant argued that, because this provision does not define what a physician must do to "issue" a prescription document, he did not have fair notice that providing a pre-signed blank prescription pad to a member of his medical staff in the course of her employment would subject him to prosecution for a felony offense. Contrary to the defendant's argument, the Georgia Supreme Court held that properly construed, § 16-13-41(h) provides definite warning to persons of ordinary intelligence that the conduct alleged in the case was proscribed and therefore was not unconstitutionally vague. Section 16-13-41(h) proscribes the issuance of a prescription "document" rather than issuance of the prescription itself. It covers the circumstance where the prescription document, which identifies the practitioner by some preprinted information, is not filled in with any other required information except for the practitioner's signature and where this document is then given to another. This provision neither mentions nor implies that the practitioner must give the document to the ultimate user.

Also, in Raber the court rejected the defendant's argument that the language of § 16-13-41(h) allowed for arbitrary and discriminatory enforcement based upon unintended consequences of his conduct. The evidence showed that the nurse practitioner kept prescription pads pre-signed by the defendant in her residence, that her daughter admitted that she had stolen some of the prescription forms, and that another woman died from an apparent overdose of a drug which had been obtained by a prescription listing the defendant as the prescribing physician. The court found that it was not necessary to assess the surrounding circumstances in order to determine whether § 16-13-41(h) was violated. Evidence of the tragic death was relevant only because it eventually led to the discovery of the defendant's unlawful provision of the pre-signed prescription forms to his nurse practitioner. Thus, the death did not indicate that the prosecution's enforcement of the statute was arbitrary and discriminatory.

7. Proof of Amount Possessed

Unlike § 16-13-31, in which the requisite quantity and purity of cocaine which authorizes a conviction of trafficking in cocaine is specified in the statute, § 16-13-30 sets forth no quantities to distinguish mere possession and distribution. Knowledge of the amount of crack cocaine one would generally possess for personal use or the amount which might evidence distribution is not necessarily within the scope of the ordinary layman's knowledge and experience. Therefore, the testimony of an officer, qualified as an expert on drug use, that the amount of cocaine discovered would generally be for distribution, as opposed to personal use, is properly admissible.

Generally, the amount of a controlled substance which is possessed is not relevant to a conviction for possession. It has been held, therefore, that even if the amount possessed is so minute that it is not useable, a conviction will stand. There are situations, however, where the amount of substance possessed will be relevant to sentencing considerations. For example, under § 16-13-2, possession of an ounce or less of marijuana is a misdemeanor, while, under the general provisions of § 16-13-30(j), possession of more than an ounce is a felony. Thus, in a marijuana possession case, the amount of marijuana possessed will be an element of proof. In the absence of evidence to establish its weight, there is no basis for treating the offense as a felony.

The state's failure to give notice of the impending destruction of contraband and an opportunity to verify weight by independent weighing or by presence at the state's weighing, can lead to an insufficiency of admissible evidence of weight, an element of the crime.

It should also be noted that the placement of some substances in a particular schedule of controlled substances will depend on the amount of the substance involved in the crime. For example, codeine is listed in Schedule II (§ 16-13-26(1)(A)(vii)), but if the amount is not more than 1.8 grams per 100 milliliters, it is a Schedule III (§ 16-13-27(4)(B)) substance and if the amount is not more than 200 milligrams per 100 milliliters, it is a Schedule V (§ 16-13-29(1)(A)) substance. In one case, where it was uncertain whether the codeine possessed was a Schedule III or Schedule V amount, the court remanded for sentencing as a Schedule V amount. The court recognized that possession of both Schedule III and V drugs are governed by the same punishment section (§ 16-13-30(g)) but insisted that it had no way of knowing how the labelling of the substance would affect the length of sentence imposed. A resentencing was ordered.

8. Indictments

Where the defendant is indicted for misdemeanor possession of marijuana, evidence of the presence of tetrahydrocannabinol (THC) in the defendant's urine sample cannot sustain his conviction. A prosecution under the Controlled Substances Act for misdemeanor possession of marijuana cannot be instituted on the basis of a blood or urine test which shows "positive" for marijuana, because such positive showings will be based upon the presence of THC without the morphological features of the marijuana plant and are thus excluded from the definition of "marijuana" under the Act. Accordingly, it would appear that such prosecutions for possession of marijuana based upon positive blood or urine samples must be brought as felony prosecutions for possession of a Schedule I drug, i.e., THC. However, this rule may not control under the facts of a particular case. For instance, where evidence of the defendant's positive urine sample is used to corroborate the defendant's admission of possession, there would be no fatal variance between an allegation of misdemeanor possession of marijuana and the proof.

9. Jury Instructions

A trial court may charge the jury on constructive possession where there is sufficient evidence to support the charge. In Billingsley v. State, an officer testified that he observed the defendant retrieve cocaine from a pile of leaves on the side of the street and drop cocaine as he walked toward the officers. In each instance the evidence was sufficient to support a charge that the defendant knowingly had both the power and intention to exercise authority or control over the cocaine. Accordingly, the trial court did not err in giving the charge on constructive possession.

If circumstantial evidence exists raising a jury issue whether the defendant and another shared in the possession of the contraband, a charge on joint possession is authorized.

Where an indictment charges a defendant with committing the offense of possession with the intent to distribute, the trial court's reading of § 16-13-30(b) in its entirety does not constitute reversible error where the trial court has properly limited the jury's consideration of the evidence to the offense charged in the indictment.

10. Verdicts

When an indictment charges an offense and the jury returns a verdict of guilty on a lesser included offense, the verdict operates as an acquittal of the greater offense. Thus, if a jury returns a verdict on a lesser included offense, further deliberations are precluded. In Cantrell v. State, the jury returned a verdict of guilty of possession of cocaine. In so doing, the jury acquitted the defendant of the greater offense, possession of cocaine with intent to distribute. By refusing to accept the jury's verdict of guilty on the possession offense, the trial court forced the jury to reach unanimous agreement on the intent to distribute offense before considering the possession offense. However, where a jury deliberates a greater offense and an included offense, unanimity is not required for the greater offense before the jury can vote on the included offense. Thus, the Georgia Supreme Court concluded that the jury did not have to reach unanimous agreement on the intent to distribute offense before considering the possession offense.

B. Trafficking

1. Generally

The General Assembly has created trafficking offenses for (1) cocaine, (2) illegal drugs such as morphine or heroin, (3) marijuana, (4) methaqualone, and (5) methamphetamine or amphetamine, which are consolidated in § 16-13-31.

The General Assembly created another trafficking offense in 2004 for the amphetamine or methamphetamine commonly known as MDMA or ecstasy. This offense is defined in § 16-13-31.1.

2. Constitutionality

Section 16-13-31 survived an immediate constitutional attack in Paras v. State. The Georgia Supreme Court rejected the argument that the mandatory minimum sentencing deprived the sentencing judge of his discretion. The court also refused to find the statute in conflict with the parole authority given the State Board of Pardons and Paroles and rejected a claim that the sentencing provisions constituted cruel and unusual punishment under the Eighth Amendment. A vagueness attack on the wording of the statute was also denied by the court.

In Brugman v. State, the court held that, in clear language, § 16-13-31(e)(2) [now (g)(2)] contemplates only that the convicted trafficker will provide information about others involved in the crime for which he has been convicted. Section 16-13-31(e)(2) [now (g)(2)] does not, on its face, compel the defendant to exchange his own Fifth Amendment rights for a chance at a reduced sentence. The court also held that where any person is convicted under § 16-13-31 and provides "substantial assistance" to the authorities as contemplated by the statute, this information may be brought to the attention of the sentencing court by motion of either the district attorney or the defendant, or the sentencing court may make its own inquiry into the matter. The judge hearing the motion may then impose a reduced or suspended sentence if he finds that the defendant has rendered such substantial assistance. Such a construction of the statute assures that the power to impose sentence remains in the judiciary.

In Hardin v. State, the defendant contended that § 16-13-31(e), which makes it a felony to knowingly possess a mixture containing methamphetamine that exceeds twenty-eight grams, violated equal protection of the laws because it contained no purity requirement. The lack of this requirement, the defendant claimed, resulted in a disparate treatment of drug traffickers based on nothing more than the type of drug involved. The defendant's argument failed, according to the court, because the General Assembly is under no duty to treat all drugs and drug offenders the same and because the statute treats all traffickers in methamphetamine equally. The Generally Assembly can rationally employ different means to respond to the problems created by different drugs.

3. Actus Reus

a. Generally

The actus reus element for each of the trafficking offenses is similar: the selling, manufacturing, delivering, bringing into this state, or having possession of the requisite amount of contraband. It should be noted that the trafficking offenses, except for manufacturing methamphetamine or amphetamine, require proof of a threshold amount of the contraband. Thus, there must be at least 28 grams of cocaine; at least four grams of illegal drugs such as morphine, opium, or heroin; more than 10 pounds of marijuana; at least 200 grams of methaqualone; at least 28 grams of methamphetamine or amphetamine; or at least 28 grams of MDMA or ecstasy for the offense to be considered a trafficking offense.

There is no requirement in § 16-13-31 that the state allege and prove that a certain individual distributed the contraband. Proof of possession alone is sufficient to establish a violation of the statute.

Since trafficking may be committed in more than one way, it is sufficient for the state to show that it was committed in any one of the separate ways listed in the indictment, even if the indictment uses the conjunctive rather than disjunctive form. Thus, where the evidence is sufficient to show that the defendant violated § 16-13-31 in at least one of the ways alleged in the indictment, there is no fatal variance.

Where an indictment uses the conjunctive form but the trial court instructs the jury in the disjunctive pursuant to the language of § 16-13-31, there is no fatal variance between the instruction and the language of the indictment when the trial court also instructs the jury to review the indictment for the exact statement of the charge. Moreover, if it is proven that the defendant violated § 16-13-31 in either of the ways alleged in the indictment, he may be convicted.

Where an indictment charges a defendant with committing the offense of trafficking in only one way, a jury charge on the alternative ways by which trafficking may be committed does not constitute reversible error where the trial court has properly limited the jury's consideration of the evidence to the offense charged in the indictment.

A defendant can commit the crime of trafficking in one manner, by being involved with more than 28 grams of contraband. The quantity of contraband above 28 grams affects sentencing, however, not the manner in which the crime was committed. Thus, even where an indictment charges a defendant with trafficking in 200 grams or more of contraband, a jury instruction on trafficking in 28 grams or more would not constitute an erroneous instruction on a crime not alleged in the indictment.

Section 16-13-31(e)(2) treats pure amphetamine and a mixture containing amphetamine equally. It does not establish two different methods of trafficking based on the purity of the drug. Thus, where the state has charged the defendant with "trafficking in amphetamine," a jury instruction that trafficking in amphetamine may be accomplished by possessing "amphetamine or any mixture of amphetamine" would not create the possibility that the defendant could be convicted of an offense not charged.

By enacting § 16-13-31(b), the General Assembly clearly authorized a trafficking conviction based upon knowing possession of four or more grams of opium. Although a defendant may disagree that such possession establishes trafficking, the clear statutory language would govern his case.

b. The "Mixture" Containing the Controlled Substance

Despite compelling arguments that it was an unconstitutional classification scheme to impose greater punishment based on the total amount of "mixture" possessed, rather than on the total amount of cocaine possessed, and that it was irrational to punish less severely the possessor of 27 grams of pure cocaine than the possessor of 10 grams of cocaine in 20 grams of noncontraband, the Georgia Supreme Court in Lavelle v. State found the scheme in § 16-13-31 to be rationally related to the objectives of the legislature.

The Georgia appellate courts announced that part of the forbidden conduct under the trafficking in cocaine statute was the possession of any amount of cocaine in a "mixture" in which the total weight of the "mixture" was 28 grams or more.

In 1985, the legislature, despite the Georgia Supreme Court's construction of § 16-13-31(a) in Lavelle, struck the existing subsection and substituted in lieu thereof a new subsection (a). The legislature, apparently persuaded by the defendant's arguments in Lavelle, chose to omit the "mixture" language from both the description of the offense of trafficking in cocaine and from the penalty for trafficking in cocaine.

In Robinson v. State, Georgia Supreme Court held that when a statute making described conduct a crime is repealed prior to final judgment on a conviction, the repeal ends the prosecution if the legislature has not provided otherwise in a saving clause. In Robinson, the defendant was charged with the offense of trafficking in a mixture containing cocaine on February 5, 1985. On March 27, 1985, the legislature repealed the "mixture" language without including a saving clause. Thus, the defendant's conduct was no longer defined by the legislature as trafficking in cocaine; therefore, the prosecution in the case was at an end before the trial.

However, since the reversal of a conviction upon the authority of Robinson is the result of "trial error," i.e., a faulty or flawed indictment, rather than of evidentiary insufficiency, a second indictment omitting the "mixture" language would not constitute double jeopardy, and the retrial of the defendant would not be barred. In Bassett v. State, after the defendant's conviction was vacated upon the authority of Robinson, the defendant was reindicted and again convicted of trafficking in cocaine based on an indictment that omitted the "mixture" language that rendered the previous indictment faulty. On appeal, the defendant again contended that he was being convicted of an offense which did not exist at the time the conduct in question occurred. However, with the omission of the "mixture" language from the second indictment, the court held that the act of knowingly bringing into the state or knowingly being in possession of more than 200 grams of cocaine constituted the offense of trafficking in cocaine both before and after the 1985 amendment to § 16-13-31.

It should be noted that the word "mixture" need not be recited in the indictment for the indictment to be considered faulty under the Robinson rule. If the word "substance" is used in an indictment as a synonym for "mixture," that indictment is as faulty under Robinson as an indictment using the word "mixture."

Although the Court of Appeals in Barrett v. State upheld the rule stated in Robinson v. State, it perceived the rule in a slightly different manner. In Barrett, the offense involved 428 grams of a mixture containing cocaine, of which 80 percent, or 342.4 grams, was proved to be pure cocaine. The court held that while clearly after July 1, 1985, the legislature no longer regarded as trafficking in cocaine the possession of an undetermined and perhaps infinitesimal amount of cocaine in a mixture, it was equally clear the legislature continued to regard, as trafficking in cocaine, the selling, manufacturing, delivering or bringing into this state and possession of 342.4 grams of pure cocaine, as was proved in this case. Thus, for a mixture containing an undetermined amount of cocaine, the prosecution would abate. For a mixture containing a determined amount of cocaine which violated the statute, even though the offense was redefined and harsher criminal sanctions reenacted, the prosecution would not abate. This perception of the Robinson rule was overruled by the Georgia Supreme Court in Gonzalez v. Abbott, because it conflicted with the court's decision in Bassett v. Lemacks. In Bassett, although there was proof at trial of a sufficient amount of pure cocaine in the "mixture" to violate § 16-13-31, the court held that the defendant's conviction for trafficking had to be set aside because the conduct with which he was charged and convicted, i.e., possessing "a mixture containing cocaine," was no longer defined as a crime in the statute at the time of his conviction. Thus, the prosecution in the case had abated.

As in Robinson, the defendant in Nichols v. State was indicted under former § 16-13-31(a) and was convicted after the statutory change. However, the defendant was charged with and found guilty of unlawfully and actually possessing "more than 28 grams of cocaine," not 28 grams of a mixture containing cocaine. Thus the defendant's conviction was authorized under the redefinition of the crime of trafficking in cocaine, as well as under former § 16-13-31(a), and was not violative of the mandate of Robinson.

In Gonzalez v. Abbott, the Eleventh Circuit Court of Appeals certified two questions of law to the Georgia Supreme Court to determine first, whether a conspiracy to traffick conviction may come under the Robinson rule, and second, whether such a conviction may come under the rule even though the indictment specifically alleged a quantity pertinent to the overt act element of conspiracy. The Georgia Supreme Court answered yes to both questions. Guided by the answers of the Georgia Supreme Court, the Eleventh Circuit Court of Appeals, based on the invalidity of the indictment, reversed the denial of the petitioner's habeas relief with regard to his conviction for conspiracy to traffick in cocaine.

In order to supersede and abolish the rule of common law stated by the Supreme Court of Georgia in the case of Robinson v. State, the 1987 legislature enacted § 16-1-11. This Code section provides that the repeal or amendment of any criminal statute will not affect or abate the status as a crime of any criminal act occurring prior to the effective date of the repeal or amendment. Nor will the prosecution for any criminal act be abated as the result of the repeal or amendment unless the legislature expressly declares otherwise.

It should also be noted that the 1986 legislature amended § 16-13-31(a) to provide punishments for trafficking in certain quantities of cocaine or of any "mixture" with a purity of 10 percent or more of cocaine. Where the "mixture" is of a purity of less than 10 percent, a person commits the felony offense of trafficking in cocaine, and shall be punished accordingly, if the total weight of the mixture multiplied by the percentage of cocaine contained in the mixture exceeds any of the quantities of cocaine specified in § 16-13-31(a)(1).

Thus, § 16-13-31 currently defines two methods of committing the crime of trafficking. One method deals with pure cocaine and the other with mixtures containing the statutorily required percentage of cocaine. In Barnett v. State, the grand jury returned a trafficking count within the indictment which specifically averred that trafficking had occurred due to the defendant's possession of 28 grams or more of (pure) cocaine; the count did not include an averment that trafficking occurred due to the defendant's possession of a mixture containing at least the statutorily required percentage of cocaine. The uncontroverted testimony of the crime lab chemist established that the substance analyzed had a total mixture weight of 33.9 grams and was 82.5 percent cocaine. Accordingly, the total weight of pure cocaine found in the mixture was only 27.9675 grams; less than the 28 grams averred in the trafficking count of the indictment. The court held that as only one means of offense commission was averred in the trafficking count of the grand jury's indictment and as the evidence at trial was insufficient to prove that trafficking had been committed in that manner, a fatal variance occurred.

In Byers v. State, the defendants were indicted and convicted for knowingly possessing "more than 28 grams of cocaine." Two bags of white powder, one with a gross weight of 31.7 grams and the other with a gross weight of 54.6 grams, were tested at the state crime laboratory. Although the forensic chemist who tested the substances testified that the test used did not indicate the presence of anything other than cocaine, he admitted that the test did not determine if certain commonly used adulterants were present in the substances, and that what percentage of the substances was pure cocaine "would be shear [sic] speculation." On these facts, the court held there was not sufficient evidence for a rational trier of fact to conclude that the defendants possessed at least 28 grams of pure cocaine.

In Bellamy v. State, the defendant asserted that because the forensic chemist who tested the drugs was unable to say whether the methamphetamine was pure or a mixture, there was a fatal variance between the indictment, which alleged that the substance was a mixture, and the proof at trial. The court found this assertion to be absurd and held that since § 16-13-31 treats pure methamphetamine and a mixture containing methamphetamine equally, any variance in the proof at trial regarding whether the methamphetamine was pure or a mixture was not fatal.

In Clark v. State, the court held that the absence of the word "purity" from the trafficking indictment did not render the indictment void. The court found that there is no substantive difference between an allegation that one knowingly possessed "any mixture with a purity of 10 percent or more of cocaine" and an allegation that one knowingly possessed "a mixture containing 10 percent or more of cocaine." They mean the same thing.

In Hill v. State, the state mixed the evidence from individual containers before testing. The trial court charged that the jury had to find that the defendant possessed 28 grams of methamphetamine, not a mixture thereof, in order to convict him for trafficking. This instruction set a higher standard of proof than required by the indictment. Because it was impossible to determine how much of the materials was methamphetamine and how much may have been simply ephedrine or something else, there was insufficient evidence to support a conviction based upon the jury charge. Nor was there sufficient evidence to support a trafficking conviction as alleged in the indictment. The defendant did not possess the mixture sent to the lab for testing. He merely possessed the component parts of that mixture. When the officer combined the components, it became impossible to determine if the defendant had possessed 28 grams of methamphetamine or even a 28-gram mixture containing methamphetamine.

c. Actual or Constructive Possession

Prior to 1988, § 16-13-31 prohibited knowing, "actual" possession of cocaine, illegal drugs, or marijuana. There were a number of cases ruling on what constituted "actual" possession. In Evans v. State, the court held that the legislature did not intend the phrase "actual possession" as found in the statute to mean that a person would be holding the controlled substance in his hand or have it physically on his person. Also, the legislature did not intend for a person to have the large amounts of a controlled substance that are proscribed by statute "on his person" in order to constitute actual possession. In most instances it would be physically impossible to have such large amounts on one's person. In Barrett v. State, the court held that "actual possession" referred not merely to physical custody but referred to actual active participation in the possession of such substances so as to be a party to the crime of trafficking.

From these cases it appeared that the courts ceased to distinguish "actual" from "constructive" possession. As a result of this lack of distinction between the two types of possession, the trial courts were instructing juries that they could find defendants guilty of trafficking based on their "actual" or "constructive" possession of a controlled substance, even though § 16-13-31 required "actual" possession. In Lockwood v. State, the Court of Appeals found no error in the trial court's charge to the jury that they were authorized to convict the defendant of trafficking in cocaine if the jury found beyond a reasonable doubt that he had actual or constructive possession of the cocaine. In Hamilton v. State, the court held that possession of a controlled substance may be either actual or constructive for purposes of a criminal prosecution under § 16-13-31. In Blaise v. State, the defendant was found guilty of trafficking for his "joint constructive possession of . . . cocaine." However, in Lockwood v. State, the Supreme Court in reviewing the Court of Appeals decision held that § 16-13-31 clearly required a finding of "actual" possession and not "constructive" possession. The Supreme Court's decision applied retroactively.

In 1988, the issue was ultimately resolved by the legislature when it eliminated the requirement that a person be in "actual" possession of a controlled substance in order to be found guilty of violating § 16-13-31. In view of this 1988 amendment, it is clear that the Supreme Court's decision in Lockwood is no longer controlling authority. Now, possession may be either actual or constructive, and it is not error for a trial court to give jury instructions on both types of possession. Indeed, where the central issue for the jury is whether the defendants had actual or constructive possession of the contraband, the trial court must charge the jury on the law of possession. However, when an indictment alleges only actual possession, it is reversible error for a trial court to charge the jury on "actual or constructive possession." Notwithstanding an indictment upon actual possession alone, when the evidence indisputably shows that the defendant knowingly had direct physical control over the contraband and not merely the power and intention to exercise dominion or control over it, a trial court's charge to the jury that it is authorized to convict the defendant of trafficking based on a finding of either actual or constructive possession does not constitute harmful error. Furthermore, when one is charged with conspiring with others to traffick in cocaine, it obviously is not error for the trial court to charge on constructive as well as actual possession.

The presumption that contraband is in the possession of the owner or driver of an automobile in no way bars the passenger from also being found guilty of possession because if two or more persons share actual or constructive possession of a thing, possession is joint.

Although each quantity of cocaine seized from a defendant may have been less than the statutory amount required to constitute trafficking and although each may have been in a different location, if it is shown that the defendant had actual possession of one quantity and constructive possession of the other quantity and if the two quantities combined meet the statutory amount required to constitute trafficking, this evidence would be sufficient to support a trafficking charge.

A person can not be in constructive possession of an entire kilogram of cocaine when he conducts an inspection, because he indisputably lacks the intention to exercise dominion or control over it until he has tested the sample. Upon tendering the purchase price to the seller, a person clearly possesses the intent to exercise control over all of the cocaine, but unless he acquires the power of control over it, he does not constructively possess it. Without proof of this power of control, the evidence would be insufficient to support a conviction for trafficking in cocaine.

In Hortman v. State, the defendant contended that the state failed to prove venue in Bibb County for the prosecution of his trafficking offense. He argued that since the element of dominion or control was cut off by law enforcement officials in Texas, no actual or constructive possession ever occurred in Bibb County. Law enforcement officers in Texas confiscated the boxes containing the marijuana and assumed control over them. Thereafter, notwithstanding the defendant's intent to exercise dominion and control over the marijuana, he no longer had the power to do so. Nor did any of his co-indictees have that power so as to make the defendant a party to the crime of trafficking. The evidence indisputably showed that it was Texas authorities who resealed the boxes of marijuana and sent them to the drug task force in Georgia via a different air freight carrier. Thus, the defendant and his co-conspirators lost control over the marijuana while it was still in Texas. Because the act of "knowingly bringing" a trafficking quantity of marijuana into Georgia was an essential element of the trafficking count in the indictment, and there was no proof of that element, the court held that the defendant's conviction for this offense could not stand.

d. Proof of Amount Possessed

Except for the trafficking offense of manufacturing methamphetamine or amphetamine, the state must show that the contraband weighed the threshold amount.

Where the state's electronic balance scales on which the contraband is weighed has a margin of error of less than one percent and the scales show that the contraband weighed the threshold amount, it is for the jury to decide whether the contraband weighed slightly more or slightly less than the threshold amount.

4. Mens Rea

Section 16-13-31 explicitly requires as the mens rea that the defendant must know he possesses the substance and he must know its identity. The statute is not, however, reasonably subject to the construction that the defendant must know or should know that the substance possessed weighs at least 28 grams.

An indictment charging a defendant with trafficking does not need to explicitly charge that he "knowingly" possessed the contraband, where it charges that the defendant had the contraband "under his control," which would be sufficient to infer the necessary criminal intent and to put the defendant on notice of the crime for which he is charged.

The knowledge element of a violation of § 16-13-31 can be proved by demonstrating either actual knowledge or deliberate ignorance. Deliberate ignorance is based on the alternative to the actual knowledge requirement at common law that if a party has his suspicions aroused but then deliberately omits to make further enquiries, because he wishes to remain in ignorance, he is deemed to have knowledge. A deliberate ignorance instruction is appropriate in a trafficking case when the facts support the inference that the defendant was aware of a high probability of the existence of the fact in question and purposely contrived to avoid learning all of the facts in order to have a defense in the event of a subsequent prosecution. Such an instruction does not obviate the state's burden of proving that the defendant had actual knowledge of the criminal activity.

In the prosecution of trafficking offenses wherein knowing possession constitutes an element of the crime, knowledge, of course, may be shown by circumstances which should excite suspicion in the mind of an ordinarily prudent man.

The defendant's testimony that he did not know the substance was in his possession does not mandate a finding of insufficient evidence that he knowingly possessed it. Rather, whether or not to believe such testimony is a question for the jury.

While mere presence at the scene of a crime is insufficient to convict one of being a party to the crime, presence, companionship, and conduct before and after the offense are circumstances from which one's participation in the criminal intent may be inferred. In Bowe v. State, the court held that although the defendant offered an explanation for his presence in the motel room when arrested, the jury was authorized to disbelieve that testimony and to infer from his presence and companionship with his co-defendants that he was guilty beyond a reasonable doubt of trafficking in cocaine.

Evidence of a separate earlier offense of possession of cocaine with intent to distribute is admissible to show bent of mind or course of conduct in the trial of a trafficking charge. However, the state must not merely submit into evidence a certified copy of the defendant's prior indictment and guilty plea to a charge of possession of cocaine. The state must also state the purpose for which the conviction is offered and must set forth the facts demonstrating the similarity between the offenses.

A jury's verdict finding the defendant guilty only of having the intention to traffick in cocaine amounts to an acquittal. There can be no finding of guilt without an inculpatory act in the case.

5. Similar Offenses

Where evidence is proffered showing prior or subsequent similar offenses of trafficking committed by the defendant, this evidence is admissible to show identity, plan, scheme, bent of mind, and course of conduct. However, before this evidence can be admitted, the trial court must conduct a hearing at which specified affirmative showings are made, and it must determine in the record that these showings have been made satisfactorily. Also, the trial court, upon request, must give a limiting instruction to the jury about the specific purpose for which this evidence can be considered. The trial court is not required to make an express finding that the probative value of the similar offense outweighs its prejudicial impact.

Where the date alleged in the indictment is not an essential averment, evidence of similar acts occurring within the statute of limitation is evidence of the crime charged and does not fall within the ambit of the rule relating to notice of the state's intention to present evidence of similar transactions.

6. Conspiracy

In Meyers v. State, the court held that since the ultimate purpose of the conspiracy was to sell, not to possess, marijuana, and since the possession and sale of a controlled substance are separate and distinct crimes, the offense of conspiracy to commit the offense of trafficking in marijuana by conspiring to sell more than 100 pounds but less than 2,000 pounds of marijuana was not committed when the conspirators first possessed the marijuana.

In Brown v. State, the court held that proof of a criminal agreement to import has no direct or necessary connection to proof of knowing and actual possession of the substance eventually imported. The prosecution of the federal crime of importation thus required proof of a fact not required in the prosecution for the possession offense and vice versa, and was therefore not a bar to the subsequent state prosecution. The federal conspiracy crime was not a lesser included offense of the state crime. The two crimes, whether the criminal agreement or the object of the agreement, were wholly different crimes.

It is reasonable to infer that one who conspires to import a large quantity of heroin into this country does so as part of a greater plan or scheme to traffic in heroin. This inference establishes a sufficient logical connection between the two crimes so that proof of the federal conspiracy crime tends to prove the trafficking crime. Thus, evidence of a defendant's prior federal conviction for conspiring to import a large quantity of heroin into this country is admissible as similar transaction evidence in his trial for trafficking in heroin.

When one is charged with conspiring with others to traffick in cocaine, it is not error for the trial court to charge on constructive as well as actual possession.

Evidence introduced on an invalid conspiracy to traffick in cocaine count is admissible on a valid conspiracy to traffick in marijuana count where it is relevant as evidence of the defendant's intent under the marijuana count.

Evidence corroborating a co-conspirator's testimony that the defendant actively participated in the conspiracy does not need to prove every element of the crime. It need only connect the defendant with the crime. Evidence of the defendant's conduct before, during and after the crime may be used to corroborate the co-conspirator's testimony.

7. Party to Crime

In Crenshaw v. State, the court held that a person could be a party to the crime of trafficking in the cocaine which was in another person's actual possession only if the person intentionally aided or abetted the other person so as to be in constructive possession of the contraband. The mere fact that a person may have known that another person was carrying cocaine would not authorize a finding that he aided and abetted him in the offense of trafficking. Likewise, a person's prior presence on a flight with the other person was not sufficient to show that he was a party to the crime.

"Actual possession," proof of which authorizes a conviction for trafficking, refers not merely to physical custody but refers to actual active participation in the possession of such substances so as to be a party to the crime of trafficking. Proof of actual possession may be by circumstantial evidence.

C. Sale

1. Agent vs. Principal

It is not necessary that the state prove the defendant was the principal in a drug transaction. In several cases the defendant argued that an agent does not actually control or sell the substance, and thus cannot be punished under a statute which seeks to punish the seller or the possessor. The court rejected the argument under the provision of the criminal code defining parties to a crime. One may be convicted of selling marijuana or a controlled substance even if he only acts as a procuring agent for another. Also, one may be convicted of selling a controlled substance even if he only acts as a lookout for the seller or as "human collateral" until the seller returns with the controlled substance.

The defendant's intent in agreeing to sell the controlled substance, whether real or feigned, is for the jury; and the jury's finding that the defendant was a willing participant in the illegal drug transaction will not be set aside unless clearly erroneous.

While the evidence surrounding a sale may show that the defendant never handled the money or contraband or made incriminating remarks, the jury can consider the defendant's involvement in a subsequent drug transaction to determine his intent to be an active participant in the sale and not merely a bystander.

2. Completion of Sale

The interesting question of first impression of when the sale of a drug is complete for purposes of the criminal law came before the Court of Appeals in Robinson v. State. In this case, the defendant was arrested after delivering the drug to a GBI agent but before any money changed hands. He appealed his conviction, asserting that while the indictment alleged a sale, the only act demonstrated by the evidence was a delivery. The court, however, concluded that dictum in a prior case was persuasive in demonstrating that a sale is completed when a seller delivers the goods. The court pointed out that this is the general rule in the drug context, citing an old federal case as authority.

In Willis v. State, the court held that it was not error for the trial court to fail to give the defendant's requested charge on the affirmative defense of abandonment of effort to commit a crime. The evidence showed that the defendant completed the crime of sale of cocaine by handing it to his wife and telling her to complete the sale. Because the defendant aided or abetted in the sale or procured another to make the sale, he was a party to the crime of selling cocaine and could be convicted thereof.

3. Circumstantial Evidence of Sale

In Hammond v. State, the court held that circumstantial evidence that the informant obtained the cocaine from the defendant considered with the officer's description of the monitored conversation between the informant and the defendant as well as his testimony concerning the defendant's possession and denial of possession of the money provided to the informant was sufficient to support the defendant's conviction for selling cocaine.

4. Possession

Neither actual nor constructive possession is an element of the offense of selling contraband.

5. Similar Offenses

Evidence of a previous cocaine sale is relevant to a defendant's intent and modus operandi and is admissible. However, the state's establishment of a prima facie case of similarity between the defendant's prior conviction for sale of cocaine and his subsequent sale of cocaine for which he is being tried does not satisfy its obligation to present proof on that issue at trial. There must be some evidence to establish between the prior crime and the crime on trial such similarity to and logical connection with each other so that proof of the prior crime tends to establish, by evidence of identity, bent of mind, or intent, the commission of the crime for which the defendant is on trial. The introduction of a certified copy of the defendant's prior conviction for the sale of cocaine is insufficient by itself. It should be noted that an independent sale of cocaine does not have to occur prior to the sale of cocaine of which the defendant is being tried to be admissible as other crimes or similar transactions evidence. The fact the independent sale occurred subsequently at most goes to the weight of the evidence and not its admissibility.

Proof of subsequent possession of some unused quantity of contraband is a sufficiently similar offense to be admissible in a trial for the sale of contraband. However, evidence that the defendant was in possession only of that cocaine which he ingested is not sufficiently similar to the sale of cocaine to be admissible in the defendant's trial for the sale of cocaine. Evidence of mere use of a drug (as opposed to its possession in some unused quantity) is not probative of motive, intent, plan or scheme to sell the drug; it is not sufficiently similar to the offense of the sale of that drug. Likewise, evidence of the defendant's prior drug sales is not sufficiently similar to the defendant's use of drugs to be admissible in his trial for possession of drugs in his bodily fluid. There are no significant similarities between the sale and the use of drugs, and the fact that the same type of drug was involved in both offenses does not render them similar.

The state must show a factual similarity between the defendant's "other" act of possessing drugs and the alleged act of selling drugs in order for evidence of the "other" act to be admissible to prove the defendant's identity as the seller of the drugs. It is the factual similarity of the defendant's possession of drugs on different occasions which renders it admissible to show his identity, and the differing intent with which he may have possessed the drugs on those separate occasions is not a bar to its admissibility for that limited purpose.

It should be noted that the trial court, upon request, must give a limiting instruction to the jury about the specific purpose for which the similar offense evidence can be considered.

A trial court has no authority to force the state to accept a defendant's offered stipulation of a prior conviction.

Evidence about an undercover officer's discussions with the defendant for possible future sales of cocaine that occurred during the crime on trial is not similar transaction evidence but is instead evidence of the circumstances of the transactions on trial, and is therefore admissible without the state giving notice of its intent to introduce such evidence. If the defendant's statement that he had sold cocaine on other occasions explains his involvement in the crime charged and is an integral part of his statements to police, his statement is admissible regardless of whether or not the separate crimes to which he confessed would otherwise be admissible as exceptions to the other transactions rule.

D. Delivery or Distribution

Section 16-13-30(b), which prohibits the unlawful delivery or distribution of cocaine, was not intended by the legislature to encompass the transmission of cocaine metabolites to a fetus that occurs when a pregnant woman ingests cocaine. This Code provision does not apply in these circumstances because at the time any transfer of cocaine metabolites takes place from the mother, the fetus is not considered a "person" within the meaning of the Controlled Substances Act. Also, the ordinary, logical, and common meanings of the terms "deliver" and "distribute" encompass only transfers that take place between one person and another person, outside the bodies of the persons involved.

Included within the definition of "delivery" set forth in § 16-13-21(7) is the "attempted transfer from one person to another." Although an attempt to commit a violation of the Georgia Controlled Substances Act is prohibited under § 16-13-33, the statutory definition of distribution under § 16-13-30 also includes the "attempt to transfer."

E. Merger of Offenses

Important Notice about Repudiation of Actual or Same Evidence Test: The Georgia Supreme Court repudiated the actual evidence test in Drinkard v. Walker, 281 Ga. 211, 636 S.E.2d 530 (2006), because it found this test to be inconsistent with the statutory framework governing the prohibition against multiple convictions for included offenses in Georgia. This inconsistency resulted in years of confusion and unpredictable results. In its place, the court adopted the required evidence test and overruled any prior case law that is inconsistent with it. Thus, any prior case law applying the actual evidence test is no longer controlling and should not be relied upon to determine whether one offense is included in another under § 16-1-6(1). The discussion of such case law is included below only insofar as it may still be applicable to pending prosecutions that arose before the Drinkard decision. See MULTIPLE CONVICTIONS, II. Tests to Determine Presence of Multiple Convictions, for a complete discussion of the Drinkard decision.

The Georgia Supreme Court dealt with a unit of prosecution issue in Tabb v. State. The defendant asserted that simultaneous possession of different Schedule II drugs constituted but one possession crime. The court rejected the argument, concluding that the General Assembly intended multiple punishment here. The court cited authority from prior Georgia decisions and elsewhere.

Where the averments of each count of an indictment refer to a different date on which the offense was alleged to have been committed, the date is made an essential averment of the transaction, and each count of the indictment is distinguishable. Thus, where the defendant is charged in three counts with having committed separate acts of selling cocaine on different dates, consecutive sentences may be imposed on each count.

A defendant cannot be convicted of both trafficking and possession with intent to distribute where the only evidence used to prove both offenses is the same quantity of drugs. In Iglesias v. State, the court held that the charge of possession with intent to distribute was a lesser included offense of trafficking as a matter of fact because the evidence required to convict the defendant of trafficking was the only evidence showing possession with intent to distribute. Thus, the defendant could not be convicted of both cocaine trafficking and also possession of cocaine with intent to distribute. However, where a portion of the drugs is used to prove the trafficking offense and the distinct remainder is used to prove the possession offense, there is no merger and the defendant may be convicted of both offenses. In Cassie v. State, the court held that there was no merger between the offense of trafficking and the offense of possession with intent to distribute, because the jury was authorized to find that the defendant was in actual possession of more than 28 grams of cocaine, parted with 27.6 grams to be sold, and retained possession of 19.2 grams. Likewise, in Timberlake v. State, the court held that there was no merger where, from the evidence that one quantity was larger than the other and that the two quantities were packaged separately and had slightly different purities, a jury could have concluded that the two quantities were intended to be utilized in different transactions.

A defendant cannot be convicted of both trafficking and possession with intent to distribute where both offenses arise from the same conduct. The intent to distribute which is necessary to the crime of possession of a substance under § 16-13-30(b) is satisfied by the reasonable inference that a person who possesses more than the 28 grams of cocaine under § 16-13-31 intends to distribute it. Therefore, the distribution offense contains no unique elements not satisfied by a trafficking offense, and the distribution offense would be included in the trafficking offense. Accordingly, consistent with the required evidence test adopted in the Drinkard decision, the two offenses merge.

A defendant cannot be convicted of both the sale and the possession of drugs where the only evidence used to prove both offenses is the same quantity of drugs. However, where the portion of the drugs actually sold is used to prove the sale and the distinct remainder is used to prove possession with intent to sell, there is no merger and the defendant may be convicted of both offenses. Likewise, when the defendant intends to sell only part and not all of the drugs in his possession, selling some and retaining the rest, the elements of both sale and simple possession have been satisfied as separate offenses, and the defendant may be convicted of both offenses.

Where cocaine with different trafficking weights is found in two separate locations in the defendant's home, the defendant should be charged with only one incident of trafficking in cocaine. The defendant's possession of all the cocaine in his home at the time of the incident is part of one continuous criminal act. Where the defendant has been erroneously charged and convicted of two trafficking offenses under these circumstances, his convictions will merge, and he will be susceptible to only one punishment.

In another case, however, the Court of Appeals held that double jeopardy did not attach to the defendant's prosecution for possession with intent to distribute in the county of his residence as a result of his guilty plea to possession with intent to distribute in another county. The defendant's act of possessing the marijuana with intent to distribute was not one continuous transaction. The defendant engaged in two separate courses of conduct at different times and locations with distinct quantities of contraband, even though he may have at some earlier time possessed all the marijuana in his home. The defendant himself removed a portion of the marijuana to a different location for a different purpose and was not in possession and control of all the marijuana at the time of either incident. The trial court therefore did not err in denying the defendant's motion for discharge and acquittal on the ground of double jeopardy.

Where the defendant is charged with possession with intent to distribute, it is not error for the trial court to charge the jury that should it find the defendant not guilty of this offense it would be authorized to consider whether the defendant committed the lesser offense of possession. Conviction of the greater offense of possession with intent to distribute renders harmless any error in a charge given for the lesser included offense of possession.

Where it is clear from the indictment and the evidence presented at trial that both the possession and the possession with intent to distribute convictions are based upon the same evidence, the trial court must merge the convictions and enter a sentence for only one of them.

In a trafficking case, where a jury issue exists regarding the type of possession, actual or constructive, exercised by the defendant, the lesser offense of possession is reasonably raised by the evidence and it is prejudicial error for the trial court to fail to instruct the jury on the lesser offense pursuant to the defendant's written request. Where an indictment for trafficking alleges that the defendant possessed more than 28 grams of cocaine, simple possession of cocaine is a lesser offense included as a matter of fact in the greater indicted offense of trafficking. Consequently, a written request to charge on simple possession would be adjusted to the evidence, and the trial court's refusal to give it would be error.

A defendant is not entitled to a charge on the lesser included offense of possession, where the evidence shows the completion of the greater offense, such as the possession of drugs with intent to distribute, the sale of drugs, the growing of marijuana, or trafficking, and there is no evidence raising the lesser offense of possession.

Possession of marijuana is not a necessary element of the crime of knowingly manufacturing marijuana by cultivating or planting, and so misdemeanor possession is not a lesser offense included in the crime of manufacturing as a matter of law, within the meaning of § 16-1-6. Similarly, possession of more than one ounce of marijuana is not, as a matter of law, a lesser included offense of manufacturing marijuana. Also, where the evidence required to establish the manufacturing charge is not required to prove possession, the two crimes do not merge as a matter of fact.

Merely because a conviction for possession with intent to distribute may result in life imprisonment is not controlling in determining whether such an offense is a greater or lesser included offense of trafficking.

The offense of abandonment is not a lesser included offense of possession but rather a separate offense. While it is possible that under the evidence the defendant committed the separate act of abandonment, that would not have any mitigating effect on his potential criminal culpability of the previous act of possession. It follows that a trial court may refuse a request to charge in connection with the entirely separate crime of abandonment.

In Davis v. State, the Court of Appeals held that attempted marijuana possession is a lesser included offense of marijuana possession, rejecting the defendant's assertion that attempt was not a lesser included offense within possession because the two offenses were defined in separate code sections and because they carried the same punishment. The court concluded that the attempt provision of the Georgia Controlled Substances Act (§ 16-13-33), rather than defining a separate and distinct crime, is exclusively a punishment provision designed to replace the punishment provision of the general attempt statute and concluded that the punishment aspect of an offense is irrelevant in the determination of whether that offense is included in another.

In contrast to the general conspiracy statute, which provides that the crime of conspiracy merges with the object crime when it is committed, conspiracy to possess marijuana with intent to distribute is not a lesser included offense of possession as a matter of fact or as a matter of law. They are separate crimes. Thus, an acquittal of the conspiracy offense is not an acquittal of the possession offense. In treating drug conspiracy on a par with drug possession, the legislature apparently made the policy decision that it was just as serious an offense.

Apparently, if one is indicted for conspiracy to violate the Georgia Controlled Substances Act under the general conspiracy statute and is also indicted for the object crime, the likely result will be the merger of the conspiracy into the object crime.

Where the evidence shows that the defendant's involvement in a drug transaction exceeded the use of mere language to solicit someone to commit the crime, criminal solicitation is not a lesser included offense of trafficking as a matter of law or fact. Thus, the defendant would not be entitled to a charge on criminal solicitation as a lesser included offense.

The offenses of driving while having marijuana or its metabolites present in the urine and possession of marijuana by ingestion merge as a matter of fact where there is no evidence independent of the blood analysis which shows any possession of marijuana by the defendant. Since all the evidence is used up in proving one crime, it is error for the trial court to sentence the defendant for both charges.

Convictions for possession of a drug-related object and possession of cocaine merge as a matter of fact where the only evidence used to establish the defendant's possession of the drug-related object is the circumstantial evidence used by the state to prove that he knowingly possessed cocaine residue on the object. Consequently, the trial court's failure to merge the two convictions and sentence the defendant only for possession of cocaine would constitute error.

F. Exemptions or Exceptions Under Controlled Substances Act

1. Burden of Producing Evidence of Exception

The Controlled Substances Act provides that the burden of coming forward with evidence of an exemption or an exception under the Act lies with the defendant. Thus, it is not part of the state's prima facie case that the defendant lies outside the statutory exceptions; rather, the defendant must present evidence that he is within one of the exceptions. A statutory exception amounts to an affirmative defense, with the initial burden of producing evidence to support the affirmative defense resting upon the defendant. Once a defendant raises the issue at trial, it is then incumbent upon the state to disprove the defense beyond a reasonable doubt.

2. Specific Exceptions Within Code

As for the specific exceptions, they are generally found within the Controlled Substances Act itself. However, exceptions may be found elsewhere in the Code. For example, there is an exception within the Dangerous Drug Act and an exception within the law regulating pharmacists and pharmacies which may be applicable in a prosecution under the Controlled Substances Act.

The specific exceptions which can be found in the Controlled Substances Act are to be found in § 16-13-35(b), which authorizes possession, manufacturing, dispensing, distribution and research by registered manufacturers, distributors, dispensers, and researchers, and in § 16-13-35(c), which authorizes possession for four groups of individuals: (1) employees of registered manufacturers and dispensers, (2) common carrier employees who possess in the usual course of business, (3) those who possess pursuant to a prescription written by an authorized person, and (4) those state officials who possess during the course of their employment. It should also be noted that § 16-13-52(d) grants the State Board of Pharmacy the power to authorize the possession of controlled substances for research purposes. Also, § 16-13-29.2 gives the State Board of Pharmacy the authority to exempt and control the sale of Schedule V controlled substances by rule. The Board's rules may allow the sale of these substances without the need for issuance of a prescription from a medical practitioner as long as they are sold only in a pharmacy.

3. Reverse Sting Operations

If legally maintained by law enforcement officers, controlled substances may be used by the officers in reverse sting operations. Since law enforcement officers are authorized by § 16-13-35(c)(4) to possess controlled substances while acting in the course of their official duties, there is no prohibition in the Controlled Substances Act against the retention and legal use of seized controlled substances not listed in Schedule I, so long as the owner of the drug is known and forfeiture proceedings have not been commenced. If the owner is unknown, however, the drug is summarily forfeited and must be destroyed in accordance with § 16-13-49(u)(1). This limitation effectively prevents a law enforcement agency, which possesses only summarily-forfeited controlled substances, from engaging in legal reverse sting operations. An agency would be able to engage in such operations only if it has properly identified, to the extent possible, the source of the drugs in its possession. However, because the failure to destroy a summarily-forfeited substance used in a reverse sting does not violate any of the defendant's constitutional rights, any evidence gathered by the police as a result of their use of the substance would not be subject to suppression. Moreover, the use of a drug in a reverse sting operation that the police should have destroyed earlier does not constitute police misconduct so outrageous that due process would require the reversal of the defendant's conviction.

4. Controlled Substances Therapeutic Research Program

Cancer and glaucoma patients participating in the Controlled Substances Therapeutic Research Program are immune from state prosecution for possession of marijuana as authorized by law. Physician, pharmacy, and pharmacist participants in this program are also immune from state prosecution for possession, distribution, and any other use of marijuana, which use is authorized by law.

5. Medical Necessity

The possession of marijuana which is purportedly being used for medicinal purposes but has not been prescribed by an authorized physician for one of the permitted therapeutic uses does not fall within any of the exceptions or immunities established by the General Assembly. Without evidence of a recognized exception or immunity for the defendant's possession of marijuana, a trial court may properly refuse to give a requested instruction on the defense of justification. Such an instruction could mislead the jury into believing that it could acquit the defendant if it finds that his conduct was justified because he thought that he derived some benefit from using the marijuana, notwithstanding the apparent illegality of possessing it.

The U. S. Supreme Court has held that there is no medical necessity exception for marijuana to the prohibitions in the federal Controlled Substances Act, even when a patient is seriously ill and lacks alternative avenues of relief. Although the Act does not explicitly abrogate the necessity defense, the court recognized that a medical necessity exception for marijuana is at odds with the terms of the Act and thus unavailable as a defense. The Act reflects a determination by Congress that marijuana has no medical benefits worthy of an exception outside the confines of a federal government-approved research project. Thus, medical necessity is not a defense to manufacturing and distributing marijuana.

6. Claim of Right

It has been held that in the absence of a defendant's claim of right to sell a substance, it is harmless error for a trial court to charge that any sale of a controlled substance is a violation of the Act (when the Act in fact provides for exceptions).

7. Religious Exemptions under Federal Law

In Gonzales v. O Centro Espirita Beneficente Uniao Do Vegetal, the federal government sought to prohibit a small religious sect from engaging in the practice of drinking a sacramental tea that contained a hallucinogen regulated under the federal Controlled Substances Act on the ground that the Act barred all use of the hallucinogen. The federal government contended that it had a compelling interest in the uniform application of the Controlled Substances Act, such that no exception to the ban on use of the hallucinogen could be made to accommodate the sect's sincere religious practice. Furthermore, it contended the regulatory regime established by the Act could not function with its necessary rigor and comprehensiveness if subjected to judicial exemptions.

Rejecting these contentions, the United States Supreme Court concluded that Congress's determination that the hallucinogen should be listed in Schedule I of the Controlled Substances Act did not provide a categorical answer that relieved the federal government of its obligation under the Religious Freedom Restoration Act (RFRA) to demonstrate that the compelling interest test was satisfied through application of the Controlled Substances Act to the particular claimant whose sincere exercise of religion was being substantially burdened. Moreover, the existence of statutory and regulatory exemptions for another Schedule I substance confirmed that the federal Controlled Substances Act did not preclude exceptions altogether and that the Act was amenable to judicially crafted exceptions. The court, therefore, found that the government did not demonstrate a compelling interest in the uniform application of the Controlled Substances Act by resting its argument on slippery-slope concerns that could be invoked in response to any RFRA claim for an exception to a generally applicable law, i.e., if the government makes an exception for one, it would have to make one for everyone; therefore, there are no exceptions. More specifically, the government failed to demonstrate that health concerns or the risk of diversion to recreational users provided a compelling interest in banning the sect's sacramental use of the hallucinogen.

G. Evidentiary Considerations

1. Chain of Custody

Because the substance at issue is generally analyzed by the State Crime Lab, the state must prove the substance tested was the same as the substance taken from the defendant. The current rule on proving chain of custody is derived from Pittman v. State and White v. State.

In Pittman, the court reversed a conviction for driving under the influence when the state had no proof of the chain of custody of the blood sample. The police officer who testified did not know by whom or by what means the sample was transmitted to the lab, or who received it there. "When a substance analyzed has passed through several hands its custody at all times should be accounted for. The evidence must not leave it to conjecture what has happened to it between the taking and the analysis."

The Supreme Court of Georgia in White clarified Pittman somewhat. In White, Gary Garner, a police officer, testified as to how he acquired the substance and the circumstances surrounding his subsequent delivery to the crime lab. The toxicologist who ran the tests and issued a report testified she had been given the substances by Garner. "In the absence of something to refute the conclusory statements of these witnesses, the testimony was sufficient to authorize the jury to find that Garner kept the items purchased from the accused . . . in his possession at all times until he delivered them to the [toxicologist.]" That was sufficient, according to the court, to prove chain of custody.

The appellate courts rarely reverse because the chain of custody was not adequately proven. If the evidence proves to a "reasonable certainty" the contraband given to the lab for analysis is the same as that taken from the defendant, and in the absence of any actual evidence (as opposed to speculation) of tampering, the chain of custody will be considered proven for purposes of appellate review. Meeks v. State is one of the rare cases where a conviction was reversed because the chain of custody was not adequately proven. In Meeks, the police officer testified the marijuana was placed in a briefcase and then turned over to the crime lab. He could not, however, remember what sort of container it was in, nor did he mark the container to show it contained evidence seized from the defendant.

Absent affirmative evidence of tampering, a crime lab and all its branch offices and employees are considered as a single link in the chain of custody. Since a chain of custody within the crime lab itself is not required, proof that the evidence was in the custody of the crime lab would establish the chain of custody.

Where there is no affirmative evidence of tampering or substitution, a missing link in the chain of custody does not alone require exclusion of the evidence. Thus, in Franklin v. State, where the testimony showed that the police placed the substance in a tamper-proof identifiable container and that the crime lab technician who tested the substance received it in the same container with no proof of tampering or substitution, the court held that the state met its burden of showing with reasonable certainty that the substance tested was the same as that seized, notwithstanding the fact that the individual who took the evidence from the police department to the crime lab was not identified.

2. Right to Independent Analysis of Substance

The Georgia Supreme Court in Patterson v. State held: "Where the defendant's conviction or acquittal is dependent upon the identification of the substance as contraband, due process of law requires that analysis of the substance not be left completely within the province of the state." The court further stated, however, that the defendant does not have an absolute, unqualified right to examine the evidence. Subsequent cases have defined the parameters of the right.

One of the first post-Patterson cases was Gilliland v. State. In a decision which reflected some of the factors the court considered important in ruling on a request for independent analysis, the court reversed the conviction. The court indicated the defendant's request came three months after he was indicted, one month after his motion to suppress was denied, and one month prior to trial. The request contained the name of the person the defendant wanted to administer the test and a statement that the defendant believed the state's test contained a substantial possibility of error.

The request for an independent analysis must be timely made. Furthermore, the defendant may waive his right to an independent analysis by not timely utilizing the court-ordered opportunity to conduct the analysis.

Unless a criminal defendant can show bad faith on the part of the police, the police's failure to preserve potentially useful evidence does not constitute a denial of due process of law. In Illinois v. Fisher, the United States Supreme Court held that where police testing indicated that the chemical makeup of the substance inculpated, not exculpated, the defendant and it was undisputed that police acted in good faith and in accord with their normal practice when it destroyed the substance seized from the defendant, who had been a fugitive for over 10 years, the defendant failed to establish a due process violation. The existence of a pending discovery request filed by the defendant over 10 years earlier did not eliminate the necessity of showing bad faith on the part of police. Furthermore, the applicability of the bad-faith requirement depended not on the centrality of the contested evidence to the prosecution's case or the defendant's defense but on the distinction between material exculpatory evidence and potentially useful evidence. Since the substance destroyed in this case was, at best, potentially useful evidence, the bad-faith requirement applied.

When the state destroys a defendant's urine sample despite its known exculpatory value and despite a court order granting him access to it, and the defendant is unable to obtain comparable evidence by other reasonably available means, the defendant's right to due process has been violated and the trial court may dismiss the drug charges against him. Since the sample is not merely potentially useful but rather is clearly exculpatory, the defendant does not have to show that the state acted in bad faith in order to prove a due process violation.

The right to analyze independently the substance is clearly not absolute. A conviction will not be reversed, therefore, even if the defendant was not permitted to conduct an independent analysis if there is no real dispute about the identity of the substance. In Birge v. State, the defendant's conviction was affirmed because there was no bona fide dispute about what the substance was. During the search the police asked the defendant to get the marijuana. He handed them a substance which tested positive for marijuana. There never was a claim that it was not marijuana, and there was no denial of due process not to permit an independent analysis.

In Staples v. State, because the defendant did not challenge the chemical properties of the substance identified by an expert nor claim that the seized substance, by its nature, misidentified him as the perpetrator, the court held that it was not an abuse of the trial court's discretion to refuse to appoint an independent expert chemist for the defendant.

3. Expert Evidence Regarding Identity of Substance

Unquestionably, the best way to prove that a substance is contraband is through the use of a crime lab report. If, for some reason, that is not an available option (perhaps the chain of custody cannot be proven), the state may prove the substance is contraband through the testimony of the officer who seized it, after the officer has been qualified as an expert on contraband identification. It lies in the trial court's sound discretion to decide whether a witness has the learning or experience to be qualified as an expert in the field of drug identification. The exercise of this discretion will not be disturbed unless manifestly abused.

The Court of Appeals has stated, however, that the identity of a substance need not be established by expert testimony. The officer who seized the contraband can establish the identity of the substance by relating facts known or observed by him. A crime scene technician, who is trained and qualified to test for contraband, can establish the identity of the substance by testifying that the results of the tests performed on the substance were positive for contraband. The identity of the substance can also be established by the defendant stipulating or testifying that the substance is contraband and by making no claim that the substance is something other than contraband. However, it has been held that without expert testimony identifying the substance as contraband, a defendant's admission that he possessed contraband is insufficient to authorize a finding, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the substance is contraband.

Positive field test results are alone sufficient to sustain a conviction for selling or possessing cocaine. Positive test results from the state crime lab are not required. Thus, regardless of whether the substance found in the exhibit and tested by the crime lab was connected to the defendant, sufficient evidence arising from the field test would sustain a finding that the substance the defendant sold the officer was cocaine.

Where the defendant at trial admits to the identity of the substance, any alleged defect in the state's evidence on the identification of the substance becomes irrelevant. Such an admission, even if made after the state has concluded its case-in-chief, precludes any error in denying the defendant's motion for directed verdict based on evidentiary grounds.

Where the substance was part of the circumstances surrounding the defendant's arrest, witnesses for the state may refer to the "suspected" contraband, regardless of whether it has been positively identified.

Prior to 1995, the state was not permitted to bring into evidence a written crime lab report identifying a substance as contraband, if the state failed to furnish a copy of the report to the defendant upon his written request at least ten days prior to trial. The Court of Appeals held that this exclusionary rule did not apply to the "oral report" of a forensic scientist at trial regarding the identification of a suspect substance, nor did it apply to the testimony of a crime lab expert regarding individual test results that did not include any expression of the expert's conclusions or opinion. Effective January 1, 1995, the state's disclosure of a written crime lab report identifying a substance as contraband is regulated by Georgia's 1994 criminal discovery provisions. These provisions do not require actual service of the crime lab report upon defense counsel, but only make the report available for inspection and copying. If the state fails to comply with these discovery provisions, the trial court may order compliance, grant a continuance, or, upon a showing of prejudice and bad faith, prohibit the state from introducing a crime lab report not disclosed to the defendant.

Where a crime lab report has been admitted into evidence without objection and the forensic chemist has not read the results into evidence, the report is original evidence that may go out with the jury. It is not subject to the continuing witness objection.

Section 35-3-16, which was enacted by the General Assembly in 1994, authorized in any prosecution for a drug offense the admission in evidence of a sworn certificate of drug analysis by a state crime lab analyst. A properly executed certificate was "admissible evidence of the composition, quality, and quantity of the substance submitted to the laboratory for analysis." This certificate, rather than the lab analyst's testimony, was used to authenticate the results of the drug analysis.

In Miller v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court held that this certificate, as hearsay evidence, did not fit within any statutorily-recognized hearsay exception in Georgia. Since the certificate did not fall within a firmly rooted exception to the hearsay rule, the Confrontation Clause of the federal constitution barred receipt of the certificate in evidence without a preliminary showing of reliability or without determining that the lab analyst was not available to testify. The court found that the increased work demands of the state crime lab did not make a lab analyst "unavailable" to testify. The court also held that subsection (c) of § 35-3-16 did not guarantee a defendant the opportunity to cross-examine the lab analyst. A defendant's filing of an objection to the admission of the certificate only authorized the trial court to make a determination concerning the admissibility of the certificate and would not result in the lab analyst's appearance in court. When measured against the state constitution, the court found § 35-3-16 to be exceedingly troublesome. Because this Code section authorized the introduction of an ex parte affidavit into evidence against a criminal defendant, in contravention of the defendant's constitutional guaranty that he be confronted with the witnesses against him and be permitted to cross-examine them, it was unconstitutional. Also, requiring a defendant to request the presence of the witnesses against him and to explain why he requires their presence in order to be afforded his constitutional right of confrontation placed too heavy a burden on the assertion of a constitutional protection. Furthermore, the Code section impermissibly shifted the burden of proof from the state to the defendant against whom the state wished to introduce a certificate.

Apparently because of these constitutional infirmities, the General Assembly repealed § 35-3-16 in 1997.

In Melendez-Diaz v. Massachusetts, the United States Supreme Court held that the admission into evidence of testimonial affidavits of state laboratory analysts to prove that the material seized by police was cocaine would violate a defendant's Sixth Amendment right to confront the witnesses against him where the analysts did not testify in person.

Even if the printout from the machine testing the substance constitutes a writing, the best evidence rule does not bar introduction of the chemist's oral testimony regarding the test results. The issue is the existence of a fact, i.e., whether the substance tested has been identified, and not the contents or terms of the writing. Thus, the identity of a substance may be proved by both oral and written evidence. Furthermore, regardless of whether the chemist tested the substance or supervised the testing of the substance, his testimony regarding the results is admissible.

In Bostic v. State, the Court of Appeals affirmed a conviction for the sale of cocaine despite the defendant's claim that the trial court erred in permitting a forensic chemist to testify that the substance involved was cocaine. The defendant claimed that the trial court failed to determine whether the tests employed by the chemist reached a scientific state of verifiable certainty. The appellate court, while noting that it is the responsibility of the trial judge to satisfy himself of the competence of scientific evidence, concluded on the basis of its own research into the specific techniques involved, that any failure to expressly determine the validity of the test results was harmless. The dissenting judge accused the court of improperly taking judicial notice of the worth of such tests. He urged that the case be remanded for a specific finding of reliability by the trial court. However, it has been held that once a testing procedure has been recognized in a substantial number of courts, the trial court is authorized to take judicial notice, without receiving evidence, that the procedure used by the expert witness to identify the substance as cocaine has been established with verifiable certainty, or that it rests upon the laws of nature.

A forensic expert is allowed to testify that a urine specimen that he has analyzed is positive for a particular substance without quantifying the amount.

The "ontrack system" is a test performed on urine samples to detect the presence of marijuana or controlled substances. Until 2001, this test had not been recognized in a substantial number of courts as a reliable method of drug detection. Thus, in the absence of expert testimony that the test had been established with verifiable certainty or rested on the laws of nature, the results of such a test were not admissible. In 2001, however, one panel of the Court of Appeals upheld a trial court's finding that there was sufficient expert testimony presented in the case to establish that the techniques and procedures of the OnTrack TesTstik drug test have reached a scientific stage of verifiable certainty and that the test can be administered in a manner that ensures a reliable result. Nevertheless, another panel of the Court of Appeals concluded that it would be an abuse of discretion to admit drug testing evidence based solely on this one decision when it is unclear whether the same test was given in the case and when it is questionable whether the decision is directly relevant to the facts.

The state is not required to introduce evidence showing the validity and reliability of the scientific principles and techniques involved in the microscopic, thin layer chromatography and Duquenois-Levine tests. These tests have been recognized in a substantial number of courts as reliable methods for the identification of marijuana. Since these tests have been recognized by the courts, a trial judge may judicially notice, without taking evidence, that the tests have been established with verifiable certainty.

An expert does not have to perform "an exact test" to determine the purity of the mixture "down to a percentage." He can form an opinion as to the purity of the mixture in question based upon all his experience in analyzing thousands of other samples and upon the results of the particular tests performed on the samples taken from the mixture. The failure to conduct an "exact test" to determine the purity of the mixture down to a specific percentage would affect only the weight and not the admissibility of the expert's opinion regarding the purity thereof. The fact that the expert formed his conclusion as to purity based on raw data obtained by a technician does not render his conclusion hearsay. Furthermore, where the expert is available for full and searching cross-examination, the failure of the expert to test the sample independently, after observing the analytical test results obtained by others, goes only to the weight of the evidence and not to its admissibility.

In Paul v. State, a forensic chemist testified that the combined weight of the cocaine was 35.9 grams and that in his opinion each of the three bags contained cocaine of 100 percent purity. He based his opinion on his chemical analysis and his visual examination of the material, including the color tests. The court held that this testimony, in combination with the defendant's trial testimony, was sufficient to support a conviction of trafficking in 28 grams or more of cocaine with "a purity of 10 percent or more." Likewise, in Beauchene v. State, the court found that the state established the elements of the charged crime of trafficking in cocaine. The state's forensic chemist testified that the state's exhibit consisted of three bags which contained a total of 82.8 grams of cocaine of between 55 and 58 percent purity. Although the witness stated that she did not perform the full range of tests on one of the bags, she did determine that the purity of its contents was the same as that of the other two bags, and that the total weight of the contents of the bags on which she performed all the tests was 55 grams.

In Adams v. State, an expert concluded that a substance was cocaine by chemically testing two bags and determining, by expert tactile observation, that two other accompanying bags were identical or contained the same substance. The court concluded that there was a significant point in proof by chemical analysis as well as by expert analysis of appearance, or touch and feel.

In Means v. State, the court held that it was not necessary for the state to prove that each item seized contained cocaine. It was enough for the state to introduce evidence that random samples were taken and were found to contain 95 percent cocaine. From this evidence the jury could reasonably infer that all the items contained cocaine. The court also held that the total weight may be extrapolated from the average weight of the random samples where the evidence is undisputed as to the identity of the contraband.

In Cooper v. State, the court found that regardless of whether the substances found in the kitchen were confirmed as cocaine, the crime lab did confirm that the substance found in the coat pocket in the codefendant's bedroom closet as weighing 149 grams and as containing 73 percent cocaine. The bags of cocaine found in the bathroom also tested positive and cumulatively weighed one gram. The court held that the defendant's aiding and abetting the codefendant's trafficking operation at the house linked him to the cache of 149 grams of cocaine found in the bedroom, and the defendant's pill bottle linked him to the 19 small bags of cocaine found in the bathroom. This evidence supported the cocaine trafficking conviction of the defendant.

In Carroll v. State, the court held that the state did identify scientifically the found substances as marijuana when it admitted photographs of growing and harvested marijuana plants and actual specimens of what was seized and when the state's forensic chemist testified that specified tests performed on the leafy material confirmed the presence of marijuana.

In Burch v. State, the officer who seized the contraband testified that, based on his training and experience, the plants appeared to be marijuana. The analyst with the crime lab testified that tests performed by her indicated that the plant sample she tested was marijuana, but she could not positively identify it as marijuana. The jury was authorized to find that the reason the three tests were not positive was because the plants were young, had deteriorated, and the test sample was small. Circumstantial evidence in the form of materials used to grow marijuana was found in the vicinity of the plants. The court held that, cumulatively, this evidence was sufficient to authorize a rational trier of fact to find beyond a reasonable doubt that the plants were marijuana plants.

In Adkinson v. State, the court held that the evidence was insufficient to support the defendant's conviction of possession of marijuana with intent to distribute. A state chemist testified that, although he thought the green leafy material was marijuana, he did not test it, so he could not testify beyond a reasonable doubt that it was marijuana. Additional opinion testimony was properly allowed regarding the detectives' beliefs that the substance was marijuana, but no scientifically conclusive evidence was presented.

In Eason v. State, the court held that the defendant has the right to subpoena certain materials from the state crime lab chemist for the purpose of cross-examination. Those items which may be subpoenaed are limited to those memos, notes, graphs, computer print-outs, and other data the state crime lab chemist relied upon to support her testimony and opinion during her direct examination concerning the identity of the substance tested. To the extent that this information may be discoverable in a felony criminal case, its production is now governed by the Criminal Procedure Discovery Act and a defendant is entitled to this information only if he invokes the Act.

4. Introduction of Substance into Evidence

If the defendant does not object to the state crime lab technician's testimony concerning the identity of the substance, nor make a motion to suppress or otherwise object to testimony regarding the substance based on any taint in the chain of custody, the state will not be required to introduce the substance into evidence to establish its case.

5. Expert Evidence Regarding Value of Substance

"Formal" education is not a requisite to the admission of expert testimony. As a matter of common sense, the "street value" of drugs is more peculiarly in the ken of an officer working on the street or buying drugs incognito, and such an officer is more likely to be knowledgeable on that subject than a laboratory chemist who has no actual experience in the purchase of drugs on the street. Thus, such an officer's testimony as to the value of seized drugs, based on his knowledge of how drugs are packaged and what they sell for on the street, is admissible as evidence of the "street value" of those drugs.

6. Expert Evidence Regarding Therapeutic and Medicinal Effects of Marijuana

A defense witness's mere assertion of his own expertise as a "marijuana specialist" is not enough to qualify him as an expert concerning the therapeutic and medicinal effects of marijuana. The qualification of the witness must be based on evidence of his education, training, or experience in this field of study. Furthermore, even if properly qualified as an expert in the field, the witness would be precluded from testifying about the beneficial use of marijuana for certain physical ailments unless he has some firsthand knowledge about the defendant's alleged medical condition or any possible treatment for it.

7. Drug Paraphernalia

The state may present evidence that a crack cocaine pipe was found on the defendant's person at the time of his arrest for the sale of cocaine. Evidence regarding the crack pipe would be relevant to show that the defendant was involved in drug activity at the time of his arrest and would be particularly material in light of his denial that he had anything to do with the drug transaction at issue.

H. Head Shop Act

Section 16-13-32, the Head Shop Act, essentially prohibits the knowing sale of drug-related objects. Subsection (a) of the statute broadly defines drug-related objects and renders them contraband. It also prohibits advertising drug-related goods without a disclaimer that the goods are unavailable for distribution in Georgia. One convicted of a first offense is guilty of a misdemeanor, a second offense is made an aggravated misdemeanor and a third offense a felony.

A 1982 Eleventh Circuit Court of Appeals decision upheld the constitutionality of § 16-13-32. In High Ol' Times v. Busbee, the owners of certain head shops brought a declaratory judgment action, claiming that the statute was void for vagueness. The appellate court, in reversing a finding of unconstitutionality, found that a facial vagueness challenge is proper only in situations where the statute would be vague in all of its applications. It found that the statutes in question were not so broadly vague. In applying the vagueness inquiry to the facts of the case before it, the court found that the statutory language provided fair notice to vendors of the prohibited items. The court also found that the mere risk of future discriminatory enforcement would not render the statute void for vagueness in pre-enforcement litigation.

It should be noted that in related litigation former GCA § 26-9912 was held unconstitutional. Also § 16-13-1, which restricts the sale or distribution of drug paraphernalia to minors, was held to be unconstitutionally vague because the definition of drug-related object as any object "which an average person would reasonably conclude is intended to be used" with drugs did not even lend itself to a construction focused on the seller's intent. While the Eleventh Circuit Court of Appeals reversed the finding of the federal district court that Georgia's other head shop laws were unconstitutional, the state did not appeal the finding of unconstitutionality with regard to § 16-13-1. Thus, the finding that this Code section is unconstitutional in its entirety is final.

In § 16-13-32.1, the distribution, sale or possession with intent to distribute of any material which is intended by the defendant to be used for a wide range of activities related to the use of controlled substances or marijuana is prohibited. This is to be contrasted with § 16-13-32, which covers only objects which are built or designed for such purposes. Section 16-13-32.1(c) explains how intent is to be proven under the statute. Section 16-13-32.2 covers the same broad spectrum of materials and purposes as § 16-13-32.1 and punishes possession of such materials. Section 16-13-32.2 defines a misdemeanor, while section 16-13-32.1 is punished identically to section 16-13-32.

Two defendants argued that the enactment of § 16-13-32.1 was an implicit repeal of the earlier Head Shop Act, § 16-13-32. In State v. Gill, the defendants demurred to accusations of violation of the earlier statute on the ground that it had been repealed by the enactment of the later statute. The state appealed from the trial court's dismissal of the prosecutions. The Court of Appeals reversed, finding no repeal. The court concluded that there was no intent to repeal the earlier statute expressed in the legislation. It further held that the two statutes are not so repugnant that they cannot both exist simultaneously. The court accepted the state's contention that the two statutes reflect "simply a legislative effort to attack the problem—the marketing of drug related objects—from two different angles . . .. If X approached Y to sell him an item to help him smoke marijuana cigarettes and Y sold X an ordinary paper clip, Y would be guilty of violating OCGA § 16-13-32.1 since he specifically intended the paper clip for a drug related purpose. However, he would not be guilty of violating OCGA § 16-13-32 since the primary use of the paper clip, holding papers together, would not be drug related. On the other hand, if X approached Y and asked Y to sell him an exotic doorstop and Y sold X a water pipe . . . designed primarily for smoking marijuana, Y would be guilty of violating OCGA § 16-13-32, since the primary purpose of the object was drug related. However, Y would not be guilty of violating OCGA § 16-13-32.1 since the use that he specifically intended (doorstop) was not drug related."

The court went on to assert that the two statutes were actually complementary—"a legislative attempt to outlaw all transactions in drug related objects, both those specifically intended and those which would put a reasonable and prudent person on notice."

V. Punishment

A. Possession and Possession with Intent to Distribute

The Controlled Substances Act establishes a sliding scale of punishment depending on what schedule drug was possessed, and whether the defendant is convicted of possession or possession with intent to distribute. Schedule I and II drugs are the most dangerous and possession is punishable by imprisonment for two to 15 years. A second or subsequent conviction is punishable by imprisonment for five to 30 years.

Possession with intent to distribute Schedule I or Schedule II drugs is punishable by imprisonment for five to 30 years. Prior to July 1, 1996, a second or subsequent conviction was punishable by a mandatory life sentence. The constitutionality of the mandatory life sentence provision had been upheld against various challenges. In a number of cases, the Georgia Supreme Court rejected the claim that this provision was being enforced discriminatorily against African-Americans. The statistical evidence of selective enforcement was insufficient to meet the intentional discrimination test. However, in Stephens v. State, while a majority of the Georgia Supreme Court upheld the defendant's conviction against such a claim, a majority of the justices did not agree with the opinion upholding the conviction. The court was sharply divided on the issue of whether an inference of discriminatory intent could be drawn from the statistical evidence presented by the defendant. In particular Justice Thompson, after reviewing the statewide statistical evidence in his special concurring opinion, found it amiss that mandatory life sentences were being imposed only in those cases in which a district attorney, in the exercise of his discretion, informed a defendant that the state was seeking enhanced punishment. The statistics presented by the defendant were indicative of a statewide pattern of discrimination in the use of the mandatory life sentence provision, but he failed to prove a pattern of systematic discrimination by the district attorney in his jurisdiction. Thus, it was Justice Thompson's view that the judgment in the case had to be affirmed.

Nevertheless, it was Justice Thompson's opinion that the statistical evidence presented in the case served as notice to the General Assembly that the mandatory life sentence provision had been repealed de facto. A course of action that he recommended was that the General Assembly could choose to change the mandatory life sentence penalty to one of several sentencing options which the trial court could impose. The trial court could then exercise its discretion in the imposition of any enhanced punishment for a second or subsequent offense, and any abuse of this discretion would be subject to review and correction, if necessary.

Following Justice Thompson's recommendation, the General Assembly eliminated the mandatory life sentence provision in 1996. Section 16-13-30(d) now provides that upon conviction of a second or subsequent offense, the defendant "shall be imprisoned for not less than ten years nor more than 40 years or life imprisonment." Consequently, the sentencing judge retains the discretion either to impose any sentence within the statutory mandatory minimum and maximum sentence range or else to impose a life sentence.

The General Assembly further amended subsection (d) to make it applicable to all Schedule II controlled substances, including nonnarcotic as well as narcotic drugs. Finally, the General Assembly made subsection (a) of the general recidivist statute, which subjects a second-time felony offender to the maximum sentence prescribed for an offense, inapplicable to a sentence imposed for a second violation of § 16-13-30(b). However, the remaining provisions of the general recidivist statute are applicable for any subsequent violation. It has been held that the 1996 amendment cannot be applied retroactively.

Under the sentencing scheme prior to July 1, 1996, enhanced punishment for a second or subsequent offense was authorized only if (1) the state notified the defendant before trial of its intent to rely on the defendant's previous drug conviction, (2) the defendant's previous conviction was final at the time of this pretrial notification, and (3) the defendant's instant conviction was for a second violation, which occurred "second" in time to the previous violation. Apparently, these prerequisites for the imposition of enhanced punishment would still be applicable under the current sentencing scheme.

Possession of Schedule III, IV, or V drugs is punishable by imprisonment for one to five years. A second or subsequent conviction is punishable by imprisonment for one to ten years. Possession with intent to distribute these drugs is punishable by imprisonment for one to ten years.

Possession or possession with intent to distribute a counterfeit substance is punishable by imprisonment for one to ten years.

Possession of an ounce or less of marijuana is a misdemeanor punishable by imprisonment for up to twelve months or by a fine of up to $1,000, or both, or by public works not to exceed 12 months. Possession of over an ounce of marijuana is punishable generally by one to ten years imprisonment.

Possession of flunitrazepam, a Schedule IV controlled substance, is punishable by imprisonment for two to 15 years. A second or subsequent conviction is punishable by imprisonment for five to 30 years. Possession with intent to distribute this drug is punishable by imprisonment for five to 30 years. A second or subsequent conviction is punishable by imprisonment for ten to 40 years or life imprisonment. Subsection (a) of the general recidivist statute, which subjects a second-time felony offender to the maximum sentence prescribed for an offense, is inapplicable to a sentence imposed for a second offense, but that subsection and the remaining provisions of the general recidivist statute are applicable for any subsequent offense.

The punishments provided in § 16-13-30 do not preclude probation as a punishment. Where a portion of a defendant's sentence is reduced from imprisonment to probation, a fine of up to $100,000 is authorized as a condition of probation. Although § 16-13-30 makes no provision for the imposition of fines, § 17-10-8 generally permits imposition of a fine as a condition to probation when a sentence is probated in lieu of confinement.

B. Purchasing

There is no unconstitutional disparity between the prescribed punishments for possession and purchase of the same amount of marijuana. Since the purchasers of less than one ounce of marijuana commit a different crime than do the possessors of the same amount of contraband, a challenge to the constitutionality of the felony punishment prescribed for purchasing cannot be based upon the General Assembly's determination to provide a misdemeanor punishment for those who only possess the same amount of contraband. For equal protection purposes, the purchasers of less than one ounce of marijuana are not similarly situated to possessors of the same amount of contraband; only those accused of purchasing marijuana are similarly situated. Since the imposition of a felony punishment applies equally to all those accused of purchasing any amount of marijuana, there is no unconstitutional disparate treatment of similarly situated persons.

C. Trafficking

Section 16-13-31 provides punishments for the offenses of trafficking in (1) cocaine; (2) illegal drugs such as morphine, opium, or heroin; (3) marijuana; (4) methaqualone; and (5) methamphetamine or amphetamine. With regard to each of these offenses, § 16-13-31 creates a schedule of punishments scaled to the amount of contraband involved.

Likewise, § 16-13-31.1 punishes trafficking in the amphetamine or methamphetamine commonly known as MDMA or ecstasy. This Code section creates a schedule of punishments scaled to the amount of MDMA or ecstasy involved.

It should be noted that for each trafficking offense there is a mandatory punishment for each graduation of the offense. Thus, for example, those who are convicted of trafficking in cocaine or a cocaine mixture of 28 grams or more, but less than 200 grams, are subject to a mandatory minimum prison term of 10 years and a fine of $200,000; those convicted of trafficking in 200 grams or more, but less than 400 grams, are subject to a mandatory minimum prison term of 15 years and a fine of $300,000; and those convicted of trafficking in 400 grams or more are subject to a mandatory minimum prison term of 25 years and a fine of $1 million.

In Partridge v. State, the court held that trafficking in cocaine requires only that the threshold amount be shown, after which the quantity possessed bears only on punishment. The court further held that where the amount shown by the evidence would still show a violation of law, even if it did not meet the increment charged in the indictment, there would not be a material variance.

However, in Mallarino v. State, the court held that it is the quantity of drugs averred in the indictment of which the offender has been convicted, rather than the amount of drugs which the evidence establishes that the offender possessed in excess of the amount averred in the indictment, that controls in determining which mandatory minimum sentence is operative under § 16-13-31(a).

The holdings in these two cases appear to be contradictory but a closer examination reveals that they can be distinguished on the facts. In Partridge, even though the amount of cocaine shown by the evidence (319 grams of cocaine in a mixture of 450 grams) was less than the amount of cocaine charged in the indictment (400 grams of cocaine or cocaine mixture), the amount shown by the evidence met the standards for a finding of trafficking in a quantity of cocaine or cocaine mixture involving 400 grams or more and fell within the punishment provisions of § 16-13-31(a)(1)(C). While in Mallarino, the amount of cocaine charged in the indictment and the amount of cocaine for which the defendant was convicted was "greater than 28 grams." The appellate court could not determine from the verdict the maximum amount of cocaine which the jury found the defendant guilty of possessing. Thus, the court held that the minimum permissible sentence for trafficking in a quantity of cocaine or cocaine mixture involving 28 grams or more was controlled by § 16-13-31(a)(1)(A) instead of § 16-13-31(a)(1)(C), which punishes trafficking in a quantity of cocaine or cocaine mixture involving 400 grams or more.

Thus, it would appear that where there is no specific proof of the maximum amount possessed, it is the quantity of drugs averred in the indictment of which the offender has been convicted which authorizes the particular sentence. However, where there is specific proof of the maximum amount possessed, it is the amount possessed as shown by the evidence which authorizes the particular sentence, and not the language of the indictment. In Moon v. State, the indictment correctly charged the defendants with possession of more than "28 grams [of cocaine] with a purity in excess of 10%." However, since the conviction was authorized by proof of possession of 17,108 grams, the trial court was authorized by § 16-13-31(f) [now (h)] to sentence up to 30 years. The court held that the 25-year sentence was well within the mandatory minimum set at § 16-13-31(a)(1)(C) and the 30-year maximum set at § 16-13-31(f) [now (h)].

Similar punishment schedules are provided for each of the other trafficking offenses as well. The reader is left to consult the statute for specifics.

The General Assembly has expressed its intent that cocaine traffickers serve a ten-year minimum sentence, without the benefit of first offender treatment or probation for that ten-year term. It has determined that an adjudication of guilt cannot be withheld for a defendant who is found guilty of or pleads guilty to cocaine trafficking. Furthermore, the defendant's mandatory minimum prison sentence cannot be probated, and the defendant does not qualify for the drug-oriented first offender treatment in § 16-13-2(a). Under these circumstances, a convicted cocaine trafficker would not be eligible for general first offender treatment pursuant to § 42-8-60 or a probated prison sentence. Accordingly, a trial court does not have discretion to probate any portion of a sentence for trafficking in cocaine under the First Offender Act.

While there is mandatory sentencing for each of the trafficking offenses and while there is no deferring, probating, suspension or withholding of sentences, a statutory provision applicable to all the offenses permits the district attorney to request and the trial court to grant a reduced or suspended sentence upon a showing that the defendant has provided substantial assistance in the identification, arrest or conviction of any of his partners in the crime. This provision, however, does not by its terms require the trial court to impose a reduced or suspended sentence in the event a defendant has rendered such assistance but instead merely authorizes him to do so. Where the defendant's actions did not constitute substantial assistance sufficient to justify a reduced sentence below the mandatory minimum, it would be within the trial court's discretion to reject the defendant's request for a reduced sentence.

Any person who is guilty of trafficking in cocaine, illegal drugs, marijuana, or methamphetamine is punishable by imprisonment for not less than five years nor more than 30 years and by a fine not to exceed $1 million. This provision provides for a maximum punishment not provided for in the mandatory minimum punishments set out in § 16-13-31(a), (b), (c) and (e).

The rule of lenity applies when two statutes governing the same conduct are conflicting with respect to their prescribed punishments, i.e., where one statute punishes the same conduct to a lesser degree than the other statute. In such a situation, a defendant would be entitled to have the lesser of two penalties administered. In Richards v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals held that this rule was inapplicable because the offense of manufacturing methamphetamine as described in § 16-13-30(b) was a lesser included offense of manufacturing/trafficking methamphetamine as outlined in § 16-13-31(f)(1). Furthermore, the most reasonable interpretation of the legislative intent in enacting § 16-13-31(f)(1) was to supplant the general punishment provision of § 16-13-30(b) with a specific and potentially more harsh punishment provision for manufacturing methamphetamine. Where a crime is penalized by a special law, the general provisions of the penal code are not applicable. Thus, since there was no uncertainty as to which of the two statutes applied in the case, the trial court was authorized to sentence the defendant for the greater felony offense after merging the lesser felony offense into it.

Any fact that enhances the penalty for a drug offense should be alleged in the indictment, submitted to the jury, and proved beyond a reasonable doubt. An indictment's failure to allege drug quantity, which fact when proven would subject a defendant to an enhanced sentence, is not a defect that would deprive a trial court of its power to adjudicate the case. This power can never be forfeited or waived. Rather, such a defect requires correction regardless of whether the defendant objected to it during trial. An appellate court cannot correct such a forfeited defect unless it finds the defect to be plain error that seriously affects the fairness, integrity, or public reputation of the trial. There would be no support for such a finding where there was overwhelming and essentially uncontroverted evidence that the offense involved a considerable quantity of drugs.

C.1. Possession of Drug-Related Objects

The same evidence can be used to prove both the offense of possession of a tool for the commission of crime, a felony, and the offense of possession of a drug-related object, a misdemeanor. Because the same conduct constitutes both a felony and a misdemeanor, the rule of lenity requires that a defendant be subjected to the penalties for the misdemeanor, rather than the felony.

D. Attempt and Conspiracy

Section 16-13-33 provides for the punishment of the crimes of attempt and conspiracy involving controlled substances. There is a great difference between § 16-4-8, the general conspiracy statute, and § 16-13-33, the attempt and conspiracy statute for controlled substances. Section 16-4-8 provides for only one-half the punishment which could be meted if the person committed the crime conspired to have been committed. The totally separate crime described in § 16-13-33 is given equal punishment status with the crime which is the conspiracy objective.

The General Assembly intended with the enactment of § 16-13-33 to supplant the general punishment provision with a specific (and potentially more harsh) punishment provision for attempt or conspiracy to possess controlled substances. Rather than one-half of the maximum sentence applicable to the substantive crime under § 16-4-6 or § 16-4-8, § 16-13-33 provides for potentially harsher punishment in the form of imprisonment not exceeding the maximum punishment prescribed for the Georgia Controlled Substances Act offense, the commission of which was the object of the attempt or conspiracy. The general and specific sentencing statutes are mutually exclusive, and there is no uncertainty as to which applies. Section 16-13-33 renders § 16-4-6 or § 16-4-8 inapplicable in prosecutions under the Georgia Controlled Substances Act.

Since the offense of attempted trafficking in cocaine under § 16-13-33 is punishable by imprisonment but contains no provision for a fine, the maximum fine which may be imposed as a condition of probation is $100,000 pursuant to § 17-10-8. Also, a conviction for conspiracy under § 16-13-33 does not authorize the imposition of a fine, but a fine not greater than $100,000 may be imposed as a condition of probation.

Although § 16-13-33 clearly provides for a potentially "harsher," i.e., maximum, sentence of imprisonment, that Code section does not require that the trial court impose a mandatory minimum term of imprisonment, or deny to the trial court the discretion it would otherwise have in determining whether the sentence it imposes is to be served entirely in prison.

VI. Civil Sanctions upon Conviction of Certain Controlled Substances Offenses

Upon being notified of a conviction of a licensed individual for any criminal offense involving the manufacture, distribution, trafficking, sale, or possession of a controlled substance or marijuana, the appropriate licensing authority shall suspend or revoke the license, permit, registration, certification, or other authorization to conduct a licensed occupation of such individual as provided by law. The failure of a licensed individual to notify the appropriate licensing authority of his conviction is considered grounds for revocation. A licensed individual who has been sanctioned may be entitled to reinstatement upon successful completion of a drug abuse treatment and education program approved by the licensing authority.

In addition to this sanction, the General Assembly in 1990 enacted a number of Code sections providing for the imposition of other civil sanctions on anyone convicted of an offense arising out of the unlawful manufacture, distribution, sale, possession, or use of marijuana, a controlled substance or other dangerous drug.

A person charged with a violation of the Georgia Controlled Substances Act who has tendered a plea of nolo contendere to the charges, when such plea has been accepted by the trial court, has been convicted of that offense for the purposes of consideration of an application for a firearms permit, and is thus statutorily ineligible for the issuance of such a permit.

A misdemeanor conviction for possession of less than an ounce of marijuana is not a crime of moral turpitude. Thus, such a conviction is not admissible for impeachment purposes.

Generally, a drug related offense classified as a felony is a felony involving moral turpitude which will remove a person's right to vote, but the right to vote may not be withheld until a conviction becomes final.

VII. Tax Liability

The 1990 General Assembly amended the Code title relating to revenue and taxation by adding a new chapter which provides in part that the use, possession, consumption, storage, or transfer of marijuana or any controlled substance is subject to a state excise tax. Each person who uses, possesses, consumes, stores, or transfers any such substance is liable for the tax, unless the person is lawfully in possession of such substance.

VIII. Drug Dealer Liability Act

The Drug Dealer Liability Act, enacted by the General Assembly in 1997, provides a civil remedy for damages to persons in a community injured as a result of illegal drug use. With this Act, the General Assembly intends to shift the cost of the damage caused by the existence of the illegal drug market in a community to those who illegally profit from that market and to establish the prospect of substantial monetary loss as a deterrent to those who have not yet entered into the illegal drug distribution market.

A person injured by an individual drug abuser may bring an action under the Act for damages against a person who participated in illegal marketing of the controlled substance used by the individual abuser. He may recover economic, noneconomic, and exemplary damages and reasonable attorneys' fees and costs, including, but not limited to, reasonable expenses for expert testimony.

IX. Enjoining or Abatement of Real Property Involved in Substantial Drug Related Activity

Any owner of real property who has actual knowledge that substantial drug related activity is being conducted on his property is guilty of maintaining a nuisance, and such real property shall be deemed a nuisance and may be enjoined or otherwise abated as provided by law.

HOMICIDE

See also ASSAULT; AVIATION CRIMES; COERCION DEFENSE; DEFENSE OF PROPERTY AND HABITATION; LAW ENFORCEMENT DEFENSE; MOTOR VEHICLE CRIMES; SELF-DEFENSE; WATER-RELATED CRIMES.

I. Generally

A. Specific Offenses

Fourteen offenses in the code involve the killing of a human being, the killing of a fetus or unborn child, or acts done with the intent to terminate a fetus as an element of the offense. Three of these offenses are the result of the 1968 codification consolidating all homicide offenses and abolishing such specific offenses of the pre-1968 criminal code as arson causing death and destroying or injuring a house with explosives resulting in death.

There are three major homicidal offenses: murder (§ 16-5-1), voluntary manslaughter (§ 16-5-2) and involuntary manslaughter (§ 16-5-3). Murder is the killing of another human being with malice aforethought or during the commission of a felony. Voluntary manslaughter is the killing of another human being resulting from a sudden and violent passion arising from a serious provocation. There are two types of involuntary manslaughter: (1) a killing caused by the commission of a non-felonious unlawful act and (2) a killing caused by the commission of a lawful act in an unlawful manner likely to cause death.

The eleven other homicidal offenses are assisting suicide (§ 16-5-5), criminal abortion (§ 16-12-140), partial-birth abortion (§ 16-12-144), feticide (§ 16-5-80), homicide by vehicle (§ 40-6-393), feticide by vehicle (§ 40-6-393.1), homicide by interference with an official traffic-control device or railroad sign or signal (§ 40-6-396), homicide by vessel (§ 52-7-12.2), feticide by vessel (§ 52-7-12.3), homicide by aircraft (§ 6-2-5.2), and perjury resulting in death (§ 16-10-70). The following is a brief description of each of these offenses. (1) Any person who publicly advertises or offers to intentionally and actively assist another person in the commission of suicide and commits any overt act to further that purpose is guilty of a felony. (2) Criminal abortion involves acts motivated by an intention to terminate the existence of a fetus. (3) Partial-birth abortion involves knowingly performing a partial vaginal delivery of a living human fetus before ending its life and completing the delivery. (4) Feticide is the willful killing of an unborn child so far developed as to be ordinarily called "quick" by any injury to the mother, which would be murder if it resulted in the death of the mother. (5) There are two degrees of homicide by vehicle. First degree vehicular homicide is the nonmalicious killing of another person through the violation of certain provisions of the Uniform Rules of the Road, while second degree vehicular homicide is the unintentional killing of another person through the violation of any other provision of the Uniform Rules. (6) There are two degrees of feticide by vehicle. First degree vehicular feticide is the killing of an unborn child so far developed as to be ordinarily called "quick" by any injury to the mother of such child through the violation of certain provisions of the Uniform Rules of the Road, which would be homicide by vehicle in the first degree if it resulted in the death of the mother. Second degree vehicular feticide involves the violation of any other provision of the Uniform Rules. (7) Homicide by interference with a traffic-control device or railroad sign is the nonmalicious killing of another person through the unlawful removal or defacement of a traffic-control device or railroad sign. (8) There are two degrees of homicide by vessel. Homicide by vessel in the first degree is the nonmalicious killing of another person through the violation of certain provisions of the Georgia Boat Safety Act, while homicide by vessel in the second degree is the unintentional killing of another person through the violation of any other provision of the Act. (9) There are two degrees of feticide by vessel. Feticide by vessel in the first degree is the killing of an unborn child so far developed as to be ordinarily called "quick" by any injury to the mother of such child through the violation of certain provisions of the Georgia Boat Safety Act, which would be homicide by vessel in the first degree if it resulted in the death of the mother. Homicide by vessel in the second degree involves the violation of any other provision of the Act. (10) Homicide by aircraft is the nonmalicious killing of another person through the operation of an aircraft while under the influence of alcohol or drugs. (11) The final homicidal offense is perjury resulting in death, which essentially is lying under oath which causes death.

Before a detailed examination of the specific homicidal offenses can be undertaken, an outline of the three basic elements of the corpus delicti of the nonabortion homicidal offenses will be presented. This is important because if there is a sufficiently proven corpus delicti it can corroborate a confession and, thus, authorize a conviction for the appropriate offense.

B. Corpus Delicti: Fact of Death

The single element common to all of the nonabortion homicidal offenses is the death of a human being. In these crimes, the corpus delicti, or body of the crime, very literally includes a body. The first question which must be asked, therefore, is whether a death of a human being has occurred. While this is an apparently simple question which normally is easily answered, recent medical developments have rendered it a more difficult decision in a legal context.

The question of whether there has been a death can occur on either end of the life cycle. On the one hand is the situation where there undoubtedly was a living human being at one point and the question is whether there has been a death. On the other extreme is the situation where the court must decide whether a human being ever existed.

The possible ambiguity about the death of a once-alive individual has developed because of the increasing sophistication of medical technology and its ability to keep people "alive" through life support systems. This phenomenon was vividly brought to the public's attention in In re Quinlan, where a father sought appointment as his daughter's guardian and permission to terminate life support systems to which she was attached. In that case, the victim was conceded by all parties to be alive, but the medical diagnosis was that her chances of revival to a "normal" form of life were virtually nil. The court eventually approved the appointment of the father as guardian and paved the way for the removal of life-support equipment.

While Quinlan did not squarely present the issue of whether there had been a death, such a situation in the criminal context easily can be imagined. For example, a defendant who shot a victim might claim that the doctor who terminated life support (or the family or guardian who ordered such termination) was responsible for the victim's death. A zealous prosecutor might decide to prosecute the doctor or consenting guardian for homicide.

The traditional legal definition of death has been the "stoppage of the circulation of the blood, and a cessation of . . . animal and vital functions . . .." Because of the increased ability of medical technology to maintain the breathing and circulation functions, however, many have urged the courts and legislatures to adopt a "brain death" definition of death. Under this approach, a person is dead when the brain (or an essential part thereof) ceases to function.

In 1975, Georgia joined the increasing number of jurisdictions adopting such a standard. Thus, under § 31-10-16, a person may be declared dead when there is "irreversible cessation of all functions of the entire brain . . .." While this statute is not without ambiguities, such as the silence as to specific tests to be administered to determine whether there has been such a cessation, it would seem that this definition, if used by a physician to declare the death of a victim, would make precise the time and agency of death. Once such a death had been declared, the doctor who later pulled the plug on life-support machinery would be absolved from criminal responsibility. The statute also cryptically adds that the concept of brain death shall not prohibit the use of "other medically recognized criteria for determining death." This would appear to permit a changing medical definition of death in the future to vary the content of the legal definition.

On the other end of the spectrum is the question of whether there has ever been a live human being. In Georgia, determining the death of a newly born or being-born infant has been governed by the born alive rule.

Thus, if a mother gives birth to her baby and subsequently kills it, there has been a nonabortion homicide only if the baby established an independent and separate existence from her. The fact that the baby breathed air has been held insufficient to establish the required independence because it is possible to breathe before complete separation from the mother. In such a situation, an abortion prosecution might be possible, although the abortion statute's language does not clearly indicate that self-aborting activities are proscribed. On the other hand, in a case where the medical examiner could not testify to an independent existence, the Georgia Supreme Court affirmed a murder conviction where the only evidence of independent existence was the testimony of two children that they heard the baby cry.

For a finding of criminal abortion, there is no analogue to the presence of the death of a human being. This is so because criminal abortion is defined not in terms of a termination of a fetus, but, rather, in terms of acts designed to produce a miscarriage or abortion. The elements of the crime and the exceptions mandated by the statute and the Constitution are discussed more fully below.

For a finding of feticide, feticide by vehicle, or feticide by vessel determining the death of an unborn child or fetus is governed by whether the fetus is so far developed as to be ordinarily called "quick," i.e., so far developed as to be able to move or stir in the mother's womb. The elements of the crime of feticide are discussed more fully below.

There is also the question, when the victim's body cannot be located, whether the evidence is sufficient to prove that the alleged victim is dead. In White v. State, the court held that there was overwhelming circumstantial evidence that the victim was dead. Blood stains were found in the victim's condominium. Witnesses testified that the defendant stated that he had slit the victim's throat in response to a homosexual advance and stated that the victim was dead. The defendant testified that he assumed, but did not know for certain, that the victim was dead as a result of injuries he inflicted on him. Further, as he put the victim in the victim's vehicle, the defendant noticed that the victim had grown "a little more stiffer," and as he left the victim in the woods alongside the highway, the victim still displayed no sign of life.

C. Corpus Delicti: Criminal Agency

The second element of the corpus delicti of the nonabortion homicidal crimes is the existence of a criminal agency as the cause of death. This element is normally easily proven by circumstantial evidence of the body's condition at the time of discovery. The court must be convinced that the circumstances exclude an inference of noncriminal homicide by natural causes, suicide, or accident. For example, in Peacock v. State, where there was testimony that a victim was shot twice in the head near a river and four days later a corpse was recovered in that river with one hole behind each ear and bullet fragments found in the corpse's brain, there was sufficient evidence to conclude violence or criminal agency. The court held that accident or suicide were sufficiently excluded. Likewise, in Reddick v. State, where the body of the deceased was found with the back of the skull crushed, throat cut, and stab wounds in the back, criminal agency was held to be shown. In Sorrells v. State, investigators discovered two badly decomposed bodies lying together in a bedroom. One was a man's body and the other was a woman's. It initially was assumed that the deaths had resulted from asphyxiation due to gas emanating from a heater in the bedroom. After the man's body was interred and the woman's body was cremated, investigators suspected that the deaths might be homicides. The man's body was exhumed, and the autopsy determined that the man died as the result of a shotgun blast. Despite the defendant's contention that the state failed to prove that the woman's death was a homicide as well, the evidence showed that the woman was engaged to and lived with the man and that, after two gunshots were overheard by neighbors, neither was seen alive ever again. In the defendant's own trial testimony, he acknowledged discovering and identifying the bodies. The court held that this evidence was sufficient to authorize a rational trier of fact to find proof beyond a reasonable doubt that the woman also had been murdered by a shotgun blast.

Whether suicide is a reasonable hypothesis is a question for the jury to determine. In Evans v. State, the defendant contended that the evidence was as consistent with a suicide as it was with a murder. Although the pathologist who performed the autopsy on the victim's body could not conclusively state whether the fatal wound was caused by the victim himself or another person, he testified that he was 90 percent certain that the wound was caused by someone other than the victim. Furthermore, no weapon was found near the body. The court held that where circumstantial evidence is sufficient to exclude every reasonable hypothesis save that of the homicide at the hands of the defendant, a guilty verdict will not be disturbed unless it is unsupportable as a matter of law.

An example of a case where the court found criminal agency not to have been proven beyond a reasonable doubt is Clay v. State. Here the evidence, outside of the defendant's confession, showed only that a human torso was found in the burned ruins of a gas station. Beginning with a presumption of noncriminal agency, the court held that the corpus delicti was not proven because there was no evidence of criminal agency, rejecting any reliance on the confession to corroborate the criminal agency element of the corpus delicti. The court held that while the corpus delicti can corroborate the defendant's confession, the reverse cannot also be permitted because to do this would be to "let a portion of the confession corroborate itself." Thus, the court made clear that a confession and a corpse are not necessarily sufficient in and of themselves to support a homicide conviction. Another case where the court found criminal agency had not been proven is Strozier v. State. In this case, the decedent was found face down in a street. After being admitted to a hospital, he died from his injuries. The defendant never acknowledged that the decedent was the person with whom he had an altercation or that the two were the same person. The court held that the investigating officer's hearsay testimony that he heard from an unknown source that someone named "Patrick" was linked to the attack against the decedent merely allowed the defendant to be tried based on rumor, gossip, and speculation. There was no other evidence introduced which connected the defendant to the death of the decedent. Furthermore, there was no conclusive proof that the decedent's death was the result of a criminal act rather than an accidental fall or traffic accident. The fact that the decedent was injured did not necessarily lead to the conclusion that he was the victim of a crime. Thus, there was no evidence upon which a rational trier of fact could have found the defendant guilty.

Criminal agency often becomes a crucial issue in cases where the victim is a young child and there are claims that death might have been caused by crib death or accidental means.

D. Corpus Delicti: Causation

The other element of the corpus delicti common to all the nonabortion homicidal crimes is that of causation. Because these crimes are all defined at least partially in terms of a particular result (the death), the linkage between the defendant's behavior and the result of death of the victim is crucially important. Whereas in other crimes the actus reus normally consists of the defendant's acts, in homicide the actus reus requires a showing of acts which lead to the prohibited result of death. The Georgia rule is that where the defendant's acts precede the victim's death, the defendant is the causative factor if the injuries inflicted by the defendant either (1) were the sole proximate cause of death, (2) directly and materially contributed to the occurrence of a subsequently accruing immediate cause of death, or (3) materially accelerated death. In fact, there is some limited authority that there is legal causation merely if the death would not have occurred "but for" the defendant's acts.

The Georgia courts have been very liberal in authorizing the submission of the causation issue to homicide juries. For example, in Martin v. State, the attending physician testified that the patient who died nine days after the automobile collision caused by the defendant was in "very satisfactory" condition immediately before death and seemed to be recovering. No autopsy was performed, the doctor conceded that a heart seizure could have caused death and, when asked if the collision injuries caused death, the physician said, "I can't say." The appellate court held that given the decedent's prior good health, there was enough evidence to go to a jury for a determination of whether the injuries at least materially contributed to the direct cause of death.

In Phipps v. State, the defendant contended that the trial court erred in refusing to grant a directed verdict of acquittal based on the fact that the medical experts could not positively state that the child's fatal head injuries were caused by intentional conduct rather than an accidental fall while the child was under the defendant's care and custody. Also, there was evidence that on prior occasions the child had been physically abused by others. The appellate court held that comparing the child's good physical condition at the time the defendant took him from his mother and shortly thereafter, with his injured condition at the time he and the defendant appeared at a fire station, and considering the acts of abuse admitted by the defendant, the evidence was sufficient to have authorized a finding that the defendant caused the child's death.

In Littles v. State, the victim's death was caused by a blood clot four months after defendant shot her. The attending physician testified that the shot left her weak and partially paralyzed, that a later psychosis "was consistent with her brain injury," and that inactivity caused by the paralysis and psychosis could have caused the clot. He also said he did not know whether the wound caused the death. The court held the evidence, although "not overwhelming," was sufficient to support a verdict.

In Adams v. State, after being shot by the defendant, the victim was hospitalized and underwent surgery for his injuries. While recuperating from his injuries, he suffered a stroke and died five days later. While there was conflicting evidence on the question whether there was sufficient evidence to connect the victim's stroke and resulting death to his gunshot injury, the court held that the testimony of two doctors that the gunshot and resulting surgery were contributing causes of the stroke which ultimately caused the victim's death was ample evidence to support the defendant's conviction for voluntary manslaughter.

In Lynch v. State, the defendant kicked his 76-year-old grandmother in the side. Her examination at a hospital revealed bruises but no internal injuries. Five days later, she was found to have a perforated bowel. Although she survived surgery, she died less than a month later of septicemia, triggered by the ruptured bowel. A physician testified that although there were circumstances other than beating and kicking which could have caused a perforation of the bowel, none of those circumstances applied to the victim. The court held that there was sufficient evidence to establish that the defendant caused the victim's death.

In Irby v. State, the state's expert opined that the cause of the victim's death was asphyxia, but he noted no signs of either internal or external trauma to any part of the body. While the doctor admitted the physical evidence did not absolutely rule out other natural causes of death, he testified the victim's recent medical history as reflected in her army medical records and the other circumstances of her death convinced him that she had been killed by her air being cut off by something such as a pillow or bag held over her face. The court held that it is not the doctor's expert opinion (or any other individual bit of evidence) alone, but the totality of the evidence that must be sufficient to convince the trier of fact "beyond a reasonable doubt." The court concluded that the evidence was sufficient in this case.

In Goodwin v. State, the defendant and the victim were roughhousing at work when the victim collapsed and died. The state's medical expert testified that there were virtually no signs of forcible injury on the victim's neck; the cause of death was not strangulation or asphyxiation but was heart dysrhythmia brought on by the pressure from the defendant's hands to the carotid sinus in the victim's neck; and the amount of pressure to the carotid sinus which could cause heart dysrhythmia might be as slight as that of a shirt collar around a neck. The court concluded that the evidence was sufficient to support the defendant's conviction for voluntary manslaughter.

In Miller v. State, the defendant while armed with a gun entered a home through a bedroom window and pointed the gun at the victims. One of the victims escaped and ran to the home of a neighbor who called police.

Before the police arrived, the victim suffered a fatal heart attack and the defendant left the home. The medical examiner testified that the victim's heart had been in bad condition and that the heart attack had been caused by the stress placed upon it by the emotional reaction to an armed intruder and the physical exertion of running over 100 feet to the neighbor's home. The court held that it was not error to deny the defendant's motion for directed verdict because the evidence was sufficient to authorize a conviction for felony murder with the underlying felony being burglary.

In Powell v. State, there was a dispute concerning who in a fracas delivered the blow that killed the victim. The associate medical examiner testified that the victim's skull was fractured by a blow near his eye from the blunt end of the axe blade swung by the defendant. He compared each possible weapon at the scene with the injury and concluded that only the axe blade could have delivered the fatal blow. He also observed that the victim's shirt was dry, undermining the defense's theory that the victim was struck in the eye with a pressure washer wielded by another person in the fracas. Testimony of the state's experiments with the pressure washer also countered that theory. The court held that this evidence was sufficient to exclude every other reasonable theory so as to justify a finding of guilt beyond a reasonable doubt.

In Roberts v. State, the defendant admitted that he stabbed the two victims, and eyewitnesses testified to those events. A detective testified without objection that he observed the deceased victim bleeding and receiving medical treatment; and that the victim had died as a result of the stab wounds. The court held that this evidence was sufficient to prove the essential element of causation.

In Skaggs v. State, the defendant argued that the evidence was not sufficient to authorize his conviction, because the victim died from injuries sustained in a fall onto the concrete rather than from the blows to his head. The court, however, found that while the immediate cause of the victim's death was the injuries he suffered in the fall, the fall itself was the direct and immediate result of the blows administered by defendant. The only intervening force was gravity. It was reasonably foreseeable, and certainly not abnormal, that one who was struck in the nose and then kicked in the face with a steel-toed boot might fall to the ground and suffer a serious bodily injury. It did not matter that the defendant never intended for the victim to fall and sustain a fatal injury as the result. To authorize the felony murder conviction, the state was required only to prove the defendant's intent to commit aggravated assault. The court concluded that the evidence showed the commission of aggravated assault with a deadly weapon and that the injuries the victim received in the aggravated assault ultimately caused his death.

A fairly common situation which arises with regard to the causation issue is the defendant who administers a mortal wound but claims that the negligence or mistreatment of a doctor or nurse has intervened to cut off his original criminal liability. The Georgia rule, consistent with that of other states, is that improper medical treatment is not normally a supervening cause. Reiterated by the appellate courts, the rule is that the only situation in which such negligence will cut off the defendant's liability is where treatment of a nonmortal wound is so negligently performed that it can fairly be said that the treatment, not the original wound, caused the death. Although such a statement rightfully can be criticized as being somewhat circular, it seems clear that only gross mistreatment, such as the application of "unwholesome salves or medicines," will be held to intervene and serve to cut off the defendant's criminal liability. In other words, a certain amount of medical negligence can be seen to be foreseeable and, therefore, is not a supervening legal cause.

In Green v. State, the victim died of a stress ulcer in the hospital a week after the defendant stabbed her. Although the experts at trial disputed the primary cause of death, they agreed that stress caused the ulcer. The evidence at trial was sufficient for the jury to find that the defendant stabbed his wife, thus setting in motion a series of events that resulted in her death, and that the hospital's treatment of her wound with the pain killer Toradol was a secondary, rather than intervening, cause of death. The court concluded that the trial court did not err in its charges on causation.

In Johnson v. State, the defendant contended that his acquittal was mandated because the state failed to exclude beyond a reasonable doubt the possibility that death may have resulted from the improper removal of life-support systems from the victim rather than from injuries caused by him. The court found that the question of whether removing the support systems met procedural requirements was not an issue in the case. The treating doctor's testimony established that the victim was legally dead before the systems were removed and that her death was caused by the subdural hematomas that were the result of the defendant's blows to the victim's face. Moreover, the defendant offered no objection to the treating doctor's testimony that a second doctor had, in fact, conducted an independent examination and declared the victim brain-dead before the systems were disconnected.

In Woods v. State, the medical experts testified at trial that the victim never regained consciousness after being hit by one of the defendants, spent the last two years in a deep coma in a hospital or nursing home, and died as a result of the head injuries that had rendered him unconscious. The court held that any problems with the victim's medical treatment would have been a secondary cause of death, rather than the intervening cause. As a result, the decision of trial counsel to rely on the theory of self-defense was a tactical decision that was within the range of reasonable professional assistance. Thus, counsel were not ineffective for failing to investigate and present the victim's medical treatment as the cause of his death.

In Shields v. State, the pathologist testified that if the victim had not been shot, she would not have been paralyzed, would not have developed the deep vein thrombosis, would not have needed the anticoagulant drug Coumadin, and thus would not have suffered the intracerebral hemorrhage that killed her approximately six months after the shooting. The defendant contended that this evidence was circumstantial and did not exclude the reasonable hypothesis that the death was the result of an unexplained hemorrhage that was unrelated to the gunshot wounds. The court rejected this contention and found that the only cause of the victim's death supported by the evidence was that it was the result of an intracerebral hemorrhage caused by the anticoagulant drug Coumadin. While it was possible that the hemorrhage was caused by something other than the Coumadin, there was no medical evidence to support such a possibility. Thus, even if the evidence of causation was circumstantial, the jury was authorized to reject as unreasonable other possible causes of the brain hemorrhage that were only theoretical and to resolve the issue of causation of the victim's death adversely to the defendant.

Prior to July 1, 2007, any person who falsified or forged the living will of another with the intent to cause a withholding or withdrawal of life-sustaining procedures contrary to the wishes of the patient and, thereby, because of any such act, directly caused life-sustaining procedures to be withheld or withdrawn and death thereby to be hastened was subject to prosecution for criminal homicide. There was a similar provision concerning a person who falsified or forged a health care power of attorney. The law required that the living will or health care power of attorney be in "written" form. If there was no evidence of these documents in "written" form, a person could not be subject to criminal liability on the ground that he falsified or forged a living will or health care power of attorney.

Effective July 1, 2007, the General Assembly revised this law in its entirety so as to provide for an advance directive of health care which combines the concepts of the living will and the health care power of attorney into a single legal document. Notwithstanding this revision, the General Assembly enacted a savings clause for any living will or health care power of attorney executed prior to this effective date. The revised law does not apply to, affect, or invalidate documents executed under the prior law nor does it affect any claim, right, or remedy that accrued prior to its effective date. It should be noted that the revised law, similar to the prior law, provides that any person who falsifies or forges an advance directive for health care of another or who willfully conceals or withholds personal knowledge of an amendment or revocation of an advance directive for health care with the intent to cause a withholding or withdrawal of life-sustaining procedures or the withholding or withdrawal of the provision of nourishment or hydration contrary to the intent of the declarant and thereby, because of such act, directly causes life-sustaining procedures or the provision of nourishment or hydration to be withheld or withdrawn and death thereby to be hastened would be subject to prosecution for criminal homicide.

An inventive claim has been made by several defendants who have claimed that the acts of the victim cut off the defendant's criminal liability. In Patterson v. State, the victim was a 15-year-old girl who died after she jumped out of a car where the defendant was making romantic advances to her. The court held that the victim's voluntary act of jumping out could be attributed to the defendant if the jumping was the natural and probable consequence of the defendant's original acts. The Patterson court indicated that the grading of the resulting homicide as murder or voluntary manslaughter would depend upon whether the victim's acts were reasonable under the circumstances and whether the victim's acts naturally tended toward death or not. In Thornton v. State, the defendant was held guilty of murder where the evidence indicated that the immediate cause of death was the victim's jumping into a ditch to avoid the defendant's attacks. In Wyrick v. State, the Court of Appeals affirmed an involuntary manslaughter verdict where the death was caused by the defendant's pursuing the victim in an unprovoked assault and the victim was struck by a car in avoiding the assault. In Mansfield v. State, the victim escaped a beating which was being administered by the defendant and two others. The victim was pursued by the attackers and, in the process, went off a nearby dock into a river and drowned. The homicide conviction was upheld. In Dyers v. State, the court held that notwithstanding the victim's refusal of immediate medical treatment after the defendant's attack, the evidence was sufficient to authorize the jury to find that the victim's death was caused by injuries inflicted upon him by the defendant.

In at least one situation, however, the court has held that the victim's acts did serve to cut off the defendant's liability for the ensuing death. In Thacker v. State, the defendant was indicted for involuntary manslaughter arising out of a drag racing incident in which the decedent was competing against the defendant. The indictment charged unlawful act involuntary manslaughter in that the defendant was violating several provisions of the motor vehicle code and, thus, caused the decedent's death. The immediate cause of death was the decedent's loss of control of his car. The defendant's demurrer to the indictment was overruled by the trial court. The Georgia Court of Appeals reversed the trial court's action, holding that the facts indicated that the defendant was not the "proximate cause" of the death of the victim. The decedent's loss of control was the cause of the death and this act, in the court's analysis, was not chargeable to the defendant. While this fact situation can be distinguished from the earlier ones in that here, unlike the prior cases, no compulsion on the victim was being exerted by the defendant, this case may also be explained on some rudimentary assumption of the risk notion. The decedent may be seen as an equally culpable wrongdoer whose death will not be attributed to the defendant. In this analysis, Thacker may stand for the broader proposition that the deaths of co-conspirators or accomplices ordinarily will not be seen to have been caused by a defendant's violation of the law.

The expiration of a year and a day between the defendant's acts and the victim's death can no longer serve to cut off the defendant's criminal liability. At common law, to constitute the offense of criminal homicide death must have occurred within a year and a day from the infliction of the wound. This common-law rule, not having been expressly changed by statute, prevailed in Georgia. The year-and-a-day rule provided a limit to prosecutions for murder and eliminated speculation as to causation at a time when medical science was much less sophisticated and cause was difficult to prove. In 1968, the General Assembly adopted a new criminal code that was intended to supersede the common law. Because the year-and-a-day rule was not included as part of what was intended to be a comprehensive criminal code, the adoption of the criminal code in 1968 ended the viability of the year-and-a-day rule in this state. In 1991, the General Assembly with the enactment of § 16-5-4 made statutory the Georgia Supreme Court's ruling in State v. Cross, that the year-and-a-day rule is not the law of Georgia.

A defense that someone or something else other than the defendant caused the victim's death necessarily challenges only the identity of the person or event which inflicted the fatal injury on the victim. It does not call into question uncontroverted evidence that the injury, however or by whomever inflicted, was the sole cause of the victim's death. Unless the defendant adduces evidence that the other injuries sustained by the victim were related to the medical reasons for the victim's death or that this evidence otherwise casts a light on the identity of the person or event which inflicted the fatal injury on the victim, there is no abuse of the trial court's discretion in excluding evidence of any injuries other than the injury that caused the victim's death.

In State v. Williams, the court held that failure to allege a precise time of death in an indictment for murder rendered the indictment subject to demurrer. It was unclear, said the court, whether the indictment alleged death at the point of cessation of heartbeat, at the point of brain death, or at somatic death. The failure to either allege the time of death or to allege the method of death relied upon by the state rendered the indictment too uncertain. The court did not indicate which definition of death is appropriate or whether alternatives are available to the prosecution.

In Phillips v. State, the court held that an indictment failing to specify the cause of death is sufficient when the circumstances of the case will not admit of greater certainty in stating the means of death.

An indictment charging the defendant with causing the victim's death by two methods would put the defendant on notice that he needs to defend against proof that he caused the victim's death by both of these methods. Thus, an instruction to the jury that it can find the defendant guilty if it finds that he caused the victim's death by either or both methods would not require the defendant to defend against a cause of death that was not alleged in the indictment and would not operate to subject the defendant to a later prosecution for the same offense.

E. Admissibility of Evidence

The admissibility of certain kinds of evidence in homicide trials has been dealt with in numerous cases.

1. Battered Syndromes

In Smith v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court reversed a conviction for the erroneous exclusion of testimony by a clinical psychologist concerning the "battered woman syndrome." The psychologist would have testified to the phenomenon of battered women and that the defendant (a woman who killed her live-in boyfriend) fell within the battered woman profile. The court held that this evidence should have been admitted as part of the defendant's claim of self-defense. The court concluded that "the expert's testimony explaining why a person suffering from battered woman's syndrome would not leave her mate, would not inform police or friends, and would fear increased aggression against herself, would be such conclusions that jurors could not ordinarily draw for themselves." Thus, the expert testimony was admissible. However, whether the defendant shot her mate in self-defense is not a question outside the ken of the average juror, and is not a proper subject for expert testimony.

In another case, however, the court refused to reverse a murder conviction where similar evidence was offered. The terse analysis in Mullis v. State does not reveal much of the court's reasoning. It may be that the defendant did not offer evidence of self-defense in her testimony. The opinion seems to indicate that the only defense was accident.

In Chapman v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court held that although evidence of the "battered woman syndrome" is admissible, it is not a separate defense. Rather, evidence of the syndrome is admissible in an attempt to show that the defendant had a mental state necessary for the defense of justification although the actual threat of harm does not immediately precede the homicide.

In Pugh v. State, the court held that as evidence of the "battered woman syndrome" is admissible for the purposes of establishing (1) reasonable fear of the wife in connection with a claim of self-defense and (2) general character for violence of the husband, such evidence may not be excluded because the defendant failed to satisfy the basis for admissibility of the same evidence as relevant to insanity, mental illness, or mental incompetency. The court emphasized that the fact that such evidence is admissible in connection with an issue of self-defense, does not mean that it can be used to raise the issues of insanity, mental illness, or mental incompetency without prior compliance with the notice provisions of Uniform Superior Court Rule 31.4 [now Rule 31.5].

The rationale for the admission of expert testimony on the battered woman syndrome should not be applied to a case merely because the defendant's expert would testify that the defendant's actions were "activated and driven by the same psychological dynamics" as those in the battered woman syndrome. This rationale was pronounced by the Georgia Supreme Court in Smith v. State as the result of a need to treat a complex area of human response and behavior. If the facts of a case do not create a comparable need, expert testimony providing a psychological explanation for the defendant's actions is not relevant to the jury's consideration of his justification defense.

A number of factors must be considered in determining whether a self-defense claim based on the battered person syndrome has been established. These factors include evidence of a close personal relationship between the defendant and the victim; a pattern of physical, sexual, or psychological abuse; and a reasonable apprehension of harm. If there is only limited or no evidence of these factors in a case, then the evidence does not rise to the level of battering necessary to rely on the battered person syndrome as a basis for a self-defense claim. Therefore, expert testimony that the defendant suffers from the syndrome would be inadmissible. Verbal or emotional abuse can warrant the introduction of expert testimony on the battered person syndrome. However, the psychological abuse inflicted on the defendant must have been of such an extreme nature that it engendered in the defendant a reasonable belief in the imminence of the victim's use of unlawful force. Psychological abuse which humiliates, embarrasses, or abases an individual, when unaccompanied by other acts or verbal statements giving rise to a reasonable fear of imminent physical harm, cannot alone justify the admission of expert testimony on the battered person syndrome.

Consistent with the concept of the battered person syndrome as an evidentiary component of the defense of justification, the General Assembly amended the law relating to self-defense in 1993 to provide that in a prosecution for murder or manslaughter, if a defendant raises a justification defense, the defendant, in order to establish the defendant's reasonable belief that the use of force or deadly force was immediately necessary, may be permitted to offer (1) relevant evidence that the defendant had been the victim of acts of family violence or child abuse committed by the deceased and (2) relevant expert testimony regarding the condition of the mind of the defendant at the time of the offense, including those relevant facts and circumstances relating to the family violence or child abuse that are the bases of the expert's opinion. Thus, a defendant who was a prior victim of abuse may offer battered person syndrome evidence to illustrate his or her reasonable belief in the imminence of the victim's use of unlawful force. Evidence that the defendant suffered from battered person syndrome is only another circumstance which, if believed by the jury, would authorize a finding that a reasonable person, who had experienced prior physical abuse such as was endured by the defendant, would reasonably believe that the use of force against the victim was necessary, even though that belief may have been, in fact, erroneous. The General Assembly's provision for the admissibility of relevant expert testimony regarding the condition of the defendant's mind in a situation of abuse has not otherwise changed the rule in homicides where justification is raised as a defense, namely, that justification is based upon the fears of a reasonable person, not upon the reasonable fears of the defendant.

Where the defendant's expert avers on direct examination that the defendant did suffer from the battered person syndrome and did believe death or great bodily injury was imminent, the trial court may permit the state's expert to testify in rebuttal.

Any error in precluding a defense expert from testifying about post-traumatic stress disorder would be harmless where there was extensive testimony concerning the victim's acts of violence and extensive testimony concerning the battered woman syndrome that was cumulative of testimony the expert would have given on the disorder.

Where a defense expert testifies that he relied upon the defendant's medical records in reaching the conclusion that his client was not malingering of faking the battered-person claim, it is permissible for the prosecutor to cross-examine the expert about those records.

It should be noted that a jury is not required to believe the testimony of defense witnesses supporting a battered-person claim but is authorized to find, instead, that the defendant intentionally shot the victim under circumstances which did not constitute self-defense.

Specific instructions on the battered person syndrome are appropriate when warranted by the evidence and requested by the defendant. In Smith v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court announced the rule that when a battered person syndrome self-defense claim has been properly established, the trial court should give specific jury instructions on justification by self-defense which are tailored to explain how the defendant's experiences as a battered person affected that defendant's state of mind at the time of the killing. Thus, in addition to the general instruction on justification, an instruction must be given to explain to the jury the relevancy of the battered person syndrome evidence as it relates to the reasonableness of the defendant's belief that the use of deadly force was immediately necessary to defend herself against the victim's imminent use of unlawful force.

Evidence that the defendant suffered abuse at the hands of others may not be used in determining whether she acted with the fear of a reasonable person under the circumstances. An instruction to the jury on this principle would be a correct statement of the law.

Although evidence of actual danger immediately preceding the homicide would not authorize instructions on the battered person syndrome, the mere fact that the defendant offers this evidence in furtherance of a justification defense does not mean that battered person syndrome instructions would be unauthorized as a matter of law. A defendant who pursues alternative defense theories is entitled to requested instructions on both theories, if there is some evidence to support each theory. Thus, if the defendant offers, in addition to evidence of actual danger immediately preceding the homicide, evidence of the battered person syndrome to show his reasonable, but erroneous, belief that danger was imminent, then the trial court should give requested instructions on the battered person syndrome.

To make a prima facie showing of self-defense based upon the battered person syndrome, a defendant should present the opinion testimony of an expert as well as independent testimony regarding the historical facts upon which the expert relies. If the defendant presents testimony regarding the historical facts but presents no expert testimony whatsoever, he fails to make a prima facie showing of the battered person syndrome, and the trial court would not be obligated to give requested instructions on that syndrome.

There is no general mandate requiring a trial court, when responding to a jury's request for a recharge on the justification defense, to also recharge on all principles asserted in connection with that defense. Rather, the trial court in its discretion may recharge the jury in full or only upon the point or points requested. By confining the scope of recharge so as only to answer the jury's specific questions, the trial court does not mislead or confuse the jurors, nor does it effectively curtail the jury's consideration of the principles connected with the defense.

The defendant is not entitled to the effective assistance of her expert. Thus, even if the expert mistakenly testifies that the defendant was suffering from the battered person syndrome, while, in fact, she was suffering from the rape trauma syndrome, the defendant would not be deprived of her due process right to a fair trial.

A colloquy between the trial court and defense expert that has the beneficial effect of educating the jury as well as informing the trial court on the evolution of the battered person syndrome, upon which the defendant predicates his defense, does not constitute an erroneous expression of opinion on the issues to be decided in the case in violation of § 17-8-57. The "plain error" principle would have no application under these circumstances.

In Sanders v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court ruled that evidence of the "battering parent syndrome" was not admissible as part of the state's case-in-chief in a prosecution of a mother for the murder of her child. The court held that while the state witness did not explicitly testify that the defendant fit the profile of the battering parent, the implication of the testimony was clear. The reasonable juror could be expected to match the profile to the characteristics of the defendant and conclude from this that the defendant had murdered her baby.

The Sanders court held that the state may not introduce such evidence unless the defendant has placed his or her character in issue or has asserted a defense which the battering parent syndrome could serve to rebut. The court found that the admission of the testimony in this case was erroneous, but affirmed the conviction on a finding of harmless error. The court did not identify which defenses in this kind of case would be rebuttable by introduction of the battering parent syndrome.

In another admissibility case, Payne v. State, the court held that evidence of the battered child syndrome was admissible against the defendant who was convicted of the murder of a 22-month-old child. The court held that this testimony was admissible to rebut the defense theory of accident or mistake.

Where the defendant is not claiming to have committed the homicide in self-defense but rather attempting to mitigate the element of intent in pursuit of a verdict of voluntary manslaughter, testimony regarding the victim's abuse of the defendant showing that the defendant was undergoing emotional and physical turmoil at the time of the homicide would not be relevant. Such testimony would not be relevant because the question in a voluntary manslaughter case is not whether the provocation proffered by the defendant was sufficient to excite a deadly passion in the particular defendant. Rather, it is whether such provocation was sufficient to excite such passion in a reasonable person.

2. Victim's Reputation for Violence

A great deal of litigation has revolved around attempts by homicide defendants to introduce evidence concerning the victim's general reputation for violence or specific acts of violence toward the defendant or toward others. Normally, the purpose of this evidence is to establish a self-defense defense or to support the defendant's theory that any homicide was voluntary manslaughter and not murder. The Georgia Supreme Court in Bennett v. State set out a synthesis of the law in this area. The following appears with citations omitted:

> Generally, the reputation or character of a murder victim for violence is irrelevant and inadmissible in criminal proceedings . . .. However, when relying on the defense of justification in a homicide case the accused may offer evidence of the violent character of the deceased victim if he makes a prima facie showing that the victim was the aggressor and was assailing the defendant, and that the defendant was honestly seeking to defend himself. Once the defendant makes a prima facie case for justification, he may offer evidence of the victim's general reputation for violence, including the victim's general reputation for a specific type of violence, such as for shooting people. Such evidence is admissible to corroborate the defendant's testimony that the victim was violent on the occasion in question and to show the defendant's state of mind (reasonable fear) at the time of the incident in question. Moreover, although the defendant may not prove the victim's general reputation for violence by specific acts of violence, if the defendant makes out a prima facie case for justification, he may offer evidence of 'prior specific assaults by the deceased upon the defendant to illustrate his contention that he reasonably believed he had to use deadly force to defend himself.'

It should be noted that even in situations where the defendant might have been permitted by the above rules to introduce evidence concerning the victim's general reputation for violence, he was not permitted to introduce evidence concerning specific acts of violence on other individuals. These rules have been cited and applied in a number of cases.

In Lolley v. State, Justice Weltner stated in his special concurring opinion that the rule reflected in Bennett v. State ought to be changed to permit evidence of specific acts of violence against third persons in cases where a defendant claims justification. In Chandler v. State, the court found the reasoning of Justice Weltner's special concurring opinion persuasive and held that the rule concerning prior specific acts of violence by the victim should be changed for future cases to comport with the special concurrence of Justice Weltner in Lolley v. State. Thus, as of September 12, 1991, evidence of specific acts of violence by a victim against third persons is admissible where the defendant claims justification. In Chandler, the court also imposed certain procedures to govern the introduction of such evidence. For example, the defendant must give advance notice to the state of his intention to introduce such evidence for that evidence to be admissible. Also, the defendant's notice must specify the dates, places, and names of the third persons involved. An inability to pinpoint the dates of the incidents would go to the weight of the evidence, not its admissibility. It should be noted, however, that the notice by itself does not make the evidence admissible; the defendant must also present a legitimate claim of justification. The procedures governing the introduction of such evidence were incorporated into the Uniform Superior Court Rules in 1993. The defendant must comply with these procedures only when he is seeking to introduce evidence of the victim's specific acts of violence against third persons. His compliance with these procedures is not required when he is seeking to introduce evidence of his prior difficulties with the victim to support a claim of justification. Finally, the defendant must establish by competent evidence that the victim's prior act involved violence.

The rule adopted in Chandler has been held to be applicable to prior acts of molestation and sexual assault by the victim against third persons. Where a defendant is seeking to establish the victim's propensity for seeking out and sexually assaulting young men and boys in a manner consistent with his claim of justification, evidence of the victim's prior acts of molestation and sexual assault is highly relevant to that defense and should be admitted. Since acts of forcible molestation and sexual assault, by their very nature, involve violence, a showing that the victim's actions were accompanied by independent acts of violence is not required for the purpose of establishing the defendant's claim of justification.

Since revenge for the molestation of one's child is not a material exculpatory factor in a criminal case, evidence of the victim's alleged commission of prior acts of molestation, standing alone, would not be admissible in defense of a homicidal act. Only if the defendant acted in accordance with the legally recognized exculpatory motive of justification, rather than revenge, would evidence of the victim's bad character and specific acts of molestation be admissible on the defendant's behalf. Otherwise, such evidence would constitute an irrelevant attack on the character of the deceased victim who could not answer the charges of molestation being asserted against him.

In response to the defendant's claim of justification and to evidence that the victim was the first aggressor, the state may present evidence of the victim's reputation for peacefulness.

If evidence offered by the defendant renders the desired inferences of lack of motive and self-defense more probable than they would be without the evidence, it is relevant and should be admitted. In Smith v. State, the court held that evidence that the victim carried a sawed-off shotgun and solicited a person to help commit a robbery and murder rendered the defendant's desired inferences of lack of motive and self-defense more probable because it supported his claim that he and the victim had gone into the woods to test-fire their guns in anticipation of a robbery and because it showed that the victim possessed one of the shotguns and therefore could have fired at the defendant first. Thus, evidence of the victim's alleged possession and solicitation offenses prior to the shooting was relevant and should have been admitted. Further, because the state could not point to a specific victim of the alleged offenses, they did not constitute specific acts of violence by the victim against a third party. Thus, the pretrial notice provisions governing the introduction of evidence of such acts was inapplicable to the alleged offenses.

3. Victim's State of Mind

The general rule is that evidence of threats previously made by the victim but uncommunicated to the defendant is not admissible on the question of whether the defendant was justified in killing the victim. However, such evidence may be admitted as an exception to the hearsay rule when offered not for the truth of the matter asserted but to show the victim's state of mind. This evidence is only admissible when there is a conflict in the evidence as to who started the fight, to corroborate evidence of threats which in fact were communicated, and to establish the attitude of the victim. Where the evidence adduced belies the defendant's contention that the uncommunicated threat showed the victim's state of mind, the hearsay exception does not apply.

Where the victim's statement, "I can't stand the SOB," on the night of the murder is the only evidence of animus between the victim and the defendant, it is admissible to show the victim's state of mind and attitude at the time of the crime.

Evidence which tends to show the victim's state of mind in regard to the defendant may be relevant in instances in which the defendant claims self-defense.

4. Victim's Statements Prior to Death

Testimony as to the victim's statements in regard to what had transpired prior to the infliction of his fatal injuries is admissible under the "dying declaration" exception to the hearsay rule. The fact that the victim did not see the assailant does not automatically render his identification of the accused inadmissible. Also, testimony as to the victim's statements made shortly after the infliction of his fatal injuries is admissible under the res gestae exception to the hearsay rule.

Testimony as to a victim's statement that the defendant was out to get him or do anything to kill him is admissible under the necessity exception to the hearsay rule where necessity and particularized guarantees of trustworthiness have been established. Formerly, the victim's death, in and of itself, was sufficient to satisfy the necessity component of the exception. However, the Georgia Supreme Court has held that death or unavailability of the victim cannot alone satisfy the necessity component without allowing the exception to swallow the rule. Additionally, the proponent of the evidence must show that the statement is relevant to a material fact and that the statement is more probative on that material fact than other evidence that may be procured and offered. The trustworthiness component is satisfied if the trial court, after examining the totality of the circumstances surrounding the making of the statements sought to be introduced, determines that there are sufficient indicia of reliability. Where the hearsay statements of the victim are not "testimonial" in nature, indicia of reliability other than the opportunity for cross-examination are constitutionally permissible considerations in applying the necessity exception to Georgia's hearsay rule. The admission of "testimonial" hearsay statements without the opportunity for cross-examination, however, constitutes error but would be harmless where there is no reasonable probability that the statements contributed to the verdict.

A victim's statements alleging an attack by the defendant on the victim that are made in response to a police officer's questions during a time when there is no longer an ongoing emergency are testimonial in nature, and it is a violation of the Confrontation Clause of the Sixth Amendment to admit the hearsay account of the attack over a defendant's objection where the defendant has had no previous opportunity for cross-examination.

Since there is nothing inherent in the attorney-client relationship that suggests a spouse will naturally utter a truthful statement in consulting an attorney about a divorce, there is no bright-line rule that any statement of a deceased spouse to a divorce attorney about the other spouse's violence during the marriage is admissible under the necessity exception to the hearsay rule. Rather, the totality of the circumstances surrounding the making of the out-of-court statement determines whether there is sufficient indicia of trustworthiness.

Testimony as to the victim's statement, which was precipitated by the defendant's death threat against him and which was the result of a spontaneous reaction, is admissible under the excited utterance exception to the hearsay rule. Testimony as to the victim's statements made during an argument with the defendant, when offered to prove the fact of the argument itself and not the truth or falsity of its contents, is admissible as original evidence to show the increasing tension between the defendant and the victim.

For a victim's conversation with a witness about prior difficulties with the defendant to be admissible under § 24-3-2, the conversation must be known to the defendant. Then if and only if the defendant's conduct or motives are relevant to the issues being tried, the conversation upon which the defendant acted would be admissible. It is admissible because it represents original evidence to prove the very fact that such a conversation occurred, not its truth or falsity.

5. Victim's Medical Records

Hospital records pertaining to the admission and treatment of the victim that contain recordations of acts, transactions, occurrences, and events that are normally recorded during the course of a hospital's business are excepted from the rule prohibiting the admission of hearsay and thus are admissible.

American Red Cross records showing the victim's blood group are admissible under the business records exception to the hearsay rule when the state lays the proper foundation by offering the testimony of an American Red Cross employee demonstrating that blood grouping is determined by machine testing and thus the matter constitutes objective factual data maintained in the regular course of business. Also, the records must contain neither opinion nor diagnosis. These records are not the type of investigation-generated written scientific report subject to discovery by the defendant.

6. Victim's Alcohol Use

Where the defendant fails to show what, if any, effect alcohol had on the victim at the time of the fatal incident, the trial court is authorized to exclude evidence of the victim's alcohol use.

An expert may not testify about the effects of alcohol on the victim unless evidence of the victim's blood alcohol level has been properly admitted at trial. A report showing the blood alcohol level of the victim is admissible when the defendant lays a proper foundation for either the admission of the report or the expert's testimony regarding the test results contained in the report by showing that the witness is familiar with the method of record keeping or that he can testify that the entry of the test results was made in the regular course of business at the time the test was conducted or within a reasonable time thereafter.

7. Victim's Drug Use

Where the defense cannot demonstrate how the use of drugs contributed to the behavior of the victim at the time of the shooting that would be relevant to the defendant's justification defense, evidence of the victim's drug use is properly excluded as being too speculative. Moreover, where evidence of the victim's prior drug use would not tend to prove his reputation for violence nor the reasonableness of the defendant's claim that the use of deadly force was necessary, it is properly excluded.

Where the connection between the victim's cocaine abuse and the infection that contributed to his death amounts to nothing more than sheer speculation, the trial court's exclusion of any mention of the victim's cocaine use from the evidence would not be erroneous.

8. Victim's Character

Where the defendant does not assert a defense of justification, evidence of the murder victim's character, such as his conflict with a third party, is irrelevant and inadmissible.

Incidental characterizations of the victim that are relevant to the facts of the murder are admissible.

Testimony regarding the victim's reckless behavior on the night in question is allowed so the jury can consider whether the victim's recklessness on the subject evening contributed to his death. However, evidence regarding prior instances of such behavior is irrelevant.

Evidence regarding the victim's homosexuality would be admissible to the extent it is relevant to the defendant's claim of self-defense against the victim's unwelcome homosexual advances. However, evidence of the victim's homosexual relationships presented merely to attack the victim's character would not be admissible.

9. Victim's Identity

The actual bones and body parts of the victim are admissible where the gruesome appearance of such evidence has not been caused by any act of the state and where such evidence is relevant to prove the identity of the victim and to show the location of the victim's fatal wound.

A photograph of a deceased victim is admissible to prove the victim's identity. While it is preferable for the trial court to admit the photograph of the victim alone, without extraneous material that is unnecessary to aid in identifying him, the trial court would not abuse its discretion in admitting a document that contained a non-inflammatory photograph of the victim in a suit and tie but that indicated that he had a Christian funeral service.

10. Victim's Insurance Policy

The introduction in a homicide case of evidence of the existence of insurance wherein the defendant is the beneficiary where that evidence has no relevance to the charge has the enormous potential for so infecting and inflaming the trial process that fundamental fairness can be easily compromised. Thus, in order to admit evidence of an insurance policy there must be some independent evidence of a nexus between the crime charged and the existence of the insurance policy.

Unless the defendant can establish a link between the victim's tattoos and his murder, it would not be an abuse of the trial court's discretion to rule such evidence inadmissible.

11. Defendant's State of Mind

If the defendant takes the position that the homicide was committed in self-defense, a crucial issue for jury determination is the defendant's state of mind at the time of the homicide. Thus, evidence that a urine sample taken from the defendant following the homicide tested positive for drugs is relevant as part of the res gestae because it makes the inference that the defendant was under the influence of drugs during the homicide more probable than it would have been in the absence of this evidence. If the defendant asserts that the homicide was committed in self-defense and that he was not the aggressor, testimony about the effects of liquor on his behavior is relevant and, in conjunction with evidence of the defendant's drinking and arguing with the victim on the day of the homicide, tends to establish the defendant's state of mind.

The defendant's mental state at the time of the homicide is not relevant to his guilt or innocence unless it is probative of his legal insanity. In Weems v. State, there was nothing to suggest that the defendant's purported "catastrophic reaction" to a beating he suffered prior to the shootings was probative of his legal insanity. He admitted that he intentionally fired shots into a crowd which included innocent children but did so only in self-defense. The expert testimony as to his "catastrophic reaction" to the beating was not admissible to illustrate the subsequent justification for his act. Whether, under the circumstances then existing, it was reasonable for the defendant to believe that firing his gun was necessary to prevent his death or great bodily injury was not beyond the ken of the average juror.

Similarly, in Brown v. State, the defendant sought to introduce evidence of his depression at the time of the attack as a circumstance for the jury to consider in deciding whether he had the intent to kill the victim. However, any depression suffered by the defendant was not a legal defense to the murder. The expert evidence was irrelevant to the state of mind necessary to determine the defendant's guilt in light of the absence of an insanity or other relevant mental health defense. Thus, the exclusion of the expert's testimony did not deny the defendant the right to a defense nor compel him to take the stand in order to defend himself.

A defendant would not be entitled to a charge that the jury can consider post-traumatic stress disorder in connection with a justification defense, where there is no factual evidence supporting the claim that the defendant reasonably believed that deadly force was necessary to protect himself from the victim.

In Rivera v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court held that based on evidence presented at trial, including the testimony of the defense's experts and the most recent scientific articles at the time of trial pertaining to the theory that there is a connection between frontal lobe dysfunction and criminality, it would be a proper exercise of the trial court's discretion to conclude that this theory has not reached a scientific stage of verifiable certainty to be admissible at trial.

12. Defendant's Character

Only where a defendant makes an election to place his good character in issue may the state offer evidence of the defendant's general bad character or his prior convictions. A defendant does not put his character in issue by inadvertent statements regarding his own good conduct.

Although evidence as to the general reputation of the victim for violence may be admissible to corroborate the accused's claim of self-defense and to show the accused's reasonable fear, the general reputation of the accused for violence is not admissible for any purpose where the accused himself has not first put his own character into issue.

Evidence of a "syndrome" or a "profile" that suggests to the jury that a defendant shares the typical characteristics of a batterer or an abuser is inadmissible unless the defendant has placed his character in issue or has raised some defense which the syndrome is relevant to rebut.

While evidence of good character is a substantive fact, which should be considered by the jury along with other facts tending to bear on the question of guilt or innocence, evidence of good character is not a substantive defense to murder. Evidence of a prior conviction is admissible for impeachment purposes to rebut evidence of good character, although the lapse of time may have rendered evidence of the conviction inadmissible as evidence of an independent transaction. Whenever there is evidence to support a charge on good character and the defendant requests that such a charge be given, the jury must be instructed that it may consider good character evidence in its deliberations.

Until the credibility of the defendant is attacked, either for bad character or because of contradictory statements, the defense can not introduce evidence in support of his good reputation for veracity.

Evidence of the defendant's ownership or possession of a firearm does not impute bad character and is therefore admissible.

Evidence that the defendant failed to grieve for the victim is relevant to a murder case and is not rendered inadmissible by the fact that it only incidentally places his character in issue.

A defendant's incriminating statement is admissible as an admission against his penal interest because the statement is the admission of a party-opponent.

Testimony about the defendant's extramarital affairs would be admissible even though it incidentally places his character into evidence if it is relevant to prove identity and to impeach the defendant's testimony about his good relationship with the victim.

Whereas evidence of drug use is inadmissible when it is intended only to impugn character and has no relevance to any disputed issues in the case, evidence that the defendant was a drug-user and thereby more disposed to be upset with the victim for not returning the cocaine would clearly be relevant to disputed issues in the case and probative of the reason behind the disagreement that led to the victim's death. The fact that the testimony incidentally placed the defendant's character in issue by showing that he used illegal drugs would not otherwise cause the testimony to be excluded.

It would not be error for a trial court to refuse to suppress a portion of a defendant's videotaped interview on the basis that statements about his alcohol consumption improperly placed his character at issue because generally an adult's consumption of alcohol is irrelevant to the issue of character.

Bankruptcy documents that establish the defendant's motive for shooting the victim would be admissible. The fact that the bankruptcy documents may incidentally reflect on the defendant's character would not render the evidence inadmissible.

Where a witness injects the defendant's character into issue by referring to a prior act of misconduct in an answer not responsive to the question asked and the trial court instructs the jury to disregard the unresponsive answer, it is not error for the trial court to deny a motion for mistrial. While the better practice is to deny the motion for mistrial after instructing the jury to disregard the nonresponsive answer, the trial court would not abuse its discretion in denying a mistrial where trial counsel declined to have a curative instruction given.

Testimony concerning the defendant's positive influence in the community would constitute evidence of good character and would permit the state to offer rebuttal evidence.

13. "Another Dude Done It" Defense

Evidence concerning others who were implicated in the murder during the investigation, which bears directly on the accused's sole defense, is relevant and should be admitted. However, the proffered testimony must raise a reasonable inference of the defendant's innocence. It is proper to exclude testimony which is offered in support of a contention that someone else may have committed the murder, where no specific person is accused and the defendant merely speculates that a person or persons unknown may have had the opportunity to commit the murder. Also, it is proper to exclude testimony which does not directly connect the other person to the corpus delicti nor show that the other person had recently committed a similar crime by similar methods, but reflects only on the other person's character. Moreover, it is proper to exclude evidence that does nothing more than toss a bare suspicion in the direction of another person.

14. Defendant's Knowledge of Co-conspirator's Capacity to Commit Murder

Evidence of other crimes committed by a defendant's co-conspirator that is presented to show that the defendant knew of the co-conspirator's capacity and/or propensity to commit murder and that the defendant procured the co-conspirator to commit a murder is relevant and should be admitted.

15. Defendant's Motive, Intent, Plan or Scheme, or Bent of Mind

The following evidence has been held admissible to illustrate the defendant's motive, intent, plan or scheme, or bent of mind: (1) evidence of prior difficulties between the defendant and the victim; (2) evidence that the defendant had previously thrown bottles at another individual during an argument with that individual just prior to the shooting of the victim; (3) testimony that other persons had previously shot at the defendant while he was on his business premises and that he had returned fire; (4) evidence of the defendant's participation in a "fight" which occurred about four to five hours before the victim's death; (5) evidence of independent crimes or acts which occurred before or after the crimes charged in the instant case; (6) evidence concerning a homicide committed subsequent to the homicide on trial; (7) testimony relating to other offenses on the date of the crime and testimony concerning incriminating statements made by the defendant about the murder while committing another offense; (8) testimony concerning a statement made by the defendant several years prior to the murder describing the manner he would use to kill someone, which was the manner used to kill the victim; (9) testimony as to various threats, boasts, and admission made by the defendant; (10) evidence of the defendant's bisexuality where there was evidence of the victim's homosexuality and where evidence of homosexuality was related to the facts of the case; (11) evidence concerning a biting incident during a prior act of sodomy with someone other than the victim; (12) evidence explaining the relationship between the defendant and the child victim; (13) evidence of a romantic involvement between the defendant and the victim; (14) statements made by the victim before her death about her adulterous relationship with someone other than the defendant; (15) letters to and from the defendant and the co-defendant showing the existence of a relationship between the two; (16) evidence that the defendant was a drug dealer, that he used drugs with and sold drugs to the victim, and that there was a dispute between him and the victim regarding drugs; (17) evidence that the intended murder victim had stolen narcotics from the defendant; (18) evidence that the defendant was arrested on a drug charge a few days before the victim's murder; (19) evidence of the defendant's membership in a satanic group; (20) evidence of the defendant's membership in a gang; (21) evidence of the defendant's racist beliefs and Klan affiliation; (22) a notebook possessed by the defendant containing hieroglyphic religious drawings and references to the occult; (23) evidence of a movie possessed by the defendant which depicts the conduct with which the defendant is charged; (24) a weapon possessed by the defendant; and (25) evidence that the defendant was a fugitive from another jurisdiction.

Evidence of the defendant's motive is relevant, even though it may incidentally place his character in evidence. Evidence of motive is not subject to the notice and hearing requirements of Uniform Superior Court Rules 31.1 and 31.3.

The introduction of improper evidence that goes to a motive to kill is harmless error where there is a conviction for felony murder which requires no such motive.

15.1. Defendant's Tattoos

A photograph of a tattoo on the body of the defendant is admissible when it is evidence of a possible motive for the crime or when it is used for purposes of identification. A photograph of the defendant's tattoo is irrelevant, however, when it is used to establish that the defendant acted in conformity with the tattoo. The existence of a tattoo, in and of itself, does not establish a defendant's propensity to act in conformance with that depicted in the tattoo. Thus, where the prosecution presents evidence of a defendant's tattoo which depicts a weapon similar to that involved in the crime, its admission would constitute error when its only purpose is to establish the defendant's propensity to use such a weapon. Nevertheless, where the erroneous admission of such evidence does not contribute to the verdict, it does not constitute reversible error.

Where the elicitation of the defendant's unguarded response to a perceived confidante regarding the circumstances of the crimes in which they had both participated was clearly designed to procure an unfiltered, genuine statement from the defendant and where there is no evidence that the police investigative techniques were designed to induce the slightest hope of benefit or fear of injury in the confidante, the defendant's resulting inculpatory statements during the secretly-taped telephone conversation between the defendant and the confidante would not be considered involuntary and therefore inadmissible under § 24-3-50.

16. Videotapes and Photographs

Videotapes, like still photographs, are admissible when relevant to an issue, even if inflammatory. A videotape showing the position of the victim's body at the crime scene is admissible.

Pre-autopsy photographs taken of the victim are relevant to the nature of the victim's wounds and cause of death and are therefore admissible. A post-autopsy photograph of the victim that does not depict any alteration of the body which may have occurred during the autopsy is also relevant to show the wound that caused the decedent's death. Since such a photograph does not show a material fact which became apparent only because of the autopsy, the state is not required to lay a foundation for its admission. A post-autopsy photograph depicting an alteration of the victim's body is admissible when it is necessary to show some material fact which became apparent only because of the autopsy. The defendant's admission that he killed the victim does not render photographs of the victim's body inadmissible.

17. Medical Examiner's and Other Experts' Testimony

The medical examiner who performed the autopsy should be permitted to express his opinion as to causation where his conclusion is one which jurors would not ordinarily be able to draw for themselves, i.e., the conclusion is beyond the ken of the average layman. However, where the factors which led the medical examiner to his conclusion that the victim's death was a homicide are factors well within the knowledge and understanding of the jury, where his investigation did not lead to that conclusion, and where his expertise was not needed or used in reaching that conclusion, the medical examiner should not be permitted to testify that, in his opinion, the manner of death, as opposed to the cause of death, was due to homicide. Likewise, a medical examiner should not be permitted to testify that the childhood maltreatment syndrome or abused child syndrome was the "manner" in which the fatal injuries occurred, and that the fatal injuries occurred "in the process" of the childhood maltreatment syndrome, since such testimony constitutes an opinion that the fatal injuries in fact resulted from child abuse, a conclusion that jurors would have the ability to reach for themselves. While the better practice is for medical examiners to be instructed not to state a conclusion that the death resulted from homicide, such a conclusion does not improperly invade the province of the jury if the conclusion merely reiterates and underscores the medical examiner's previous testimony as to causation and if the jury can reach no conclusion, based on this testimony, other than that the death was a homicide.

If the autopsy report of a prior medical examiner has been admitted under the business records exception to the hearsay rule, it is permissible for the current medical examiner to read aloud the report as redacted. Furthermore, even though the current medical examiner's opinion is based on facts contained in the report, his opinion does not constitute the restatement of the diagnostic opinion of another expert.

Where the victim's body has not been found, the medical examiner who has observed the crime scene should be allowed to give expert opinion testimony as to whether a death had occurred.

A medical examiner, who has been qualified as an expert in ballistics, may testify as to the significance of gunpowder residue found on the victim's shirt. Likewise, a forensic pathologist, who has been qualified to testify based on special knowledge derived from experience or study, may state an opinion as to the distance between the gun and the victim and the angle of trajectory of the bullet which entered his body. A treating physician of the victim, who has been qualified as an expert in the field of emergency medicine with experience in treating stab wounds, may testify regarding the force required to cause the victim's fatal injury.

A medical expert for the defense, who is a trained physician licensed to practice in this state, is qualified to testify on pathological matters. However, his testimony will be limited to matters within his own personal knowledge and facts admitted at trial and presented to him in the form of hypothetical questions.

The opinion of a crime lab expert that a hair found at the crime scene and the defendant's hair sample have a common origin is admissible under § 24-9-67. The fact that the expert does not discount the victim as the possible source of the hair goes to the weight to be given the evidence, not its admissibility.

A crime scene reconstructionist, who has been qualified as an expert in the field of behavioral science, may testify that a perpetrator might move or cover a victim's body to depersonalize the victim because a close relationship existed between the perpetrator and the victim.

The admission of testimony of the state's toxicologist that he had reviewed the work of the doctor who had originally prepared the toxicology report relating to the deceased victim and reached the same conclusion that the victim's blood sample tested negative for cocaine would not violate the defendant's constitutional right to confront the witnesses against him. The state toxicologist, having reviewed the data and testing procedures to determine the accuracy of the report, may base his opinion on data gathered by the doctor. His opinion then is more than a mere conduit for the doctor's findings.

18. Death Certificates

Conclusions on a death certificate of the events leading up to the death or regarding whether the cause of death was intentional or accidental are inadmissible. However, because the word "Homicide" is nothing more than an indication of the immediate agency of death, its exclusion from the death certificate upon its admission into evidence is not required. Where the cause of death on the death certificate is consistent with the testimony of the coroner who issued it, the certificate contains no improper hearsay which would preclude its admission.

A death certificate properly completed by a medical examiner is considered prima facie evidence of both the death itself and the cause of the death. A death certificate is accorded initial prima facie evidentiary value regardless of the examiner's credibility. For this reason, death certificates that are properly redacted to show only prima facie evidence of the fact that a death occurred and the causes of the death are not subject to the "continuing witness" rule and may go out with the jury.

19. Murder Weapon

A weapon may be admissible if the identification is sufficient to allow the jury to decide, under the evidence relative to identification, whether it is the identical weapon used by the defendant. Because the pretrial procedures used to determine the constitutional admissibility of identification testimony do not apply when the identity of a weapon is concerned, the exclusionary remedy is also inapplicable. Any suggestiveness in the identification of the weapon is relevant to the weight, not the admissibility, of the evidence. Thus, the proper manner for contesting identification testimony is by cross-examination at trial, not by a pretrial motion to suppress. The jury, not the trial court, decides whether the identification of the weapon is dependable and accurate.

A warrant issued and executed at the request of the lead detective investigating a victim's murder makes it more probable that the gun recovered pursuant to that warrant is the murder weapon involved in the case. This fact is consequential to the determination of the prosecution against the defendant. Accordingly, a trial court would not abuse its discretion in overruling a defendant's objections, based solely on relevancy, to admission of the search warrant used to recover the murder weapon.

A weapon that was not actually used in the commission of a murder, but which is similar to that which was so used, is generally admissible into evidence. A murder weapon that has been dismantled and perhaps reassembled in a different manner while undergoing tests for fingerprints is still admissible in evidence. Where the murder weapon has not been recovered, the state may offer evidence, such as a piece of the victim's skull, to prove the size and character of the weapon used.

The atomic absorption test, which is used to detect trace elements of metals found in gunshot residue, has been held to be scientifically reliable and, therefore, admissible at trial.

The existence of technological advances that purportedly have made the metals found in gun residue more common in the environment, the failure to test the gun itself, and the lack of "blind testing," go to the weight to be accorded the atomic absorption test rather than to its admissibility.

Both the gun and the cartridge involved in a murder are distinct and recognizable physical objects which can be identified upon observation, obviating the necessity of a chain of custody showing.

20. Chain of Custody

When the state seeks to introduce into evidence an item that is subject to the chain of custody rule, it must establish with reasonable assurance that the item seized is the same as the item being offered into evidence. The chain of custody requirements apply only after the state has taken possession of an item. Absent affirmative evidence of tampering, challenges to evidence that focus on the period before the state took possession are governed by general rules of relevance and authentication. If there is a sufficient evidentiary connection between the defendant and the item received by the police, the item is admissible. Any doubt regarding this connection goes to the weight of the evidence not its admissibility, and the jury is charged with deciding how much weight to give evidence.

F. Venue

In homicide cases, charges taken verbatim from § 17-2-2(c) and (h) do not improperly impose a burden on defendants to disprove that venue was properly laid. Rather than creating burden-shifting presumptions regarding venue, § 17-2-2 provides the means by which a jury can ensure that the constitutional mandate of establishing venue beyond a reasonable doubt has been satisfied in cases where the state has brought forth evidence to establish venue and the defendant has introduced evidence intended to counter that showing. The statute does not require any compulsory or permissive presumptions to be drawn regarding whether venue in a particular forum is proper.

Nonetheless, in order to more clearly effectuate the intention of § 17-2-2 and to alleviate defendants' concerns about the creation of burden-shifting presumptions, the Georgia Supreme Court instructed that in future cases the better practice would be for trial courts, when charging juries, to refrain from quoting § 17-2-2(c) and (h) verbatim. Instead, trial courts should give to juries the charges quoted in the court's opinion in Napier v. State.

II. Murder and Manslaughter

A. Defined

Sections 16-5-1, 16-5-2, and 16-5-3 define the three major homicidal crimes: murder, voluntary manslaughter and involuntary manslaughter. That which generally distinguishes murder from manslaughter is the presence of malice aforethought, although a limited group of homicides are murder even though performed without malice. That which distinguishes voluntary from involuntary manslaughter is the intention to kill. An intentional, non-malicious killing is voluntary manslaughter, while an unintended non-malicious killing is usually involuntary manslaughter.

A homicide which is neither justifiable nor malicious could be either accident or felony murder, but not manslaughter.

B. Murder

1. Malice Murder

a. Mens Rea

The mens rea for malice murder is malice, which can be described simply as an intention to kill another human being. Section 16-5-1 identifies two kinds of malice: express and implied. The presence of two types of malice in the statute can be attributed to prior statutory drafting. The Georgia Supreme Court has never spent a great deal of time in distinguishing between the two kinds of malice, but it appears that express malice is that which is proven by the defendant's own actions outside the killing itself. For example, in Sheppard v. State the court said that evidence that the defendant deliberately aimed the car at the victims, that he was previously hostile toward the victims, that there were previous ill feelings between one of the victims and the defendant, and that defendant threatened the only surviving victim was sufficient to support what the court held was a finding of express malice. In Patterson v. State, the defendant urged that there was no proof of his intention to kill. The court held, however, that from the facts and circumstances of the case the jury was authorized to find that the defendant's killing of the victim was intentional and malicious. The defendant became angry because the victim had not repaid a small loan. After stating that he would shoot the victim, the defendant obtained a gun and, accompanied by several friends, confronted the victim. Although the defendant contended that he shot the victim to protect one of his friends, there was significant evidence to the contrary. After first shooting the victim in the leg, the defendant deliberately took aim and fired two shots into the victim's head. In Hansley v. State, the defendant contended that the state failed to prove malice. However, the evidence showed that the defendant, who had fought with the victim before, left the fight to get a gun from a friend's car, yelled that the victim would not get away this time, and fired several shots at the victim, who was attempting to enter his car. The court held that this evidence was more than sufficient to prove malice. In Somchith v. State, the defendant contended that the evidence did not show malice murder but only voluntary manslaughter provoked by the victim's sexual involvement with another man and their argument about it. However, the court held that ample evidence was presented to allow the jury to infer malice. The evidence showed that the defendant secured a pistol earlier on the day of the shooting and that he shot the victim not once, but four times, including a contact wound to the head. In Brown v. State, the defendant contended that evidence of the victim's alleged molestation of the defendant's daughter should have been admitted to show that he acted without malice. The court disagreed. Evidence only of past molestation of the child did not show that the defendant acted lawfully with present justification when he shot the victim, but showed that the defendant was motivated solely by revenge for the past molestation and authorized a finding that he was guilty of malice murder. In Sapp v. State, the court held that the jury was authorized to discredit the defendant's testimony that he lacked the malice necessary for murder and find based on the defendant's behavior before the shooting, the obscene comment he made about the victim, and his actions afterwards, that the defendant possessed the requisite malice when he shot and killed the victim. In Frezghi v. State, the defendant contended that the evidence showed only that he committed voluntary manslaughter, because the state did not contradict his testimony that the victim first stabbed him during an argument and that he became angry, took the knife from her, and could not control himself. The court, however, concluded that the evidence, including the numerous stab wounds and the cruel and deliberate nature of the final wound, was sufficient to authorize the jury to find the defendant guilty of malice murder. In Thomas v. State, the defendant contended that the state failed to present evidence that he acted with malice. The court, however, held that evidence that an electrical cord was wrapped twice around the victim's neck and then was tightened by repeatedly twisting the cord around a broom handle and that the defendant did not initially report the victim's purported threatening behavior supported the trial court's finding the defendant guilty of malice murder. The defendant's testimony that the victim provoked him did not establish, as a matter of law, that he did not act with malice since the existence of provocation does not preclude the existence of malice. In Hill v. State, the defendant contended he should not have been convicted of malice murder as there was no evidence of malice. The court, however, held that the circumstances of the defendant's attack on the victim were sufficient for the jury to find that he acted with the required malice. Although the defendant testified that his only intent was to rob the victim, he also testified that he observed that the victim was elderly and infirm to the point that he had to rest after a short walk and used an inhalant medication, and that he hit the victim hard enough to knock him to the ground.

This mens rea of express malice is not to be confused with premeditation which some jurisdictions define as the mental state required for first degree murder. Premeditation is not an element of murder in Georgia, and the malice which is required for murder can be formed in an instant so long as it is present at the time of the act of killing and, therefore, it is no defense that there was an insufficient amount of time for malice to be formed.

Motive is not an essential element of the crime of malice murder. Although motive may be relevant to the issues of intent and malice, it is not a separate element of the crime which must be proven by the state. While motive is not an essential element in the proof of the crime of murder, the state is entitled to present evidence to establish that there was a motive. The defendant, however, is not entitled to present evidence of a motive for his act which would not otherwise constitute a viable defense to his criminal liability.

Of course, the intention to kill, like any other intention, is rarely capable of proof out of the mouth of the defendant or through specific prior acts connected to him or her. It is the relatively rare defendant who will admit such an intention, unless he or she is claiming some justification defense. Therefore, the murder statute and the cases under it provide that there can be a finding by the trier of fact of implied malice. Although most murders in which this implied malice provides the mens rea can be described as intentional killings, there are situations in which the killing is unintentional but is committed with such an extreme indifference to human life ("abandoned and malignant heart" in the language of § 16-5-1) that the law finds such a killing to be as culpable as an intentional killing and, thus, murder.

Since "malice aforethought" is an essential element of murder, it should be defined by the trial court when it charges the jury on the statutory definition of murder. However, if the defendant does not request such a charge and the evidence is overwhelming that the killing took place intentionally and without justification or serious provocation, the failure to define malice does not require reversal.

A trial court's failure to charge on implied malice is not harmful when the jury is instructed that it must find actual malice before finding the defendant guilty of malice murder.

b. Deadly Weapon Doctrine

While the statute identifies two situations in which "implied" malice shall be found ("where no considerable provocation appears" and "abandoned and malignant heart"), the most fruitful kind of evidence which has been relied upon for a finding of implied malice has been the use of a deadly weapon, like a gun or knife. The courts had traditionally held that when a defendant used a deadly weapon to kill there was enough evidence to find the presence of malice. The method by which this was usually expressed was a two-step analysis which stated that (1) upon a showing of the use of a deadly weapon the law presumed intent and (2) the law presumed every intentional homicide to be malicious.

i. Jury Instructions: Former Practice

The traditional methods of informing the jury of the effect of the use of a deadly weapon, however, were subjected to repeated constitutional attacks. In Patterson v. State, for example, the defendant claimed that presenting the jury with the instructions that "the law presumes the intent to kill" from the use of a deadly weapon and "the law presumes every intentional homicide to be malicious until the contrary is established"(emphasis added) constituted an unconstitutional shift of the burden of proof as well as an unconstitutional set of presumptions because there was no rational connection between the fact proved and the fact presumed.

While the Georgia Supreme Court recognized that malice was the mens rea element of murder and that United States Supreme Court authority forbade the placing of the burden of proof on the defendant with regard to an element of the offense, the Georgia court held that the two above-quoted charges did not unconstitutionally place the burden of proof on the defendant. In the court's language, these two instructions did "not shift any burden of proof or persuasion to defendant." The court characterized the effect of these instructions as placing only a burden of production on the defendant, which was permitted by the relevant United States Supreme Court authority.

While the Patterson analysis itself seemed questionable in light of the language of the malice presumption that it would exist until the contrary was established, it was apparent that United States Supreme Court authority on this issue implicitly overruled Patterson on its facts. In Sandstrom v. Montana, the court held that a trial court instruction almost identical to that in Patterson, to the effect that "the law presumes that a person intends the ordinary consequences of his voluntary acts," was unconstitutional in that it violated the Fourteenth Amendment's requirement that the state prove every element of a criminal offense beyond a reasonable doubt. Sandstrom held that regardless of what the Montana Supreme Court held was the actual legal effect of such a presumption, a reasonable juror, when told that "the law presumes," could have interpreted the instruction as creating either a conclusive presumption or at least a burden-shifting one, and either such interpretation was unconstitutional in a criminal case. Under Sandstrom, therefore, it was apparent that at least Patterson's malice instruction (which spoke in terms of the contrary being "established") and, possibly, also the intent presumption were subject to the same constitutional infirmities as the Sandstrom instructions. Sandstrom mandated that great caution should be used in the instruction of juries with regard to the deadly weapon doctrine.

Our appellate courts were often faced with the question of whether particular jury instructions violated the Sandstrom mandate which forbade both conclusive presumptions and jury instructions which shifted the burden of persuasion concerning intent or malice to the defendant. In Johnson v. State, the court reversed a murder conviction for violation of the principles of Sandstrom. The court concluded that the deadly weapon instruction given in the case could have been interpreted by the jury to be a conclusive one. This was erroneous under Sandstrom because it relieved the state of its burden to prove every element of murder beyond a reasonable doubt.

As for the second presumption, that an intentional killing is murder, the Johnson court found that despite the fact that the jury was told that the presumption was rebuttable, it could have interpreted the instruction as requiring the defendant to disprove murder by some quantum of proof. This would have shifted the burden of persuasion to the defendant. The court did not identify, however, which portion of the instruction could have led the reasonable juror to conclude that the defendant had to satisfy a burden of persuasion with regard to the presumption of murder.

This latter holding of Johnson constituted a movement by the court toward more protection of the defendant. In Hosch v. State, the court had held that the murder presumption had to include language indicating that it was rebuttable. In Johnson, however, the court conceded that this language was present and yet reversed anyway. It is noteworthy that the Johnson court, in striking down the murder presumption instruction, cited no other Georgia cases and relied solely on Sandstrom and Mullaney v. Wilbur. This indicated movement by the Georgia court beyond its established precedent.

The Georgia Supreme Court advised lower courts that Sandstrom errors could be avoided by more careful instructions on the finding of intent and malice. In Rivers v. State, the court stated that since Sandstrom, it had disapproved and would continue to disapprove the practice of casting criminal jury instructions in terms of presumptions. The better practice would be for the instructions to be cast in terms of permissible inferences which might be drawn from the purposeful activity of the defendant. Such instructions, when combined with the ordinary direction that the jury had to find all elements of the crime to be present beyond a reasonable doubt, were undoubtedly consistent with the mandate of the United States Supreme Court.

However, our courts later determined that a trial court's substitution of the term "infers" in lieu of the term "presumes" did not necessarily render benign an otherwise unconstitutionally burden-shifting charge. When a trial court directed the jury to infer an essential element of the crime and that the inference was rebuttable, it unconstitutionally relieved the State of its burden of proof. The use of either term was not conclusive of whether an instruction was permissive or mandatory. The difference between a permissive inference and mandatory presumption was found in the presence or absence of "language of command" such as "shall be." Where such "language of command" was absent from instructions on criminal intent, phrases such as "intent may be inferred . . . ," or "it is reasonable to infer . . . ," or "you may draw the inference that . . . ," were clearly permissive in nature and were not in violation of Sandstrom. Furthermore, it had been held that an instruction containing such a phrase did not improperly comment on the evidence.

In Franklin v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court found that reasonable jurors would not have interpreted the instruction on the rebuttable presumption of intent and on accident as being conclusive or as shifting the burden of persuasion to the defendant. It also rejected the argument that an instruction defining implied malice was unconstitutional as a burden shifting instruction under Sandstrom. The court concluded that a definition differed from a presumption as was at issue in Sandstrom.

In a federal habeas corpus case based on the Georgia trial, however, the Eleventh Circuit Court of Appeals found that the instruction on intent violated Sandstrom. In Franklin v. Francis, the court found that the additional charge to the jury that criminal intent was not presumed and that the state had to prove every element of the crime beyond a reasonable doubt did not cure the unconstitutionality of the instruction. The U.S. Supreme Court affirmed the Court of Appeals' decision. The Franklin decision in the Supreme Court cast grave doubt on the continuing validity of a number of Georgia Supreme Court decisions approving instructions on the ground that the general instructions on proof beyond a reasonable doubt and the presumption of innocence cured any burden-shifting infirmity.

The finding of a violation of Sandstrom was not per se a finding of reversible error. In several cases, both the state and federal courts found Sandstrom violations to be harmless constitutional error.

In 1983, the Supreme Court of the United States, however, cast doubt on the scope of the applicability of harmless error in the context of Sandstrom violations. In Connecticut v. Johnson, the jury was instructed that there was a conclusive presumption that every person intends the natural and probable consequences of his or her act, a clear Sandstrom error. The state court reversed the conviction without addressing the state's contention that the error was harmless. On appeal to the United States Supreme Court, the state asserted that the state supreme court had committed error in failing to consider the possibility of harmless error. In a fragmented decision without a majority opinion, the Supreme Court affirmed the state supreme court's action. It would seem that Johnson established that a certain number of Sandstrom errors were automatically reversible constitutional error. The court itself was not certain of the precise boundary line between automatically reversible error and possible harmless error. The only possible exception to the rule of automatic reversible error mentioned by the plurality contemplated instructions where the conviction was for a crime other than the one where the erroneous instruction was given or instructions in cases where the defendant conceded the presence of intent.

In 1986, the Supreme Court of the United States clearly held that the harmless-error analysis was applicable in cases of Sandstrom error. In Rose v. Clark, the court held that the taint of an unconstitutional burden-shifting jury instruction may be harmless, where it appeared beyond a reasonable doubt that the error complained of did not contribute to the verdict obtained. To say that an error did not contribute to the verdict was to find that error unimportant in relation to everything else the jury considered on the issue in question, as revealed in the record.

ii. Jury Instructions: Current Practice

In 1995, the Georgia Supreme Court indicated its movement beyond the precedent established by its prior decisions by strongly discouraging the practice of instructing a jury that it might infer the intent to kill from the defendant's use of a deadly weapon, especially where the jury was not also instructed that it could use its discretion to determine whether to make the authorized inference. The court suggested that the better practice would be, in the absence of some special request from the jury, not to emphasize particular circumstances such as the use of a deadly weapon and to indicate what inferences might arise therefrom. Rather, general charges on intent and circumstantial evidence would ordinarily be sufficient. Apparently, because many trial courts failed to follow what the court recognized as the better practice, it made a clear departure from its established precedent by disapproving of the practice of giving a "use of a deadly weapon" instruction in a murder trial. The court held that this practice constitutes error regardless of whether the jury is also instructed that it has the discretion to make the authorized inference. The court mandated that our trial courts should now merely give the jury a simple instruction on intent. The court made its holding applicable to all cases in the "pipeline," i.e., cases pending on direct review or not yet final as of March 2, 2001, but did not make it applicable to convictions challenged on habeas corpus.

Instructing a jury that it can infer the defendant's intent to kill based upon his use of a deadly weapon would constitute harmless error, however, where the jury has convicted the defendant of felony murder rather than malice murder. Unlike malice murder, felony murder does not require intent to kill; rather, the defendant only must have intended to commit the underlying felony. Furthermore, such error does not require reversal where the state has presented overwhelming evidence of the defendant's intent to kill. Also, where the defendant neither objected to the charge at trial nor reserved objections to the overall charge, the error would be waived on appeal.

Where the issue at trial is not whether the killing was intentional but whether it was justified based on a battered-person claim, the giving of a deadly weapon charge on the uncontested issue of intent to kill would constitute harmless error.

c. Abandoned and Malignant Heart

Another method of proving implied malice is through the extreme nature of the act itself. In many of these situations, the defendant may be able to state honestly that there was no intention to kill the victim, but the law will permit the defendant's act to be labelled murder because of its wantonness or reckless disregard for human life. The Georgia Supreme Court has written that malice "may arise from a reckless disregard for human life." Evidence that the defendant acted in reckless disregard for human life is, for purposes of demonstrating his guilt of the crime of malice murder, as equally probative as evidence that he acted with a specific intent to kill. Thus, an instruction to the jury that a reckless disregard for human life may be equivalent to a specific intent to kill would be a correct statement of the law. Such an instruction would not authorize a malice murder conviction based upon proof that the defendant caused the death of another through any and all acts of criminal negligence.

An instruction that states that malice may be inferred from an abandoned or malicious heart would not create an unconstitutional presumption which would shift the burden of proof to the defendant. The instruction would clearly inform the jury that intent to kill is an element of malice. Furthermore, such an instruction would not create an unconstitutional mandatory presumption of intent. It would merely inform the jury that they are permitted to infer malice from the circumstances surrounding the commission of the offense, but they would not be required to so infer. Finally, the instruction would not relieve the jury of the duty of finding that a killing occurred and that the defendant participated in the killing.

Specific fact situations in which the courts have affirmed a finding of such extreme disregard for human life as to be the equivalent of malice are (1) shooting a rifle at the victim while aiming one and a half feet over his head at a distance of 40-60 yards; (2) stabbing a victim many times with an ice pick; (3) repeatedly whipping a child with a rope; (4) smothering a victim by covering her mouth to prevent her continued screaming during a sexual assault; (5) shooting a victim by means of a spring gun or trap gun; (6) shooting in the immediate vicinity of occupied houses and fleeing the scene without seeking care for the victim; (7) repeatedly shooting into a house believed to be occupied by a person who supposedly robbed the shooter; (8) conducting a robbery while the victim after being shot lay alive but bleeding; (9) shooting into a crowd; and (10) keeping one's finger on the trigger of a loaded, cocked weapon while driving intoxicated at a high rate of speed and turning around in the driver's seat so that the barrel of the weapon made contact with victim's neck before he was shot.

The primary use of the abandoned and malignant heart theory of implied malice had been in cases of murder by vehicle. The Georgia Court of Appeals, however, held that with the enactment in 1974 of § 40-6-393 (the vehicular homicide statute) a murder charge could not be predicated upon a homicide resulting from "reckless disregard for the safety of persons" as that phrase was used in the reckless driving statute (§ 40-6-390), since that offense was expressly made "homicide by vehicle in the first degree" by § 40-6-393. The Georgia Supreme Court agreed with this holding and thought "that implicit within it lies the conclusion that 'reckless disregard for the safety of persons' cannot serve as implied malice aforethought, i.e., an abandoned and malignant heart, so as to authorize a murder conviction." The court later found this language to be in conflict with its subsequent unambiguous holdings wherein implied malice is defined as conduct which exhibits a reckless disregard for human life. To the extent that this language ever had any viability as authority for a contrary definition of implied malice, it clearly was no longer support for that proposition. The court found the definition of implied malice adopted in its subsequent holdings to be controlling.

Although the vehicular homicide statute has displaced the involuntary manslaughter statute as to vehicular homicides, it has not displaced the general malice murder statute. The vehicular homicide statute applies only to vehicular homicides caused "without malice aforethought" and "without an intention to do so." Thus, malice murder by vehicle, just as malice murder by other means, still falls under the general malice murder statute. In Anderson v. State, the defendant's conviction for malice murder by vehicle was predicated on evidence of the defendant's implied malice. The evidence showed that the defendant drove, at a speed of 68 miles per hour, across the center line striking head-on another vehicle, without attempting to brake his vehicle or otherwise avoid the collision, and killed the driver of the other vehicle. The court held the defendant's statement to law enforcement officers that he regretted the victim's death, "but it had to be somebody," was evidence of an intent to kill someone else in order to take his own life. In Chester v. State, the court upheld the defendant's conviction for malice murder by vehicle, where the jury's finding of implied malice was based on evidence that at the time of the accident the defendant was angry at women, and was speeding and drunk. Although he was drunk, he knew that he struck two girls, and that one of the girls was in the bed of his truck. Moreover, he knowingly dumped this girl's body at an isolated abandoned railroad track, thus making it highly unlikely that anyone would render aid to her to save her life.

d. Absence of Provocation

While the statute (§ 16-5-1) provides that malice is implied "where no considerable provocation appears," this does not provide an independent means of proving or disproving malice. In other words, the absence of provocation does not prove the existence of malice. Nor does the existence of provocation prove its absence. The proof of implied malice will depend either on an inference of intent or on the presence of an abandoned or malignant heart, probably the former. The presence of the provocation language is a relic of the statutory language prior to 1968 and is essentially a means of distinguishing murder from voluntary manslaughter.

Evidence of anger is not, as a matter of law, a showing of the provocation necessary to set aside a finding of malice. Thus, even where there is evidence that the victim angered the defendant, the jury may still determine from all the facts and circumstances that the killing, rather than being the result of considerable provocation, was intentional and malicious.

e. Party to Crime

The state is not required to prove that the defendant was the "triggerman" in order to prove him guilty of malice murder. Even assuming the defendant did not shoot the victim, if there is evidence that he intentionally aided or abetted the commission of the murder or that he intentionally advised, encouraged, or procured another to commit the murder, there would be sufficient evidence to support a finding of guilt.

The defendant need not have inflicted the fatal wound on the victim. If there is evidence that he was a willing participant in the harassing, chasing, and beating of the victim which led to the fatal outcome, the jury would be authorized to infer from the defendant's conduct that he aided and abetted the murder.

f. Verdicts

Malice murder is defined as the killing of another "with malice aforethought, either express or implied." Vehicular homicide is defined as killing another while operating a car, "without malice aforethought" and "without an intention to do so." Hence, when a jury returns verdicts finding the defendant guilty of the malice murder and vehicular homicide of another, the jury has convicted the defendant of killing both with and without malice aforethought. Obviously, the two verdicts are mutually exclusive, and it is proper for the trial court to refuse to accept these verdicts and send the jury back to continue its deliberations.

However, guilty verdicts for malice murder and felony murder are not mutually exclusive as a matter of law. A guilty verdict for felony murder does not constitute a finding that the murder was committed without malice aforethought, but that the murder was committed while in the commission of another felony offense "irrespective of malice." In other words, the presence or absence of malice is irrelevant to the commission of felony murder. Nor are the two verdicts mutually exclusive as a matter of fact where the evidence authorizes the jury to conclude that the defendant committed the murder while in the commission of a felony but also acted with malice aforethought.

The doctrine of mutually exclusive verdicts applies only where the jury returns multiple convictions as to crimes which are mutually exclusive of each other. This doctrine does not apply where there is a verdict of guilty and another of not guilty.

Since a jury's inability to agree on a verdict is not itself a verdict, a verdict which shows "no agreement" on a malice murder count and guilty on a felony murder count does not constitute a mutually exclusive verdict.

Where the jury has convicted the defendant of malice murder, it is not required to return a verdict on voluntary manslaughter.

g. Sentencing

Where a defendant is charged with the malice murder of separate victims in different counts and is found guilty on each count, he may be sentenced separately on each count to run consecutively for the reason that the killing of different persons constitutes separate crimes.

2. Felony Murder

One type of felonious homicide is murder even though the traditionally required malice is not present. Section 16-5-1(c) provides that when a person "causes the death of another human being" while "in the commission of a felony," he is guilty of murder. Dating from the early English common law, the felony-murder rule provides an exception to the general doctrine of mens rea that the mental element for one offense cannot render a defendant criminally liable for another offense. Here the mens rea of the underlying felony is permitted to substitute for the malice normally required for murder. Because of the proliferation of felonies and a feeling that not all of them merit inclusion in the felony-murder side which bypasses the malice requirement, the felony-murder rule has been limited by many jurisdictions to encompass only "inherently dangerous" felonies or certain specifically listed felonies. The rule itself has come under great attack by commentators, some of whom have described it as an "anachronism" and some who have called for its abolition. It has been suggested that felony murder is not necessary in light of the availability of "abandoned and malignant heart" implied malice as a prosecutorial device to convict extreme behavior which results in unintended killing.

a. Felonies Which Trigger the Rule

i. Limitations on Application of Rule

Georgia's statutory felony-murder provision reflects the very traditional broad phraseology. No limitation of the kind of felonies which trigger the rule is mentioned, and the only language change from the rule's standard statement of "in the commission or in the attempted commission of" a felony is the elimination of the emphasized phrase. This is not a substantive change at all, because under the present code the criminal attempt to commit a felony is itself a felony and, thus, would trigger the felony-murder rule.

Given the broad language of the Georgia statute, any limitation of the rule had to come judicially. Prior to 1992, the Georgia courts displayed very little willingness to limit the application of the rule to only inherently dangerous felonies. For example, the courts indicated or held that the felonies of escape, cruelty to children, and conspiracy could be used to support felony-murder convictions. In 1992, the Georgia Supreme Court decided to limit the application of the rule to any felony that is either dangerous per se or that, by the attendant circumstances, creates a foreseeable risk of death. The court also noted that under these circumstances there must be a sufficient connection between the felony and the homicide in order to trigger the rule. The court, applying this limitation in Ford v. State, held that the status felony of possession of a firearm by a convicted felon was not sufficient to support a conviction for felony murder, because the felony was neither inherently dangerous nor life-threatening under the circumstances of the homicide. In Hulme v. State, on the other hand, the court held that in this state a defendant may be convicted of felony murder based on the underlying felony of distributing a controlled substance if that felony is inherently dangerous to human life and if the defendant directly causes the death of the victim while in the commission of the felony. However, the court expressly stated that this holding does not mean that every delivery or distribution of a controlled substance that results in death can support a felony murder conviction.

In Ross v. State, the court held that pointing a loaded gun at another person may be an unlawful act amounting to an aggravated assault. Moreover, the act can support a finding of felony murder, even if the assault is upon the homicide victim.

ii. Modified Merger Doctrine

In Baker v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court in a detailed exposition addressed the issue of whether an underlying aggravated assault should support a felony-murder conviction or should properly be "merged" into the homicide and the entire transaction analyzed for the presence or absence of malice. In Baker, the defendant fired two shots at the decedent with the first missing and the second killing. The prosecution proceeded on a felony-murder theory, asserting aggravated assault as the underlying felony. In this kind of situation, many jurisdictions would reject the use of the aggravated assault as the underlying felony, limiting the permissible underlying felonies to those which are "independent" of the killing conduct. It has been suggested that convicting someone of felony murder in this situation is "bootstrapping," and since the vast majority of killings include an aggravated assault, "bootstrapping" would result in relieving prosecutors of the burden of proving malice or an intent to kill as element of all such killings.

The Georgia Supreme Court, however, rejected the proposed limitation to "independent" felonies. A major reason, according to the majority opinion, was Georgia's criminal homicide scheme which would provide no other criminal punishment for an accidental (nonintentional) killing committed during a felony. According to the court, such a death could not be "unlawful act" involuntary manslaughter under § 16-5-3(a) because that is limited to nonfelonious unlawful acts. It could not be "criminal negligence" involuntary manslaughter under § 16-5-3(b) because that is limited to behavior which is lawful, yet conducted in an unlawful way. Finally, according to the court, it could only be voluntary manslaughter under § 16-5-2 if it were done in the heat of passion. Thus, the court reasoned, if nonintentional killings during felonies were not felony murder, they would escape punishment.

The Baker reasoning is curious at best. Taken on its own terms, the court's analysis overlooks the fact that malice can be implied if the killing exhibits an abandoned and malignant heart. It is submitted that extremely negligent behavior during a forcible felony would qualify under this rubric for a malice murder conviction. In fact, a persuasive argument could be made that virtually any crime when committed through the use of a weapon capable of killing illustrated an "abandoned and malignant heart." There is, therefore, a "pigeonhole" within murder for many accidental deaths caused by the commission of a felony.

While it might be surmised that Baker's approval of aggravated assault as a permissible underlying felony will turn all intentional killings into felony murder and, thus, unfairly provide prosecutors a short cut around the malice requirement to murder convictions, this assumption is more apparent than real. Even under Baker, the state will have to prove the commission of an aggravated assault. Under § 16-5-21, an aggravated assault conviction requires proof of either (1) the use of a deadly weapon or (2) an intent to murder, rape, or rob. Thus, the prosecutor's task will not be significantly different or easier in felony murder than it is in malice murder. If he can prove the use of a deadly weapon for aggravated assault, he probably can also use the deadly weapon to prove malice. If he can demonstrate an intent to murder for purposes of aggravated assault, he can prove malice for malice murder. If he can show only an intent to rob or rape for the aggravated assault, he is proving the kind of independent felony which even an anti-Baker ruling would permit to serve as the underlying felony in felony murder.

Post-Baker litigation indicates that the court may not be taking quite as rigid a stance toward the felony-murder rule as Baker indicated. In Malone v. State, the defendant, indicted for felony murder, urged reconsideration of Baker because he claimed that it would preclude a charge on voluntary manslaughter in his trial, because even in a voluntary manslaughter there usually is an aggravated assault which would make the killing felony murder under Baker. The defendant, therefore, argued that Baker would effectively eliminate voluntary manslaughter as an authorized verdict in homicide cases. Voluntary manslaughter is, by definition, an intentional killing which results in death. Thus, there will always be an aggravated assault included in a voluntary manslaughter and, the defendant argued, every voluntary manslaughter will become a felony murder.

The Malone court, however, refused to overrule Baker, asserting that the defendant's argument proceeded from an incorrect premise. The court held that where the killing was based upon a serious provocation and heat of passion, a voluntary manslaughter instruction was permissible under a felony-murder indictment and that voluntary manslaughter would be an authorized verdict. The reasoning was rather sparse and consisted only in the court's flat statement that the crime of voluntary manslaughter involves a less culpable mental state than the "real or imputed" malice which the felony-murder doctrine is designed to supply in a murder prosecution.

The fact is, however, that an aggravated assault still occurs in every voluntary manslaughter. The court never directly addressed that fact and, it can be concluded, must have held that there are two grades of aggravated assault: one which is not in the heat of passion which can support a felony-murder conviction and another which is in the heat of passion which cannot support a felony-murder conviction. Under this approach not all felonies can support a felony-murder conviction, despite the apparently conflicting rule of Baker. Another exception to the apparently broad rule of Baker was also suggested by Malone when it said that voluntary manslaughter itself was not a felony which could support a felony-murder conviction. Of course, if the contrary were true there could never be a voluntary manslaughter conviction because all such crimes would be felony murder.

The concerns expressed in Baker and Malone discussed above were alleviated by the Georgia Supreme Court in Edge v. State. In Edge, the court recognized the unfairness of this state's "strict liability" felony-murder rule, which allows the "bootstrapping" of an assault charge to support a felony-murder conviction, in those instances where the killings could have been reduced, on the ground of mitigation, to manslaughter. Instead of adopting the "merger doctrine" in toto to rectify this unfairness, which would preclude felony murder based on any aggravated assault by the defendant on the victim, the court adopted a modified version of the doctrine, which would preclude a felony murder conviction only where it would prevent an otherwise warranted verdict of voluntary manslaughter. Stated another way, if there is but one assault and that assault could form the basis of either felony murder or voluntary manslaughter, a verdict of felony murder may not be returned if the jury finds that the assault is mitigated by provocation and passion. This modified "merger doctrine" applies only where the aggravated assault is perpetrated against the homicide victim and is an integral part of the killing and where there is evidence that the aggravated assault was provoked by the homicide victim. The modified "merger doctrine" does not apply where the evidence shows that the aggravated assault resulting in the victim's death was directed against someone other than the homicide victim. Nor does the doctrine apply where the evidence shows that the underlying felony, such as armed robbery, was independent of the killing itself.

iii. Jury Instructions

The court in Edge v. State also stated that its holding would require some precision in the charge to the jury where the evidence would authorize a conviction for felony murder or voluntary manslaughter. A sequential charge requiring the jury to consider voluntary manslaughter only if it has considered and found the defendant not guilty of malice murder and felony murder would not be appropriate. Instead, the trial court should instruct the jury so as to ensure adequate consideration of charges for both forms of homicide. Sequential charges on underlying felonies that are independent of the killing itself and on lesser included offenses are not prohibited under the rationale in Edge.

If a trial court has given a sequential charge to the jury in violation of Edge, a defendant who has reserved his right to raise objections to the jury charge on appeal is entitled to a new trial. However, if the sequential charge given was requested by the defendant, he cannot assert on appeal that the charge was erroneous. Even if the defendant's trial preceded Edge, he cannot subsequently contend that it was error to give a sequential charge if he previously failed to comply with the applicable procedures for securing review of that issue. Even though the trial court has given an improper sequential charge to the jury, if it is evident from the record that the verdict of felony murder was the product of adequate consideration of charges for both forms of homicide rather than of any prejudicial emphasis communicated by the improper sequential charge, the defendant's conviction for felony murder will be upheld.

With the jury's consideration of malice, it must also consider the element of provocation. If the jury finds that the defendant committed the homicide with malice, it necessarily finds that the element of provocation does not exist or is insufficient to overcome the jury's finding of malice whether express or implied. With this finding of malice, voluntary manslaughter is eliminated from the jury's consideration, rendering any sequential charge given by a trial court in connection with felony murder and voluntary manslaughter harmless error. Likewise, if the evidence does not authorize consideration of voluntary manslaughter as a possible verdict, a sequential charge does not amount to reversible error.

Even absent an objection to a sequential charge or to a jury's verdict finding a defendant guilty of felony murder, appellate review of the trial court's failure to apply the modified merger rule cannot be waived, because a conviction which should have been merged into another as a matter of fact or law is void.

A felony which is an included offense of another felony which is charged in an indictment may constitute the underlying felony upon which conviction of felony murder may be grounded, given adequate proof and correct jury instructions. Correct jury instructions must identify the included offense as a felony and must specify its essential elements, as well as the elements of felony murder. Unless an adequate instruction on the included offense is given to the jury, that offense cannot serve as a basis for a felony murder conviction.

When the language of an indictment charges the defendant with causing the death of the victim "by shooting," it raises the possibility of aggravated assault both with a deadly weapon and intent to murder. As the language of such an indictment would be sufficient to put a defendant on notice of both grounds for aggravation, jury instructions that aggravated assault, as the underlying felony for a felony murder count, could be established with either "intent to murder" or use of a "deadly weapon" would be proper.

Since there is only one offense of murder which can be committed either with malice aforethought or while in the commission of a felony, a trial court's use of the term "murder" in connection with its instructions on a felony murder charge would not be error.

There is no requirement to define the word "homicide" in instructing the jury on felony murder.

iv. Indictments

In order to satisfy due process when an indictment charges a compound felony such as felony murder, the count charging the compound offense must contain the essential elements of the predicate offense, or the indictment must contain a separate count charging the predicate offense completely, or the indictment must elsewhere allege facts showing how the compound offense was committed.

The defendant need not be charged with the independent crime of aggravated assault against the murder victim in order to be convicted of felony murder while in the commission of an aggravated assault.

An indictment that omits an essential element of the predicate felony in a felony murder count can nonetheless satisfy the requirements of due process as long as the indictment charges the predicate felony completely in a separate count.

v. Multiple Underlying Felonies

While a defendant may not be sentenced for two murders where there is only one victim, where there are multiple underlying felonies, the state is not required to elect between them when charging the defendant with felony murder. The appropriate manner for charging felony murder in instances where more than one underlying felony is alleged is to indict for one count of felony murder, and enumerate the multiple underlying felonies.

Where a defendant has been charged in a single count with felony murder based on multiple underlying felonies and the jury has returned a general verdict of guilty on the felony murder count without delineating which of the underlying felonies served as the predicate for the felony murder conviction, the defendant's conviction must be set aside. However, if the trial court has entered a judgment of conviction and sentence only on the verdict finding the defendant guilty of malice murder, any issue concerning the felony murder count is moot.

The fact that the jury has acquitted the defendant for the underlying felony committed against the victim does not affect the validity of its guilty verdict for felony murder, where the defendant has been found guilty of multiple underlying felonies committed against others during the same incident.

vi. Sentencing

If a jury returns guilty verdicts of felony murder, voluntary manslaughter, and aggravated assault, in the absence of an objection to the form of the verdicts, a trial court is not under a duty to sentence the defendant for the crime of felony murder. The trial court may find as a matter of law that the jury's finding of voluntary manslaughter precludes a conviction on the felony murder charge and may sentence the defendant on the voluntary manslaughter charge.

A trial court may not sentence a defendant for felony murder and voluntary manslaughter based on the same underlying aggravated assault. By definition, a defendant found guilty of voluntary manslaughter lacks the mens rea required to commit felony murder in that any malice which would have been imputed from the underlying felony has been mitigated by the provocation which induced the crime of voluntary manslaughter.

Where there is only one murder victim, it is incorrect to sentence the defendant twice for felony murder. The judgment of conviction and sentence on one of the felony murder counts must be vacated. Once this count is vacated, the underlying felony is no longer merged as a matter of law, and the trial court should sentence the defendant for the underlying felony.

When a jury finds a defendant guilty of two counts of felony murder involving the same victim, it is within the trial court's discretion to choose to merge one underlying felony rather than the other into the felony murder count for which the defendant is sentenced, thus leaving the other underlying felony for independent sentencing.

The trial court's imposition of illegal, multiple sentences for the felony murder of only one victim is not an ambiguity in a jury verdict that must be resolved by the Georgia Supreme Court's imposition of a rule of law. Rather, it is an error of law which is best resolved by the exercise of the trial court's sentencing discretion. Thus, such a case must be remanded to the trial court so that it may exercise its discretion in determining which felony murder conviction sentence is to be imposed.

b. Causation

It is clear that there are other judicial limitations on the Georgia felony-murder rule. In 1992, the Georgia Supreme Court decided to limit the application of the rule to any felony that is either dangerous per se or that, by the attendant circumstances, creates a foreseeable risk of death. The court also noted that under these circumstances there must be a sufficient connection between the felony and the homicide in order to trigger the rule. This indicates the court's willingness to impose a causation requirement into the felony-murder rule. The statute itself does not explicitly do so.

In Durden v. State, the court dealt with a causation issue in the context of a felony-murder conviction. The defendant was committing a burglary when the store owner came upon the scene. There was an exchange of gunfire, but the owner was not injured. However, he died soon afterward of cardiac arrest. The defendant argued that his felony-murder conviction was unauthorized because he administered no physical injury to the victim or, alternatively, that there was no causation demonstrated.

The court affirmed the conviction, rejecting the early common law requirement of physical harm as a prerequisite for criminal responsibility for homicide and finding causation. The court pointed out that the medical examiner had testified that the cardiac arrest had been caused by the victim's small coronary arteries and the stress of events. The court applied the traditional test of causation and found that the jury was authorized to find beyond a reasonable doubt that the felony had caused the death of the victim.

In Minor v. State, the defendant was convicted of felony murder with the underlying felony being rape. About three hours after having been raped, and while being questioned in her home by the police, the victim collapsed and died from a heart attack. The victim had a severely diseased heart and was significantly overweight at the time of the rape. The state's experts testified both that the victim had in fact been raped, as opposed to having had consensual sex, and that the rape had caused the heart attack. The court concluded that a rational trier of fact could have been persuaded beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant's sexual intercourse with the victim was not consensual and that the victim's heart attack was caused by the stress of the rape.

In State v. Crane, the defendants were indicted for felony murder where the victim was a co-felon in the attempted burglary who was actually killed by the homeowner whose home was the target of the burglary. While other jurisdictions are split on the issue, this was a case of first impression in Georgia and the Georgia Supreme Court held that the felony-murder rule is not applicable in this situation. The focus was on the statutory requirement in the felony-murder provision of § 16-5-1(c) that the defendant "cause" the death of the victim. The court said that this provision could require either direct causation by the defendant or indirect causation. To cover the instant situation, the court said, it would have to adopt a reading which permitted indirect causation to be sufficient. The court held that while it would favor such a construction, it was bound by the general principle favoring the strict construction of penal statutes against the state and in favor of the accused. The court thus affirmed the dismissal of the indictments by the lower court and left the question of the scope of the rule to the General Assembly.

The construction that the court adopted in Crane was applied in a situation involving the death of an innocent bystander. In Hill v. State, the defendant shot and killed a police officer in a gunfight. The officer, responding to the defendant's shot, returned fire and killed a bystander. Since it was clear that the defendant did not directly cause the bystander's death, the court held that his felony murder conviction had to be set aside.

Crane and Hill were distinguished by the Georgia Supreme Court in Scott v. State. In this case, while the defendant and the victim were in the process of detonating an explosive device for the purpose of destroying public property, the device exploded and killed the victim. The court held that the defendant's conduct came squarely within the language of the felony-murder statute, because the victim's death resulted from conduct of the defendant and the victim who were acting in concert with a felonious purpose. Similarly, in Vasser v. State, the court held that the defendant could be convicted of felony murder, although he had no knowledge of the victim's involvement in the arson, because the victim was acting in concert with a codefendant in committing the crime when his death occurred.

In Hyman v. State, the defendant falsely told police that his fugitive friend was not in his house. When a police officer looked into a closet in the house, the defendant's friend fatally shot the officer. Applying the principles enunciated in State v. Crane and Hill v. State the Georgia Supreme Court held that the murder in this case was only indirectly attributable to the defendant's false statement. Rather, the defendant's friend directly caused the officer's death, and there was no evidence whatsoever that the defendant was acting in concert with his friend or was otherwise a party to the actual shooting. Because the defendant did not directly cause the officer's death, the court reversed his conviction for felony murder.

In State v. Cross, the defendant was indicted for felony murder with the underlying felony being cruelty to children. The indictment alleged that the defendant's shaking of the child victim resulted in injuries that caused the child's death over a year later. The court found no merit in the defendant's contention that the victim must die during the commission of the underlying felony. Instead, the court held that the felony-murder statute requires that the death need only be caused by an injury which occurred during the res gestae of the felony.

In McCoy v. State, the defendant was indicted for felony murder and arson in the first degree. The court held that the evidence was sufficient to show that a fireman's death was directly attributable to the defendant's felonious conduct in deliberately setting a fire. The fireman came to the scene as a direct result of the fire, the protective cover over the well into which the fireman fell was burned away by the fire, and the fireman died as a result of breathing the concentrated smoke from the fire.

Where two persons are engaged in mutual combat and as a result of their assault upon each other a bystander dies, both are guilty of felony murder. In such a case, transferred intent has no applicability to felony murder, which does not require proof of intent, transferred or otherwise, as an element of the homicide.

The Supreme Court of the United States has ruled on the permissibility of the death sentence for the nontriggerman in a felony-murder case. In Enmund v. Florida, the Court was dealing with a rather familiar type of case in which two felony accomplices are charged with felony murder in a case based on the killing by one of them during the commission of a felony. The defendant, the nonkilling accomplice, argued that the death penalty to which he was sentenced was unconstitutional in violation of the Eighth Amendment. In a 5-4 decision, the Court vacated the death sentence because there was an "absence of proof that [the defendant] killed or attempted to kill" and the sentence was handed down "regardless of whether [the defendant] intended or contemplated that life would be taken [in the felony] . . . ." The narrowness of the holding ought to be emphasized. It seems clear that the Court was not ruling out the possibility that a death sentence would be constitutional where the nontriggerman intended the death of the victim or anticipated that lethal force would be involved in the underlying felony.

Thus, the Supreme Court of the United States held in Tison v. Arizona that the reckless disregard for human life implicit in knowingly engaging in criminal activities known to carry a grave risk of death represents a highly culpable mental state, a mental state that may be taken into account in making a capital sentencing judgment when that conduct causes its natural, though also not inevitable, lethal result. Major participation in the felony committed, combined with reckless indifference to human life, is sufficient to satisfy the criminal culpability requirement found in Enmund v. Florida.

c. "In Commission of"

The phrase "in the commission of" also may prove to be a limitation on the felony murder rule. In Jones v. State, the court held that a killing which took place after the "technical" completion of the underlying felony could be indictable as felony murder if it took place within the felony's res gestae. Also, in State v. Cross, the court held that the victim need not die during the commission of the underlying felony. The death need only be caused by an injury which occurred during the felony's res gestae. While ambiguous, the phrase "in the commission of" certainly indicates that at some point the felony's commission will end for purposes of invoking the felony-murder rule. It has been suggested that an analysis of whether the res gestae is completed should concentrate on the "time, place and continuity of action" of the underlying felony.

In Collier v. State, the court was faced with the question of when a felony terminates for the purposes of the felony-murder rule. In its first detailed analysis of this question, the court canvassed authority from other jurisdictions and concluded that an arrest would terminate the felony, but only if it was one where the custody was "complete" and the surrender was "complete and continuous." The fact that post-crime pursuit is delayed does not terminate the felony. Generally, the court said, an underlying felony continues during the escape phase of the felony if there is continuous pursuit immediately organized. The felony terminates when the defendant has arrived at a place of seeming security or when pursuit ceases. On the facts, the court found that the jury could have believed that the felony had not yet ceased. The case involved a homicide of a police officer who arrested the defendant after his commission of an armed robbery. The court also reiterated the familiar rule that conviction of both the underlying felony as well as felony murder is improper.

d. Party to Crime

A defendant who helps his accomplice shoot the victim and who then obtains the gun from the accomplice and shoots the victim again may be convicted of felony murder. Since the defendant becomes culpable for the crime once he intentionally aids or abets his accomplice, the mere fact that the victim may have already been dead when the defendant shot him would be of no consequence.

A person who commits a felony may be convicted of felony murder for a homicide that results during the commission of that felony, without regard to whether the person intended to kill the victim or directly acted to commit the murder.

3. Relationship Between Malice Murder and Felony Murder

In Georgia, a defendant may be convicted of an offense embraced by the allegations of the indictment if the evidence supports such a charge. Therefore, to the extent that a malice murder indictment alleges the commission of a felony in addition to the killing and there is evidence to support that allegation, the jury can be instructed on and is authorized to return a verdict of felony murder. Thus, in Cromer v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court wrote that "[t]here was no error in charging on felony murder under an indictment for malice murder." The court cited the Baker case discussed above to reject the contention that felony murder is an inappropriate charge where the only felony suggested by the evidence is the aggravated assault which directly led to the death.

A defendant's claim of error in the underlying felony portion of a felony murder charge would be moot if he has been convicted of malice murder.

A malice murder can be committed in the commission of an armed robbery where the unlawful intent required for malice murder exists. A party concerned in the commission of that armed robbery may be charged with and convicted of malice murder. In order to convict a party to an armed robbery under a malice murder indictment, the intent that must be attributed to the party so as to render him guilty of malice murder is the accomplice's malicious intent to commit the murder, not the accomplice's intent to commit the armed robbery. Thus, a trial court must charge the jury that to find a party to an armed robbery guilty of malice murder it must find that the accomplice who shot and killed the robbery victim did so while acting with the unlawful intention to kill, i.e., with malice. To instruct the jury that it must find the party guilty of malice murder upon a finding that the accomplice murdered the victim while acting with the intent to commit armed robbery, i.e., with the intent necessary for felony murder improperly instructs the jury to return a verdict of guilty of a type of murder not charged in the indictment or included as an offense in the jury instructions.

An indictment for a single homicide which may have been committed in more than one way can take one of two recognized forms. One such form is indictment by means of a single count which contains alternative allegations as to the various ways in which the homicide may have been committed. In addition to this single count form of indictment, there is the alternative counts form in which each count alleges that the defendant committed the same homicide in one of a number of separate ways. The Georgia Supreme Court has held that an indictment on alternative counts does not constitute an inherently prejudicial form of pleading.

When both malice and felony murder are alleged as alternative and separate counts, a felony murder count that alleges that the causing of bodily harm was malicious, not that the commission of the complete crime of aggravated battery was malicious, is not merely another allegation of malice murder couched in felony murder language. A defendant might have had malice in the form of the intent to cause bodily harm with no malice in the form of the intent to kill, and yet death might still occur; in such a case the defendant would be guilty of felony murder but not malice murder. Accordingly, such an indictment alleging both malice murder and felony murder predicated on an aggravated battery does not allege malice murder twice but, instead, properly charges malice murder and felony murder as distinct, alternative counts.

An indictment for both malice murder and felony murder does not place an unfair burden on the defendant to have to defend against two separate crimes, where the trial court's jury instructions make clear that while the state may seek a murder conviction under alternate theories, the defendant can be convicted of only one count of murder. There is no rule forcing the state to elect between malice and felony murder before presenting the case to the jury.

It is clear, however, that the rule against multiple convictions embodied in § 16-1-7(a) forbids a conviction on the same set of facts of both felony murder and malice murder. Thus, in Pressley v. State, the court held that where there is only one victim and the jury returns verdicts of guilty of malice murder and felony murder the latter conviction must be vacated. In Smith v. State, the court held that when the elements of malice and an underlying felony both exist in a murder case, the law does not preclude verdicts of guilty of both malice and felony murder. Yet where there is a single victim, the defendant may be sentenced on either but not both. In Matthews v. State, the court held that since there was only one murder victim and the defendant was found guilty of both counts, i.e., malice and felony murder, the trial court correctly ruled that the two counts merged, and sentenced the defendant to only one life sentence. Even if the jury erroneously imposes sentences for both malice and felony murder, a new sentencing trial is not required because the void felony murder sentence does not affect the validity of malice murder sentence. In Barker v. State, the court held that because there were only two homicides and the evidence supported the convictions for malice murder, the felony murder convictions merged into the malice murder convictions by operation of law. Thus, the judgments of conviction and sentences on the felony murder counts had to be vacated.

When valid guilty verdicts are returned on both alternative counts of malice and felony murder, the alternative felony murder count is vacated by operation of § 16-1-7. Since the felony murder conviction has been statutorily vacated, there is no felony murder count into which the underlying felony can merge. Thus, it is proper for the trial court to treat the felony murder count as merely surplusage and then to proceed to determine whether a separate sentence on the underlying felony may be authorized for lack of merger, as a matter of fact, into the extant malice murder conviction.

Verdicts are mutually exclusive where a guilty verdict on one count logically excludes a finding of guilt on the other. Thus, the rule against mutually exclusive verdicts applies to multiple guilty verdicts which cannot be logically reconciled. The rule is not implicated where verdicts of guilty of felony murder and not guilty of malice murder are returned.

Guilty verdicts for malice murder and felony murder are not mutually exclusive as a matter of law. A guilty verdict for felony murder does not constitute a finding that the murder was committed without malice aforethought, but that the murder was committed while in the commission of another felony offense "irrespective of malice." In other words, the presence or absence of malice is irrelevant to the commission of felony murder. Nor are the two verdicts mutually exclusive as a matter of fact where the evidence authorizes the jury to conclude that the defendant committed the murder while in the commission of a felony but also acted with malice aforethought.

Since a jury's inability to agree on a verdict is not itself a verdict, a verdict which shows "no agreement" on a malice murder count and guilty on a felony murder count does not constitute a mutually exclusive verdict.

An acquittal of malice murder does not preclude a conviction of felony murder.

In Milam v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court abolished the rule that inconsistent verdicts in irreconcilable conflict in criminal cases warranted reversal, because it is not generally within the court's power to make inquiries into the jury's deliberations or to speculate about the reasons for any inconsistency between guilty and not guilty verdicts. The court has, however, recognized an exception to the abolition of this rule, i.e., when instead of being left to speculate about the unknown motivations of the jury, the appellate record makes clear the jury's reasoning why it found the defendant not guilty of one of the charges. In such a case, the court need not speculate whether the jury verdict was the product of lenity or of legal error, and the rules regarding inconsistent verdicts are not applicable. The court may then decide whether the jury's finding of not guilty of one charge requires vacation of the judgment entered on the guilty verdicts returned on the other charges in the case. In Turner v. State, the court found that as both § 16-3-20 and the trial court's repeated instruction to the jury made clear, the jury's finding of justification as to the malice murder count applied to the felony murder and aggravated assault charges based on the same conduct. In light of the jury's express finding of justification, the court held that it was error for the trial court to enter judgment on the jury verdicts finding the defendant guilty of felony murder and aggravated assault.

4. Relationship Between Murder and Other Crimes.

Important Notice about Repudiation of Actual or Same Evidence Test: The Georgia Supreme Court repudiated the actual evidence test in Drinkard v. Walker, 281 Ga. 211, 636 S.E.2d 530 (2006), because it found this test to be inconsistent with the statutory framework governing the prohibition against multiple convictions for included offenses in Georgia. This inconsistency resulted in years of confusion and unpredictable results. In its place, the court adopted the required evidence test and overruled any prior case law that is inconsistent with it. Thus, any prior case law applying the actual evidence test is no longer controlling and should not be relied upon to determine whether one offense is included in another under § 16-1-6(1). The discussion of such case law is included below only insofar as it may still be applicable to pending prosecutions that arose before the Drinkard decision. See MULTIPLE CONVICTIONS, II. Tests to Determine Presence of Multiple Convictions, for a complete discussion of the Drinkard decision.

On the trial of a murder case, if there be any evidence, however slight, as to whether the offense is murder or voluntary manslaughter, an instruction as to the law of both offenses should be given to the jury. If the evidence in a trial on a murder indictment indicates the presence of such facts as would make the killing voluntary or involuntary manslaughter, a conviction for the appropriate manslaughter crime is authorized under § 16-1-6.

It is also clear that in a felony-murder indictment the underlying felony is a lesser included offense, and there can be a conviction of only the felony if the evidence supports such a finding. It is equally clear, however, that because the felony in a felony-murder case is a lesser included offense of the murder, the rule against multiple convictions (§ 16-1-7) forbids conviction of both felony murder and the underlying felony. However, when the underlying felony is committed upon one victim and the felony murder charged in another count in the same indictment is committed upon another victim, the underlying felony does not merge with the felony murder conviction and it is proper for the trial court to enter convictions and sentences for both the felony murder and the underlying felony.

Where the evidence shows completion only of the greater offense of felony murder, that is, there is no evidence from which the jury can conclude that death resulted from a cause other than the aggravated assault inflicted by the defendant, the trial court is not required to offer aggravated assault to the jury as a lesser option.

In felony murder cases, trial courts are not constitutionally required to instruct juries on lesser related homicide offenses that are not lesser included offenses of the felony murder charge.

Where two or more felonies are involved in a felony-murder case, only one felony is required to support a felony-murder conviction, and only one felony need be merged with that conviction. Prior to 1993, in order to determine which of two or more felonies should have merged with the felony-murder conviction when the jury failed to specify the underlying felony, the Georgia Supreme Court applied the "chain of circumstances" analysis to hold that the initial felony which began the "chain of circumstances" leading to the victim's death merged with the murder conviction. In Thompson v. State, the court rejected this analysis as being purely speculative in determining what in fact the jury intended as the underlying felony. Now, where it is unclear which of two or more felonies is the underlying felony for a felony murder conviction, the trial court must merge the most severe (in terms of potential punishment).

A defendant may be convicted of an offense included in the underlying felony charged in a felony-murder indictment. Thus, if the evidence would authorize a finding that the accused committed an offense "included" in the underlying felony charged in a felony murder indictment and if that included offense is a misdemeanor, then a guilty verdict as to felony-grade involuntary manslaughter would be authorized.

The verdicts of guilty of felony murder and involuntary manslaughter are not mutually exclusive as a matter of law. Nor are they as a matter of fact where the jury can conclude from the defendant's actions that he committed a felony against one person which would support the felony murder and that he acted recklessly toward another person, and therefore, is guilty of involuntary manslaughter as well.

A mutually exclusive verdict may be rendered in a particular case, however, where the offenses or acts alleged in the indictment as underlying the felony murder and involuntary manslaughter counts reflect that the jury, in order to find the defendant guilty on both counts, necessarily reached two positive findings of fact that cannot logically mutually exist. For instance, in Jackson v. State the Georgia Supreme Court concluded that the jury's verdict finding the defendant guilty of felony murder predicated upon a § 16-5-20(a)(1) aggravated assault on the victim was mutually exclusive of a verdict finding him guilty of involuntary manslaughter predicated upon reckless conduct in regard to the same act involving the same victim at the same instance of time. The jury convicted the defendant of killing the victim with criminal intent and with criminal negligence, that is, of killing both with and without an intention to do so. The two verdicts were obviously mutually exclusive. Because it was both legally and logically impossible to convict the defendant of both felony murder and involuntary manslaughter, the court reversed both mutually exclusive convictions and ordered a new trial.

The rule against mutually exclusive verdicts applies to multiple guilty verdicts which cannot be logically reconciled. The rule is not implicated where verdicts of not guilty by reason of insanity of malice murder and guilty but mentally ill of the remaining offenses are returned. Moreover, the fact that the verdicts might be factually inconsistent is of no avail to the defendant. It is well settled that factual inconsistencies in verdicts rendered in the same case do not afford a ground for setting aside a conviction.

Under § 16-1-7(a)(1), it is proper to convict and sentence a defendant for that crime which includes all others. Since a misdemeanor can be an included crime in a felony, misdemeanor-involuntary manslaughter can be an included crime in felony murder. Where the evidence shows that a homicide occurred in the commission of both a felony and an included misdemeanor, there is no inconsistency or ambiguity in verdicts of guilt as to misdemeanor-involuntary manslaughter and felony murder. Accordingly, it is not error to merge the included misdemeanor into the felony and then to merge the underlying felony into the felony murder count. When the misdemeanor merges into the felony, the predicate for the defendant's conviction for involuntary manslaughter is eliminated, but the felony remains as the basis for the defendant's conviction for murder. Thus, the trial court may properly enter the judgment of conviction and sentence on the jury's verdict finding the defendant guilty of the offense of felony murder.

Where the acts alleged in the indictment fit the requirements for both felony murder and vehicular homicide, the defendant may be prosecuted for each crime. Although the defendant may not be properly sentenced for each crime, that does not prevent his trial on both charges.

When valid guilty verdicts are returned on both alternative counts of felony murder and vehicular homicide, the alternative vehicular homicide count is vacated by operation of § 16-1-7. Since the vehicular homicide conviction has been statutorily vacated, there is no vehicular homicide count into which the underlying traffic offense can merge. Thus, it is proper for the trial court to treat the vehicular homicide count as merely surplusage and then to proceed to determine whether a separate sentence on the underlying traffic offense may be authorized for lack of merger, as a matter of fact, into the extant felony murder conviction. This analysis applies as well when valid guilty verdicts are returned on both alternative counts of felony murder and involuntary manslaughter.

Where felony murder and vehicular homicide in the first degree are based on separate and distinct underlying actions, it is neither legally nor logically impossible to convict the defendant of both offenses.

There is one situation in which the rule against multiple convictions prevents conviction of both malice murder and an underlying felony. This is illustrated in Burke v. State and involves the use of the conspiracy/complicity doctrine. In Burke, the defendant was convicted of the malice murder of the victim of an armed robbery. He, however, was not the actual killer and his liability for the armed robbery was premised on the fact that he was a co-conspirator with the actual perpetrator. Under these circumstances, the court held that the malice of the killer was properly imputed to the defendant because the defendant was the killer's co-conspirator in the armed robbery and the malice murder "was a probable consequence of that armed robbery."

On these facts, however, because the defendant's malice murder conviction depended upon the participation in the armed robbery, the court ordered the defendant's armed robbery conviction vacated, finding that in this kind of case the latter was included in the former. Thus, the nontriggerman conspirator could have been convicted of only malice murder, while the actual triggerman could have been convicted of both the armed robbery and malice murder. This latter double conviction did not violate § 16-1-7(a) because the triggerman's malice murder conviction did not depend upon (and therefore did not include) participation in the armed robbery.

Robbery by force and malice murder are separate crimes which do not merge as a matter of law. Moreover, they do not merge as a matter of fact where each crime is proved by distinct elements absent from the proof of the other.

Because the intent relevant to a conviction for felony murder is the underlying intent for the felony and because intent to kill, as well as mitigating factors such as provocation and passion, are irrelevant to that intent, a jury's verdict of guilty of felony murder does not constitute a finding that the defendant did not act with provocation and passion in assaulting the victim and does not conflict with the jury's verdict of guilty of voluntary manslaughter. Under these circumstances, the verdicts are not mutually exclusive. A trial court may not sentence a defendant for felony murder and voluntary manslaughter based on the same underlying aggravated assault. By definition, a defendant found guilty of voluntary manslaughter lacks the mens rea required to commit felony murder in that any malice which would have been imputed from the underlying felony has been mitigated by the provocation which induced the crime of voluntary manslaughter. Moreover, a trial court may not sentence a defendant for both offenses because there is only one victim. To convict and sentence the defendant for both offenses would improperly subject him to multiple convictions and punishments for one crime.

In Ward v. State, the court held that the final clause of the feticide statute does not preclude a defendant's conviction for both murder of the mother and feticide.

Malice murder and kidnapping with bodily injury do not merge as a matter of law, and they do not merge as a matter of fact since there is no requirement that the state prove the existence of malice aforethought to establish the charge of kidnapping with bodily injury, though malice aforethought must be proven for the murder charge, and there is no requirement that the state prove the victim is unlawfully abducted to establish the murder charge, though such unlawful abduction must be proven to establish kidnapping with bodily injury.

Where there is no evidence whatsoever that the defendant's beating of the victim was a separate act but rather was part and parcel of the collective fatal attack on the victim, neither battery nor simple battery are lesser included offenses of malice murder as a matter of fact. Even if battery and simple battery are considered to be lesser included offenses, when the evidence shows completion only of the greater offense of malice murder, it is unnecessary for the trial court to charge on the lesser offenses.

If the evidence used to prove the defendant committed an aggravated battery is the same as that used to prove he committed a malice murder, the aggravated battery merges into the malice murder as a matter of fact, and a separate judgment of conviction and sentence for the aggravated battery should be vacated.

If the aggravated battery of the victim is independent of the malicious act causing the victim's death, the aggravated battery does not merge with the malice murder as a matter of fact. Likewise, if the aggravated assault of the victim is independent of the act causing the victim's death, the aggravated assault does not merge into the malice murder as a matter of fact. Moreover, if, in order to establish that the defendant committed aggravated assault as pled in the indictment, the state is required to show not only that he shot the victim but that he did so with the intent to rob him, the aggravated assault would not be established by proof of the same or less than all the facts required to establish proof of malice murder. Thus, the two crimes would not merge as a matter of fact. However, if the aggravated assault and murder of the victim arise out of the same incident, a defendant's conviction on the aggravated assault charge would merge into the murder conviction.

Verdicts of not guilty on a murder count and guilty on an aggravated assault count are neither inconsistent nor mutually exclusive.

Because malice murder does not include all of the essential elements of the offense of cruelty to children, the latter is not an included offense of malice murder, and a conviction for cruelty to children would not be authorized under a malice murder count of an indictment. It follows that the refusal to give a requested charge on cruelty to children as an included offense of malice murder would not be error.

While a conviction for cruelty to children may be authorized as an included offense of felony murder, if the defendant is convicted of malice murder, the erroneous failure to charge cruelty to children as an included offense of felony murder would be harmless.

Because a defendant cannot be both a party to a crime and an accessory after the crime, a felony murder conviction is void as a matter of law when a jury convicts a defendant of hindering the apprehension of a criminal as a lesser included offense of murder.

5. Double Jeopardy

The grant of mistrial as to a count of murder does not prevent the state from trying the defendant again for murder and the lesser included offense of voluntary manslaughter, if the termination of trial was proper. If the jury is unable to reach a verdict on a murder count, the termination of the trial is not improper. In such a case, a second trial on both the charge of murder and the lesser included offense of voluntary manslaughter will not violate the defendant's right to be tried once for the same offense.

Where the jury has stated that they found the defendant not guilty of malice murder but were deadlocked as to the other offenses before them, the trial court's declaration of a mistrial does not terminate the original jeopardy to which the defendant was subjected for the other offenses. Rather, jeopardy for these offenses is continuing.

Thus, an acquittal on the indicted offense of malice murder would not bar retrial on the lesser included unindicted offense of voluntary manslaughter to which continuing jeopardy had attached in the first trial.

Where the jury was unable to reach a verdict on a felony murder count, with deadly weapon aggravated assault as the underlying felony, but was able to reach a verdict of acquittal on an aggravated assault with intent to rob count, if the verdict reflects that the jury intended to and did acquit the defendant solely on the charge of aggravated assault with intent to rob, the state's prosecution of the defendant for felony murder based on the separate underlying felony of deadly weapon aggravated assault is not barred as a successive prosecution in violation of the defendant's double jeopardy rights. Furthermore, unless it can be established that the jury necessarily found that the defendant did not assault the victim with a deadly weapon, the mere possibility that the jury may have done so does not bar the state's prosecution of the defendant for felony murder based on the deadly weapon aggravated assault.

When a trial court rules on a defendant's motion for new trial that the evidence was insufficient to warrant the imposition of a life sentence for a felony murder guilty verdict, the trial court is essentially stating that the evidence was insufficient to authorize the underlying felony murder guilty verdict itself. Since the trial court has found the evidence legally insufficient, the Double Jeopardy Clause precludes the further prosecution of the defendant for felony murder.

If a defendant is found guilty of both felony murder and the underlying felony, the conviction for the underlying felony merges with the felony murder conviction. However, it does not necessarily follow that double jeopardy bars retrial when a trial ends in an acquittal of felony murder and a mistrial on the underlying felony. The acquittal on the felony murder does not necessarily imply acquittal on the underlying felony. Thus, retrial on the underlying felony would be permissible under the doctrine of continuing jeopardy.

Although the statutory aggravating circumstances enumerated in § 17-10-30(b) may function as elements of the greater offense of capital murder for the limited purpose of implicating the constitutional right of trial by jury, they are not offenses, but rather they are procedural standards designed to control a jury's discretion in capital cases in order to ensure against capricious and arbitrary enforcement of the death penalty. Accordingly, aggravating circumstances are not offenses for purposes of the constitutional guarantee against double jeopardy. Therefore, the fact that a jury finds that the offenses of armed robbery and burglary are aggravating factors in sentencing a defendant for murder would not preclude separate convictions for committing those offenses.

Double-jeopardy protections are not triggered when the jury deadlocks at the defendant's first sentencing proceeding for murder and the trial court prescribes a sentence of life imprisonment pursuant to state law. The Double Jeopardy Clause is not implicated because neither the jury nor the judge has "acquitted" the defendant in this initial sentencing proceeding by entering findings sufficient to establish legal entitlement to the life sentence, i.e., findings that the state failed to prove one or more aggravating circumstances beyond a reasonable doubt. In such a case, where the defendant appeals the conviction and succeeds in having it set aside, jeopardy has not terminated, so that the life sentence imposed in connection with the initial conviction raises no double-jeopardy bar to a death sentence on retrial.

5.1. Statute of Limitations

Section § 17-3-1(a), in permitting the commencement of a prosecution for "murder" at any time, applies on its face to both malice murder and felony murder. The running of the statute of limitations on the underlying felony is irrelevant to a prosecution for felony murder. Furthermore, a felony murder conviction is not dependent upon the successful prosecution of the underlying felony. Thus, the expiration of the limitations period for the underlying felony does not preclude a prosecution for felony murder.

An indictment is not rendered defective because a felony murder count incorporates by reference an underlying felony count which must be stricken. Even if the underlying felony count is stricken due to the expiration of the statute of limitations, it remains a part of the indictment to the extent that it is incorporated into the felony murder count.

An underlying felony that is separately charged in an indictment for felony murder cannot remain as a separate count, where, ordinarily, it would be barred by the statute of limitations. Thus, where the limitations period for the felony has expired, the trial court's application of the statute of limitations to bar the underlying felony count would be correct. Nevertheless, a conviction for the underlying felony may ultimately be appropriate, as it is a lesser included offense of the felony murder count. Furthermore, although the underlying felony is no longer the subject of a separate count, it remains in the indictment as part of the felony murder count into which it is incorporated.

The statute of limitations applicable in a criminal case is that which relates to the offense charged in the indictment, and not to any minor offense included therein of which the accused might be found guilty. Thus, the statute of limitations applicable to the lesser included offense of voluntary manslaughter would not bar a conviction of that offense under an indictment for murder, since there is no statutory limitation as to indictments for murder.

6. Punishment

The punishment for murder is either life imprisonment, imprisonment for life without parole, or death.

Prior to 2009, a sentence of life without parole was an alternative sentence to a sentence of death, dependent upon the state also seeking the death penalty. The death penalty provisions had to be utilized in order to implement the life without parole sentencing option. Thus, the state was barred from seeking life without parole unless it had filed a notice of intent to seek the death penalty. In 2009, the General Assembly amended § 16-5-1(d) to allow a sentence of life without parole to be imposed for the offense of murder independent of a death penalty prosecution and repealed Code sections inconsistent with such sentencing.

In a jury trial, the determination of which penalty is administered is left to the jury in a separate proceeding conducted after the guilt/innocence phase of the trial. The sentencing procedure is discussed at length elsewhere and is beyond the scope of this book.

C. Manslaughter

Except for felony murder and homicide by vehicle, all nonmalicious criminal homicide is manslaughter. Georgia has two types of manslaughter: voluntary and involuntary. The former is the intentional "heat of passion" killing that is viewed as less criminal than murder, yet not quite justified enough to render it noncriminal. The latter includes unintentional killings of two varieties: (1) "criminal negligence" which is not to the level of "abandoned and malignant heart" murder and (2) killings arising out of "unlawful acts" which are not felonies so as to invoke the felony-murder rule.

1. Voluntary Manslaughter

Section 16-5-2 punishes those who cause a human being's death under "circumstances which would otherwise be murder" if the defendant's acts were the sole result of a "sudden, violent, and irresistible passion" which is caused by "serious provocation." The statute is careful to add, perhaps redundantly, that such a passion cannot be found if there was a "sufficient" cooling off time between the provocation and the killing.

Inherent in the statutory definition is the requirement that the killing be intentional. Thus, the only intentional criminal killings which are not malicious (and, therefore, murder) are those where the killer's intention is attributable to the finding of provocation envisioned by § 16-5-2 and the killing passion it creates. The killer's intention can be proved by circumstantial evidence. Whether the killing was intentional is a matter for the jury to determine. A claim by the killer that the killing was unintentional would establish the absence of an essential element of the offense. Without evidence of an intention to kill, an instruction on voluntary manslaughter would not be authorized.

Voluntary manslaughter can be seen as a crime which is a creature of compromise. The law, while refusing to find the defendant's act noncriminal or justified because it was in self-defense, defense of others, defense of property, etc., nevertheless makes some allowances for the frailties of human nature and punishes for less than murder. It is important, however, to recognize that while this is a "compromise" crime, it cannot always be offered to a murder jury as a compromise verdict. Evidence must exist to support a finding of provocation, passion, and lack of cooling off time. Theoretically, if there is not sufficient evidence to support such a finding, a voluntary manslaughter verdict will be overturned. Thus, if the only evidence before the jury is that which would support a murder conviction and that which would support an alibi or justification defense and there is no evidence to support a provocation claim, a voluntary manslaughter instruction is neither required or authorized. It has been held, however, that where there is no evidence supporting voluntary manslaughter but, rather, a murder conviction is "demanded" by the evidence, a voluntary manslaughter conviction will be permitted to stand. To this extent, therefore, the courts can be seen to be authorizing the use of a voluntary manslaughter verdict as a "compromise" verdict. In essence, the defendant on appeal is denied relief because things could have been worse for him.

a. Provocation

The statute requires proof of "serious" provocation sufficient to excite a deadly passion in a reasonable person. Whether the provocation was sufficient to excite a deadly passion in a particular defendant is of no moment. It is a question of law for the trial court to determine whether there is slight evidence that the defendant acted as the result of sudden, violent, and irresistible passion resulting from serious provocation in order to support a charge on voluntary manslaughter. The question of whether the provocation was serious enough is normally left to the trier of fact. However, certain patterns can be discerned from the cases with regard to provocation.

i. Mutual Combat

The provocation in most voluntary manslaughter cases is "mutual combat." Dating from an 1860 Georgia case, the mutual combat doctrine holds that if the parties were in a fight pursuant to a mutual intent to fight and were both armed, a killing resulting from the altercation will be no more than voluntary manslaughter. It is clear that both parties must have been at fault and "mutually willing to fight because of a sudden quarrel." Thus, if a defendant was acting merely to repel an unprovoked attack, this act is not mutual combat but self-defense which would, if the jury made such a finding, justify the killing. Thus, where there is no evidence that the victim was armed and the evidence showed that whatever force he used was in self-defense to ward off an unprovoked attack by the defendant, a voluntary manslaughter instruction is not required.

Where one shoots at another intending to kill him under such circumstances that the killing, if accomplished, would be voluntary manslaughter, but the shot misses the intended victim and accidentally kills an innocent third person, the homicide will be voluntary manslaughter. In Coker v. State, the Georgia Court of Appeals applied this principle to the facts of the case. The evidence showed that while the defendant was standing his ground to engage in mutual combat, shots were exchanged between his group and another group, and a shot fired by someone other than the defendant strayed and killed a bystander. This evidence was held sufficient to support the defendant's conviction for voluntary manslaughter as a party to the crime. However, in Willis v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court held that where two people were engaged in mutual combat and as a result of their assault upon each other a bystander died, both were guilty of felony murder.

It has been held that mutual combat is something more than a fist fight or scuffle. Thus, evidence that showed only that there had been an argument between the defendant and the deceased did not authorize a mutual combat voluntary manslaughter charge, although one court did approve a conviction where the evidence, in the court's analysis, showed only a "heated family disturbance." "Boxing" or fighting prior to a homicide does not constitute the kind of provocation which would warrant a charge on voluntary manslaughter.

Mutual combat is not a complete defense to a murder charge; rather, it is a defense which, if accepted by the jury, may result in reduction of the crime to voluntary manslaughter. However, if the defendant has withdrawn from the mutual combat and has effectively communicated his intent to do so but later kills in self-defense, then the killing may be justified and the defendant may be found not guilty. Jury instructions on these principles, rather than being conflicting, would adequately convey to the jury the duty to withdraw or retreat from mutual combat.

Because the mutual combat charge authorizes a jury to find the defendant guilty of voluntary manslaughter in lieu of murder, it is a charge that benefits a defendant and, as such, a convicted defendant's complaint that it was improper to give the charge would be without merit.

ii. Words Combined with Other Circumstances

It has long been the law in Georgia, as in most other states, that mere words cannot provide the kind of provocation which is the basis of a voluntary manslaughter conviction. A 1978 Georgia Supreme Court case held that this rule had formerly been "embedded in the . . . statutory law of Georgia" and that this rule was still a part of § 16-5-2. As one court wrote, the "indignation may be great, and the passion may be strong; but if aroused by words alone, they are insufficient to . . . reduce a homicide from murder to manslaughter." It has been held, however, that words can be combined with other circumstances to justify a killing. It would seem, therefore, that words could be combined with other circumstances so as to be sufficient provocation for voluntary manslaughter.

In 1988, the Georgia Supreme Court held that although the statutory law of Georgia no longer contained the proposition found in the Code of 1933 that "[i]n all cases of voluntary manslaughter, there must be some actual assault upon the person killing, or an attempt by the person killed to commit a serious personal injury on the person killing," the proposition nonetheless remained a part of Georgia's law of voluntary manslaughter.

iii. Physical Contact by Victim

Physical contact by the victim has been deemed sufficient to raise the issue of voluntary manslaughter, as in Butts v. State, where the victim slapped the defendant. In Addison v. State, a severe slap on the head was held to raise the question of voluntary manslaughter and, where there was a previous history of threats exchanged between the defendant and the victim and the victim had dated the defendant's wife, a bumping of the defendant's car by the victim along with a rush toward the car by the victim was held to authorize a voluntary manslaughter conviction.

In most cases where the victim has committed a battery on the defendant, it will be urged by the defendant that the killing was justified in self-defense. The crucial distinction here, at the intersection between justifiable and criminal homicide, is the motive with which the defendant acts. If he is acting out of passion or anger it will be voluntary manslaughter, while if he is acting out of a motive to prevent injury it will be self-defense. Whether the defendant acted in the heat of passion or in self-defense is a matter for the jury to determine. It should also be noted that the fear engendered by danger can be sufficient provocation to excite the passion necessary for voluntary manslaughter.

It is readily seen that the defendant's motive will often be a close question, and a jury verdict for voluntary manslaughter will usually be left undisturbed on appeal. In White v. State, the court held that a voluntary manslaughter verdict will be supported where the jury can conclude that the defendant acted out of a fear of an offense "less than a felony." This is because the self-defense defense of § 16-3-21 authorizes only a force reasonable under the circumstances and a killing can never be reasonable if the victim's offense is only that of a crime less than a felony. Of course, simple battery is such an offense. Thus, if the only reasonable fear that a defendant had was that of a simple battery, self-defense is not present and voluntary manslaughter is authorized.

iv. Adulterous Conduct

Adultery as a provocation has been held not only to reduce a killing from murder to manslaughter but to justify a killing, according to the "unwritten law." Thus, in Henderson v. State, the Court of Appeals held that killing a paramour in order to prevent adultery would be justifiable homicide, although killing the spouse would not be so since it would terminate the marriage. The Supreme Court of Georgia in Burger v. State, however, described this traditional rule as "uncivilized" and held that an instruction on justifiable homicide in the killing of a spouse or paramour should not be given. The Burger court, however, left open the possibility that, on the facts of a particular case, adultery might be sufficient provocation as to support a voluntary manslaughter verdict. In Brooks v. State, the court noted that although the victim used words to make the defendant aware of her adultery, it was the victim's adulterous conduct, rather than her words describing that conduct, which served as sufficient provocation authorizing a charge on voluntary manslaughter.

It is submitted that the Burger holding with regard to adultery ought to govern trial court instructions and appellate court analysis in all voluntary manslaughter cases. Rather than establish categorical rules that certain fact situations do or do not show sufficient provocation, the court should grant juries a fairly free rein in these cases and should take the issue of provocation from the jury only in extremely rare circumstances. This appears to reflect the treatment of the issue in the Georgia courts.

The rationale underlying the court's decision finding adulterous conduct as sufficient provocation would also be applicable to sexual conduct involving a defendant's illicit lover and another man. Nevertheless, a request to charge on provocation caused by the illicit lover's "adulterous conduct" would be inapt in such a case. Adultery can be committed only by married persons, not illicit lovers. Thus, a trial court's refusal to give such a charge would be proper.

A lover's engaging in an act of consensual sex with her ex-husband can serve as sufficient provocation to reduce a homicide from murder to voluntary manslaughter. However, evidence of such conduct does not demand a finding of voluntary manslaughter. Even where one claims sexual jealousy as the provocation for a killing, it is generally a question for a jury to determine whether the slayer acted from passion or revenge. If the evidence authorizes a finding that the slayer shot to avenge himself against the ex-husband's past acts, rather than as the result of any present provocation resulting from the reconciliation of the ex-spouses, the jury would be authorized to find proof of malice murder rather than voluntary manslaughter.

In a special concurring opinion in Ricketts v. State, Chief Justice Fletcher, rather than joining in the majority's approval of the Suggested Pattern Jury Instruction on adultery in murder cases, found that it failed to fully apprise a jury of the law of this state that adulterous conduct can serve as sufficient provocation to reduce homicide from murder to voluntary manslaughter. In order to provide juries with a clearer statement of the law in future prosecutions involving a defense of voluntary manslaughter because of adulterous conduct, Chief Justice Fletcher urged trial courts to first define voluntary manslaughter and then charge as follows:

> A spouse's adulterous conduct may serve as serious provocation sufficient to cause a person to act as the result of a sudden, violent, and irresistible passion. What circumstances will present a situation so as to excite such passion and exclude all idea of deliberation or malice is a matter for the jury to determine. If the evidence shows, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the killing was done by the defendant without malice, and without a spirit of revenge, but under a violent, sudden impulse of passion, then you would be authorized to find the defendant guilty of voluntary manslaughter.

Recognizing the validity of Chief Justice Fletcher's opinion, the drafters of the Suggested Pattern Jury Instructions changed the pattern charge on adultery in 2003 by adding language specifically stating that "[y]ou may consider whether adultery amounts to provocation, which would mitigate the killing." This change in the pattern charge reflects a consensus view among trial judges in this state that an adultery charge is incomplete and potentially misleading when it fails to make explicit the notion that adultery may constitute provocation sufficient to mitigate a killing.

Notwithstanding this change in the pattern charge, the trial court in Shields v. State gave to the jury an adultery charge that was modeled after the former pattern charge and that omitted the language adopted in 2003 which reiterates that adultery can amount to provocation. Despite this omission, the majority in Shields held that the charge as given left the door open for the jury to consider whether such killing was committed in circumstances which would constitute voluntary manslaughter. Moreover, in the context of the trial court's charge as a whole, the majority held that the instruction in no way misled the jury or hindered the defendant's ability to attempt a defense of voluntary manslaughter.

Where the defendant's contention that he acted with irresistible passion as a result of the victim's adulterous conduct is not his sole defense and is not supported by the evidence, the trial court's failure to charge the jury on voluntary manslaughter would not be error.

v. Insufficient Provocation

Evidence of anger is not, as a matter of law, a showing of the provocation necessary to set aside a finding of malice. Thus, even where there is evidence that the victim angered the defendant, the jury may still determine from all the facts and circumstances that the killing, rather than being the result of considerable provocation, was intentional and malicious.

The desire to prevent a drug user from using drugs again is not sufficient provocation to reduce murder to voluntary manslaughter. Also, where the only evidence relating to provocation is the defendant's assertion that the victims refused to sell drugs to him, a charge on voluntary manslaughter is not warranted.

Finally, a charge on voluntary manslaughter is not warranted when the only alleged evidence of provocation is the victim resisting a forcible felony.

b. Passion

The intentional killing in a voluntary manslaughter case has to result from a provocation to passion. According to the statute, this passion has to be "sudden, violent, and irresistible." A Georgia Supreme Court case has described it as that which "excludes all idea of deliberation or malice." Although normally the passion will be anger, there is authority that fear will suffice.

However, sexual passion is not within the "passion" which is part of the voluntary manslaughter definition. The question of the existence of and sufficiency of the passion is one for the jury. The jury ought to be required to find not only that the reasonable person acting under these circumstances would have reacted passionately but also that this defendant actually did. Otherwise the provocative circumstances would be merely granting a license to kill.

c. Cooling Off

Section 16-5-2 provides that if there was a time period between the provocation and the killing long enough for "the voice of reason and humanity to be heard," there is not voluntary manslaughter but murder. The statute allocates the determination of this question to the jury. Ordinarily, it will be left to the jury to decide whether there was a cooling off period during which a reasonable person would have cooled off and whether this defendant actually had cooled off.

Although the jury is the judge of whether there was a sufficient cooling off period, it is a question of law for the trial court to determine whether there is slight evidence that the defendant acted as the result of sudden, violent and irresistible passion resulting from serious provocation. The trial court can conclude as a matter of law that the incident did not constitute even slight evidence of provocation because of a cooling off period between the incident and the killing and, therefore, can refuse to charge the jury as to voluntary manslaughter.

d. Improper Sequential Jury Instructions

Where the evidence would authorize a conviction for felony murder or voluntary manslaughter, a sequential charge requiring the jury to consider voluntary manslaughter only if it has considered and found the defendant not guilty of malice murder and felony murder is not appropriate. Instead, the trial court should instruct the jury so as to ensure adequate consideration of charges for both forms of homicide.

If a trial court has given a sequential charge to the jury in violation of Edge v. State, a defendant who has reserved his right to raise objections to the jury charge on appeal is entitled to a new trial. However, if the sequential charge given was requested by the defendant, he cannot assert on appeal that the charge was erroneous. Even if the defendant's trial preceded Edge, he cannot subsequently contend that it was error to give a sequential charge if he previously failed to comply with the applicable procedures for securing review of that issue. Even though the trial court has given an improper sequential charge to the jury, if it is evident from the record that the verdict of felony murder was the product of adequate consideration of charges for both forms of homicide rather than of any prejudicial emphasis communicated by the improper sequential charge, the defendant's conviction for felony murder will be upheld.

With the jury's consideration of malice, it must also consider the element of provocation. If the jury finds that the defendant committed the homicide with malice, it necessarily finds that the element of provocation does not exist or is insufficient to overcome the jury's finding of malice, whether express or implied. With this finding of malice, voluntary manslaughter is eliminated from the jury's consideration, rendering any sequential charge given by a trial court in connection with felony murder and voluntary manslaughter harmless error. Likewise, if the evidence does not authorize consideration of voluntary manslaughter as a possible verdict, a sequential charge does not amount to reversible error.

Even absent an objection to a sequential charge or to a jury's verdict finding a defendant guilty of felony murder, appellate review of the trial court's failure to apply the modified merger rule cannot be waived, because a conviction which should have been merged into another as a matter of fact or law is void.

e. Imperfect Self-Defense

In a minority of other states, "imperfect self-defense" is a form of voluntary manslaughter where the killing is committed with an honest but unreasonable belief in the necessity of using deadly force. Because "imperfect self-defense" as a form of voluntary manslaughter is not recognized in this state, it is not error for a trial court to refuse to give a requested charge on "imperfect self-defense."

f. Verdicts

If a jury returns guilty verdicts of felony murder, voluntary manslaughter, and aggravated assault, in the absence of an objection to the form of the verdicts, a trial court is not under a duty to sentence the defendant for the crime of felony murder. The trial court may find as a matter of law that the jury's finding of voluntary manslaughter precludes a conviction on the felony murder charge and may sentence the defendant on the voluntary manslaughter charge.

A trial court may not sentence a defendant for felony murder and voluntary manslaughter based on the same underlying aggravated assault. By definition, a defendant found guilty of voluntary manslaughter lacks the mens rea required to commit felony murder in that any malice which would have been imputed from the underlying felony has been mitigated by the provocation which induced the crime of voluntary manslaughter. Moreover, a trial court may not sentence a defendant for both offenses because there is only one victim. To convict and sentence the defendant for both offenses would improperly subject him to multiple convictions and punishments for one crime.

Because the intent relevant to a conviction for felony murder is the underlying intent for the felony and because intent to kill, as well as mitigating factors such as provocation and passion, are irrelevant to that intent, a jury's verdict of guilty of felony murder does not constitute a finding that the defendant did not act with provocation and passion in assaulting the victim and does not conflict with the jury's verdict of guilty of voluntary manslaughter. Under these circumstances, the verdicts are not mutually exclusive.

In a case presenting an unusual situation involving possible verdicts of felony murder or voluntary manslaughter and excluding any possible verdict of malice murder, the court held that a charge on voluntary manslaughter that merely referred to malice to distinguish voluntary manslaughter from an intentional killing was not reversible error.

Where the defendant is convicted of the voluntary manslaughter of one victim and the aggravated assault of another victim, the convictions do not merge as a matter of fact, even though only one shot was fired, striking both victims. One crime is not included within another if each crime affects a different victim. Thus, verdicts of guilty of voluntary manslaughter as to one victim and aggravated assault as to the other victim will be upheld.

Where the jury has convicted the defendant of malice murder, it is not required to return a verdict on voluntary manslaughter.

f.1. Relationship Between Voluntary Manslaughter and Other Crimes

Important Notice about Repudiation of Actual or Same Evidence Test: The Georgia Supreme Court repudiated the actual evidence test in Drinkard v. Walker, 281 Ga. 211, 636 S.E.2d 530 (2006), because it found this test to be inconsistent with the statutory framework governing the prohibition against multiple convictions for included offenses in Georgia. This inconsistency resulted in years of confusion and unpredictable results. In its place, the court adopted the required evidence test and overruled any prior case law that is inconsistent with it. Thus, any prior case law applying the actual evidence test is no longer controlling and should not be relied upon to determine whether one offense is included in another under § 16-1-6(1). The discussion of such case law is included below only insofar as it may still be applicable to pending prosecutions that arose before the Drinkard decision. See MULTIPLE CONVICTIONS, II. Tests to Determine Presence of Multiple Convictions, for a complete discussion of the Drinkard decision.

If the aggravated assault of the victim is independent of the killing itself, the aggravated assault does not merge into the voluntary manslaughter as a matter of fact.

Where the jury was authorized to conclude from the evidence either that the defendant intentionally shot the victim, in which case he was guilty of voluntary manslaughter, or that the gun discharged accidentally, in which case he was guilty of no crime, the trial court's refusal to charge the jury on the lesser included offense of involuntary manslaughter would not be error.

g. Punishment

Voluntary manslaughter is a felony punishable, under § 16-5-2, by imprisonment for one to 20 years.

2. Involuntary Manslaughter

Section 16-5-3 provides for two different types of involuntary manslaughter. Subsection (a) defines felony involuntary manslaughter as an unintentional killing which results from the commission of an unlawful yet nonfelonious act. Subsection (b) defines misdemeanor involuntary manslaughter as an unintentional killing which results from the commission of a lawful act in an unlawful manner. Note, however, that a trial court's charge to the jury should not designate one form of involuntary manslaughter as "felony" and the other as "misdemeanor." The former can be described as "unlawful act" involuntary manslaughter while the latter is the "criminal negligence" type of involuntary manslaughter.

The common ground shared by both types of involuntary manslaughter is that of unintentional killing. A verdict for involuntary manslaughter is not authorized and instructions are not required where the evidence makes it plain that the act was done intentionally. Thus, where the victim's body showed nine gunshot wounds in the back, the court held, as a matter of law, that involuntary manslaughter was not at issue. Likewise, the court refused to order involuntary manslaughter instructions where the victim died as the result of 15 blows with a blunt instrument or where the victim died as the result of repeated stabbing with a knife. An involuntary manslaughter instruction is not warranted even if it is the sole defense if the evidence does not support the charge. It is important to note that while evidence which could support the proof of an unintentional killing is necessary for an involuntary manslaughter instruction, it is not necessarily sufficient. Thus, where the evidence shows a lack of intent to kill but the presence of a felony by the defendant, no theory of involuntary manslaughter is available. However, if the evidence does not demand a finding that the victim's death was the result of a felony and there is some evidence that the victim's death occurred unintentionally, an involuntary manslaughter instruction is warranted and should be given to the jury upon a proper request.

Even if the evidence is consistent with a finding that the victim was intentionally killed, the jury can still properly find that the defendant unintentionally killed the victim during the commission of a misdemeanor.

Unlike voluntary manslaughter, involuntary manslaughter does not contain an element that mitigates a greater offense. Thus, the prohibition against giving a sequential charge to the jury to consider possible verdicts in a particular sequence, which would eliminate the jury's full consideration of any mitigating factor, is inapplicable in a case involving involuntary rather than voluntary manslaughter.

a. "Unlawful Act" Involuntary Manslaughter

It has been held that an "unlawful act other than a felony" sufficient to trigger § 16-5-3(a) is "an act condemned by some statute or valid municipal ordinance of this state." Thus, most § 16-5-3(a) prosecutions will be based on a violation of a misdemeanor statute or a local ordinance. It would appear that the word "unlawful" does not authorize the court to make ad hoc determinations that behavior not prohibited by the criminal code is, nevertheless, unlawful. This view is fortified in § 16-2-1 by its abolition of common law crimes and by its requirement of a statutory violation before a crime can be punished.

Where the evidence in a case affords no basis whatsoever for a finding that the killing was unintentional or that the defendant was guilty of a misdemeanor rather than felony, it is proper for the trial court to refuse to charge the jury on involuntary manslaughter involving an unintentional killing during an unlawful act other than a felony.

The majority of "unlawful act" involuntary manslaughter convictions formerly were based on violations of the motor vehicle code. At the present time, however, deaths arising out of a violation of the motor vehicle code must be prosecuted under § 40-6-393. The courts have indicated that unintentional killings arising out of simple battery, simple assault, and reckless conduct would constitute § 16-5-3(a) violations. In fact, a violation of § 16-11-102, pointing a pistol, has been held sufficient to support an instruction under § 16-5-3(a). It should be emphasized that if the only evidence in the case indicates an aggravated assault under § 16-5-21 through the use of a loaded pistol, this offense will be felony murder even if the killing is unintentional, because § 16-5-3(a) requires a nonfelonious unlawful act and § 16-5-21 describes a felony.

In a § 16-5-3(a) prosecution, while the state will not have the burden of proving an intention to kill, it will be required to show the requisite mens rea for a violation of the underlying unlawful act. Thus, in Solomon v. State, the court held that the state must show an intent to commit the unlawful act itself or reckless conduct which violates the statute defining the unlawful act. It is submitted that this latter route to an involuntary manslaughter conviction ought to be available only when recklessness would be sufficient culpability for conviction of the underlying offense itself. In other words, new mens rea requirements for the underlying unlawful act ought not be created in manslaughter prosecutions.

Another requirement in a § 16-5-3(a) prosecution is that of causation. It must appear from the evidence that the death was caused by the violation of the statute defining the underlying unlawful act. For example, in Burns v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court held that it was not error for the trial court to fail to charge on involuntary manslaughter. The court found no merit in the defendant's argument that the victim's death was caused by his carrying a pistol without a license in violation of § 16-11-128. According to the court, there was no showing of a causal relationship between the defendant's not having complied with the state's licensing laws and the victim's death. Likewise, in Carlton v. State, the Court of Appeals found no merit in the defendant's argument that felony involuntary manslaughter should have been charged based upon his carrying a concealed weapon in violation of § 16-11-126. The concealment, while unlawful, did not cause the death. The firing of the gun did so. In Hill v. State, the Court of Appeals held that a rational trier of fact, relying on the evidence at trial, could have found the defendant guilty of involuntary manslaughter with simple battery as the underlying unlawful act. It was uncontroverted that the defendant was bouncing and shaking the child on his knee immediately before the child lost consciousness and went limp. The causal relationship between the defendant's physical contact with the child and the child's death was supported by the testimony of the pediatrician and the medical examiner that the child's death resulted from "Shaken Baby Syndrome."

Although a charge of involuntary manslaughter in the commission of an unlawful act involving use of a firearm can be based on an allegation that the unintentional killing was caused by the defendant's commission of misdemeanor offenses such as pointing the firearm at the victim or reckless conduct with the firearm, such a charge cannot be based on an allegation that the unintentional death was caused solely by the defendant's unlawful possession of the firearm. Since there would be no allegation that the defendant committed an unlawful act under circumstances that could be the proximate cause of the unintentional death, the involuntary manslaughter indictment would be fatally defective.

b. "Criminal Negligence" Involuntary Manslaughter

It is a misdemeanor to kill another human being while performing a "lawful act in an unlawful manner likely to cause death or great bodily harm." The courts have grappled with the precise definition of what conduct this statute punishes. In the Georgia Supreme Court's most detailed description of the conduct prohibited by § 16-5-3(b), the court described it as "criminal negligence [that] shows an indifference to the injurious results of the negligent acts." The court made clear that criminal negligence is more than civil or tort negligence and held it "must appear that [the defendant] knew, or that an ordinarily prudent person under similar circumstances would have known, that his act might probably endanger others."

If there is sufficient evidence to raise an issue as to whether the victim's death was the result of the defendant's criminally negligent conduct, the appellate courts have held that it is error for a trial court to refuse to charge the jury on this grade of involuntary manslaughter. In Prince v. State, the defendant made his brother leave his home by threatening him with a gun. While the defendant handled the gun, the gun "went off" and killed the brother. Although the defendant was in lawful possession of the home and was authorized to order his brother to leave, his handling of the gun was criminally negligent conduct. This evidence was sufficient to raise the issue of involuntary manslaughter for the jury's consideration, and the jury should have been instructed accordingly. Likewise, in Teasley v. State, the defendant shot open a locked box, and the bullet apparently ricocheted off the box and killed the victim who was lying on the floor nearby. Although it was lawful for the defendant to shoot open the locked box, it was criminally negligent to do so in close proximity to the victim. The Georgia Supreme Court held that the evidence was ample to raise an issue for the jury's consideration as to the defense of involuntary manslaughter. Thus, the trial court's refusal to charge the jury on involuntary manslaughter was error.

c. Involuntary Manslaughter v. Accident

By definition, involuntary manslaughter involves an unintended killing. Likewise, the § 16-2-2 defense of accident is an assertion that the death, while factually caused by the defendant, was unintentionally caused. In fact, because the courts limit involuntary manslaughter to criminal negligence, the defendant who asserts that his actions were, at worst, tortiously negligent is asserting an accident defense. Because the determination of whether particular behavior is merely tortiously or, instead, criminally negligent is merely one of degree, it seems clear that most, if not all, cases presenting an asserted accident defense will likewise present an involuntary manslaughter case as well. For example, in Sirmans v. State, the defendant testified that as he grabbed the gun the "bullet went off." While he was arguing for total exoneration under § 16-2-2, it certainly ought to have been within reason that a jury could have found that the defendant's actions were criminally negligent.

Some cases appear to say that where the defense is accident, involuntary manslaughter is not presented. These cases, however, all arose in the context of a defense assertion on appeal that the trial judge should have, sua sponte, charged involuntary manslaughter and can be explained as reflecting an unwillingness to permit the defendant to take his chances on an accident acquittal and then seek a new trial on involuntary manslaughter. This defense technique is no longer permissible under State v. Stonaker, which requires defendants to request charges in writing on lesser offenses. If defendants, therefore, in "accident" cases also seek involuntary manslaughter instructions in the future, it is suggested that in most situations such instructions will be warranted. The difference between accident and involuntary manslaughter is often one of degree and the defendant who seeks to place the latter possibility before the jury ought to be permitted to do so. However, such instructions will not be warranted where there is no evidence that the defendant unintentionally shot the victim by the commission of an unlawful act other than a felony, or where there is no evidence that the defendant accidentally shot the victim by the commission of a lawful act in an unlawful manner.

d. Involuntary Manslaughter v. Self-Defense

Just as some homicide defendants have asserted that their accident defense testimony raised the possibility of involuntary manslaughter, others who have testified to self-defense have claimed a right to § 16-5-3(b) involuntary manslaughter instructions. The essence of the claim is that where a defendant denies an intention to kill yet does so while acting in self-defense a jury ought to be able to conclude that, even if self-defense was not shown under § 16-3-21 because the force used was excessive, the defendant's acts were lawful (self-defense) yet done in an unlawful manner (with excessive force). Thus, the elements of § 16-5-3(b)—lack of intention, lawful act, unlawful manner—would be present. In 1975, the Georgia Supreme Court recognized that this analysis was defensible, but refused to reverse a conviction for failure to instruct on involuntary manslaughter because the defendant had not sought the instructions at trial.

There has been a great deal of litigation concerning the necessity and appropriateness of involuntary manslaughter instructions in situations where the defendant claims self-defense as a primary defense. In the paradigmatic case, the defendant argues as an alternative to his complete defense of self-defense that the homicide could be viewed as involuntary manslaughter under § 16-5-3(b) in that he was performing a lawful act (self-defense) in an unlawful manner (excessive force). In the ordinary case, the defendant's testimony will be that he was simply using the homicide-producing instrumentality to scare the deceased. This question has continued to be confronted by the appellate courts and the Georgia Supreme Court has attempted to make the law in the area more precise.

In Crawford v. State, the defendant shot the decedent, assertedly in defense of self and habitation. On trial for murder, he interposed those two defenses and additionally requested a jury instruction on involuntary manslaughter under § 16-5-3(b), which the trial court refused to give. The Georgia Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and took the opportunity to attempt to set out the law in this area. After reviewing the case law dating back to 1908, the court held that "it is not necessary to give a request to charge . . . as to involuntary manslaughter, Code § 26-1103(b) [O.C.G.A. § 16-5-3], where the defendant asserts that he or she fired a gun in self-defense." The court distinguished earlier cases in which a homicide defendant was held entitled to such an instruction as involving other instrumentalities, such as brake sticks and knives. The distinguishing factor, according to the court, is that "the deadly force of a gun is known to all." Therefore, by using a gun the defendant has committed the separate crime of reckless conduct (§ 16-5-60) and, therefore, cannot be said to have committed a lawful act for purposes of involuntary manslaughter.

Crawford is an admirable attempt to clarify the law in the area. The court decided that the intentional use of a gun is simply inconsistent with the lack of intent to kill which is a prerequisite in involuntary manslaughter. Because most of the cases appear to deal with situations where the defendant used a gun, this would appear to cover most cases. After the decision in Crawford, which dealt with the use of a gun in self-defense, the question of how to handle nongun cases remained open. That is, what if the defendant used something other than a gun in self-defense? Would that defendant be entitled to a charge on involuntary manslaughter?

In Saylors v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court dealt with a nongun case. In Saylors, the defendant used a three-inch pocket knife in self-defense and asserted error in the failure to charge the jury on involuntary manslaughter. The Supreme Court affirmed, relying on Crawford. While recognizing the difference in the weapons used, the court concluded that the "soundness of [the Crawford] reasoning is undeniable, and leads inevitably to this conclusion: a defendant who seeks to justify homicide under the 'self-defense' statute . . . is not entitled to an additional instruction on involuntary manslaughter in the course of a lawful act . . . whatever the implement of death." While not citing it, Saylors implicitly approved Fitzhugh v. State, a Court of Appeals decision reaching the same conclusion. The question left open in Crawford has been answered.

Post-Crawford litigation in both the Supreme Court and the Court of Appeals is consistent with, although not always explicit in, its reliance on Crawford.

In Williams v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court specifically rejected the defendant's claim that intentionally shooting in the direction of a victim to scare him would authorize an instruction on § 16-5-3(b). The defendant testified that he was attempting to shoot over the victim's head to scare him but that his aim was bad. He contended that the theory of involuntary manslaughter was applicable because a jury could have found that he was acting in self-defense (the lawful act) but used excessive force (the unlawful manner).

The court responded to the defendant's claim by pointing out that if his testimony was to be believed, his act was either justified and no crime at all or it constituted the felony of aggravated assault. In neither case could the evidence be interpreted as demonstrating a lawful act in an unlawful manner. The intention to pull the trigger sufficed to make the Crawford rule applicable and render the misdemeanor involuntary manslaughter instruction unnecessary. Failure to instruct as to that crime was not error.

An involuntary manslaughter instruction is not authorized where the defendant created an emergency requiring a killing and then claimed self-defense. In Rhode v. State, the court held that even if it were admitted that the defendant shot the unarmed victim when he resisted the burglary of his home and the murder of his two children, such admission would not have shown that the defendant committed the lawful act of self-defense. Therefore, a charge on involuntary manslaughter involving a lawful act committed in an unlawful manner was not warranted.

d.1. Involuntary Manslaughter v. "Parental Reasonable Discipline" Justification Defense

A homicide defendant who relies on the "parental reasonable discipline" justification defense is not entitled to an additional instruction on involuntary manslaughter in the course of a lawful act because if the defendant was justified in administering reasonable parental discipline, he is guilty of no crime. Furthermore, if the defendant was not so justified, the homicide does not fall within the "lawful act" predicate of § 16-5-3(b) since, in the rejecting the defense, the jury has determined thereby that the act was not lawful.

e. Relationship Between "Unlawful Act" Involuntary Manslaughter and "Criminal Negligence" Involuntary Manslaughter

The question of whether a defendant indicted under § 16-5-3(a) can instead be convicted of a violation of § 16-5-3(b) has arisen several times. The courts which considered the question have held that if the indictment allegations are broad enough and the proof is sufficient, such a conviction would be authorized. Thus, where the defendant was charged with having ignored a stop sign and killing the driver of a pickup truck, the court held that a § 16-5-3(b) conviction was authorized where the defendant insisted he had complied with the stop sign. In fact, it can be argued that every § 16-5-3(a) indictment includes a charge of § 16-5-3(b) because, in the language of § 16-1-6, the latter crime consists of only "a less culpable mental state" than the former. Subsection (a) must include proof of an intent to commit the "unlawful act," while criminal negligence, a less culpable mental state than intent, suffices to convict under subsection (b).

f. Relationship Between Involuntary Manslaughter and Other Crimes

When valid guilty verdicts are returned on both alternative counts of felony murder and involuntary manslaughter, the alternative involuntary manslaughter count is vacated by operation of § 16-1-7. Since the involuntary manslaughter conviction has been statutorily vacated, there is no involuntary manslaughter count into which the underlying misdemeanor offense can merge. Thus, it is proper for the trial court to treat the involuntary manslaughter count as merely surplusage and then to proceed to determine whether a separate sentence on the underlying misdemeanor offense may be authorized for lack of merger, as a matter of fact, into the extant felony murder conviction.

Where the jury is authorized to conclude from the evidence either that the defendant intentionally shot the victim, in which case he would be guilty of voluntary manslaughter, or that the gun discharged accidentally, in which case he would be guilty of no crime, the trial court's refusal to charge the jury on the lesser included offense of involuntary manslaughter would not be error.

Where the evidence shows either the commission of the completed offense of felony murder or the commission of no offense, the trial court is not required to charge the jury on involuntary manslaughter as a lesser included offense.

g. Verdicts

A jury verdict that has found the defendant guilty of involuntary manslaughter, in spite of the trial court's instructions to the jury only on the law of murder and voluntary manslaughter, is not a proper verdict. After the jury has returned such a verdict and the trial court has determined prior to the verdict's publication in open court that the verdict is not a proper one, the trial court should return the jury for further deliberation with direction to return a verdict within range of instructions on murder and voluntary manslaughter originally given to it. The jury must return a verdict that is responsive to the issues framed by the indictment and the evidence and given to the jury in the trial court's instructions.

If the trial court's instructions on "unlawful act" involuntary manslaughter are correct statements of the law and if the jurors have correctly applied these instructions to the facts as found by them, the jury's verdict of guilty is a proper one. Evidence that, because of a misunderstanding of the trial court's instructions, the jurors believed that they were finding the defendant guilty of a misdemeanor, rather than a felony, and that they would not have voted to find the defendant guilty had they known that "unlawful act" involuntary manslaughter was punishable as a felony does not impeach the verdict. The legal status of the offense of involuntary manslaughter as a felony or misdemeanor and the resulting punishment if a guilty verdict is returned, is of absolutely no concern to the jury.

The verdicts of guilty of felony murder and involuntary manslaughter are not mutually exclusive as a matter of law. Nor are they as a matter of fact where the jury can conclude from the defendant's actions that he committed a felony against one person which would support the felony murder and that he acted recklessly toward another person, and therefore, is guilty of involuntary manslaughter as well.

A mutually exclusive verdict may be rendered in a particular case, however, where the offenses or acts alleged in the indictment as underlying the felony murder and involuntary manslaughter counts reflect that the jury, in order to find the defendant guilty on both counts, necessarily reached two positive findings of fact that cannot logically mutually exist. For instance, in Jackson v. State the Georgia Supreme Court concluded that the jury's verdict finding the defendant guilty of felony murder predicated upon a § 16-5-20(a)(1) aggravated assault on the victim was mutually exclusive of a verdict finding him guilty of involuntary manslaughter predicated upon reckless conduct in regard to the same act involving the same victim at the same instance of time. The jury convicted the defendant of killing the victim with criminal intent and with criminal negligence, that is, of killing both with and without an intention to do so. The two verdicts were obviously mutually exclusive. Because it was both legally and logically impossible to convict the defendant of both felony murder and involuntary manslaughter, the court reversed both mutually exclusive convictions and ordered a new trial.

The rule against mutually exclusive verdicts applies only where the convictions result from the same act involving the same victim at the same instant. Where the victim sustains several injuries, convictions for both intentional and negligent crimes are not mutually exclusive. In Waits v. State, for example, the Georgia Supreme Court held that the criminal intent required for aggravated assault, aggravated battery, and cruelty to children did not logically exclude the criminal negligence element of reckless conduct because the victim sustained numerous injuries. A rational trier of fact could have found that the victim initially suffered non-fatal injuries which resulted from the defendant's frequently negligent care. Thus, because the evidence showed that the crime of reckless conduct occurred prior to the other offenses and that the conviction for that crime was not based upon the same conduct as the other crimes, the reckless conduct verdict did not logically exclude any other verdict.

Where there was one act committed upon one victim at the same time, either intentionally or accidentally, convictions of aggravated assault and involuntary manslaughter would be mutually exclusive verdicts. It would therefore be proper for the trial court to instruct the jury to continue deliberating on these two charges.

Under § 16-1-7(a)(1), it is proper to convict and sentence a defendant for that crime which includes all others. Since a misdemeanor can be an included crime in a felony, misdemeanor-involuntary manslaughter can be an included crime in felony murder. Where the evidence shows that a homicide occurred in the commission of both a felony and an included misdemeanor, there is no inconsistency or ambiguity in verdicts of guilt as to misdemeanor-involuntary manslaughter and felony murder. Accordingly, it is not error to merge the included misdemeanor into the felony and then to merge the underlying felony into the felony murder count. When the misdemeanor merges into the felony, the predicate for the defendant's conviction for involuntary manslaughter is eliminated, but the felony remains as the basis for the defendant's conviction for murder. Thus, the trial court may properly enter the judgment of conviction and sentence on the jury's verdict finding the defendant guilty of the offense of felony murder.

Even if a jury finds a defendant guilty of the involuntary manslaughter of a child, a trial court would not be required to direct a verdict of acquittal on a cruelty to children charge. The two verdicts could indeed be consistent because the jury could have found from the evidence that the defendant maliciously caused the child excessive pain and that his actions caused the child's death, but that he may not have intended to kill the child.

h. Punishment

Under § 16-5-3, "unlawful act" involuntary manslaughter is a felony punishable by imprisonment for one to ten years. "Criminal negligence" involuntary manslaughter is punishable as a misdemeanor under § 17-10-3.

D. Assisting Suicide

Any person who publicly advertises, offers, or holds himself out as offering that he will intentionally and actively assist another person in the commission of suicide and commits any overt act to further that purpose is guilty of a felony. This offense is punishable by imprisonment for not less than one nor more than five years.

Any person who knowingly and willfully commits any act which destroys the volition of another, such as fraudulent practices upon such person's fears, affections, or sympathies; duress; or any undue influence whereby the will of one person is substituted for the wishes of another, and thereby intentionally causes or induces such other person to commit or attempt to commit suicide is guilty of a felony. This offense is punishable by imprisonment for not less than one nor more than ten years.

The Code provisions that make it unlawful to assist another person in the commission of suicide do not affect any of the laws, in whole or in part, that may be applicable to the withholding or withdrawal of medical or health care treatment, including but not limited to, laws related to a living will, a durable power of attorney for health care, an advance directive for health care, or a written order not to resuscitate.

The United States Supreme Court has held that a state's prohibition on assisting suicide does not violate the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The "right" to assistance in committing suicide is not a fundamental liberty interest protected by the Due Process Clause. Also, such a prohibition satisfies the constitutional requirement that it be rationally related to legitimate government interests. The court has also held that a prohibition on assisting suicide does not violate the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The distinction between refusing lifesaving medical treatment and assisted suicide is neither arbitrary nor irrational. Logic and contemporary practice support the judgment that the two acts are different, and a state may therefore, consistent with the federal constitution, treat them differently. The reasons for recognizing and acting on this distinction are valid and important public interests which easily satisfy the constitutional requirement that a legislative classification bear a rational relation to some legitimate end.

Even if there is evidence that a defendant committed murder for the purpose of obtaining a death sentence, the defendant's execution by the state would not constitute an assisted suicide. The defendant is being sentenced to death not because of his own desire to die but because of the nature of his crimes. Furthermore, the jury, not the defendant, makes the final determination that death is the appropriate punishment for his crimes. The fact that the defendant agrees with the jury's determination that his crimes deserve death is immaterial.

III. Homicidal Offenses Not Found in Article 1 of Chapter 5 of Title 16

A. Generally

A number of offenses outside of Article 1 of Chapter 5 of Title 16 can be described as homicidal offenses in that they include as an element either a killing of a person, a killing of a fetus or unborn child, or an attempted termination of a fetus. These offenses are: criminal abortion (§ 16-12-140), partial-birth abortion (§ 16-12-144), feticide (§ 16-5-80), concealing death (§ 16-10-31), homicide by vehicle (§ 40-6-393), feticide by vehicle (§ 40-6-393.1), homicide by interference with an official traffic-control device or railroad sign or signal (§ 40-6-396), homicide by vessel (§ 52-7-12.2), feticide by vessel (§ 52-7-12.3), homicide by aircraft (§ 6-2-5.2), and perjury resulting in death (§ 16-10-70).

B. Abortion

1. Criminal Abortion

In 1973, the United States Supreme Court in Roe v. Wade and Doe v. Bolton imposed severe limitations on how the abortion of fetuses can be criminally punished by the states. Viewing the problem as one which involves the conflicting interests of the mother and society, the Court held that during the first trimester of pregnancy a mother has an absolute right to an abortion. After the first trimester, however, a societal interest in maternal health becomes compelling and can support regulations aimed at protecting such health. Finally, the societal interest in the possibility of life in the fetus permits state criminal punishment of all nontherapeutic abortions performed after the fetus has become viable, i. e., capable of an independent existence apart from the mother.

In 1992, a 5-4 majority of the United States Supreme Court in Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey held that Roe v. Wade was still the law of the land, but that the states are nevertheless free to restrict abortion as long as they do not place an "undue burden" on the woman, which was Justice O'Connor's test in her concurring opinion in the Webster case. Utilizing this "undue burden" test, the majority held that Pennsylvania could not force a woman to notify her husband about an abortion. The state could, however, impose a 24-hour waiting period; require doctors to tell women about other options to abortions so as to provide "informed consent"; demand parental notification for minors; and make doctors provide statistical information about patients.

The current Georgia abortion statute, codified at §§ 16-12-140 to 16-12-143, was enacted in 1973 in response to the United States Supreme Court decision invalidating the prior law as violative of the pregnant woman's rights under the Due Process Clause of the federal constitution. The current statutory scheme is rather curious. Under § 16-12-140, it is a crime for a person to administer any substance or use any means with the intent to produce a miscarriage or abortion. This section refers to "exceptions" in § 16-12-141. While one would assume, therefore, that § 16-12-141 would contain a list of situations in which the acts prohibited by § 16-12-140 could be performed, this is clearly not the case. Although subsection (a) of § 16-12-141 provides that an abortion deemed "necessary" by a physician "based upon his best clinical judgment" is always permitted, it also provides that a partial-birth abortion by a duly licensed physician or layperson is prohibited. Subsection (b) prohibits post-first trimester abortions performed without licensed physicians and outside of licensed hospitals, licensed ambulatory surgical centers, or licensed abortion facilities, and subsection (c) prohibits post-second trimester abortions which are not deemed to be necessary to the preservation of the mother's "life or health."

Subsections (b) and (c), while written in the form of prohibitions, apparently are designed to permit all other abortions. In other words, all first trimester abortions can be performed anywhere (not just in licensed hospitals, licensed ambulatory surgical centers, or licensed abortion facilities), and second trimester abortions can be performed without a showing of medical necessity to protect the mother's life or health, so long as they are performed in a licensed hospital, a licensed ambulatory surgical center, or a licensed abortion facility. This is the obvious intent of the statute because otherwise it would clearly violate the Roe v. Wade and Doe v. Bolton guidelines.

Subsection (d) of § 16-12-141 provides record keeping requirements for those who perform abortions.

Section 16-12-142(a), which was formerly subsection (e), provides that hospitals need not admit patients seeking abortions and that individuals who have objections to the performance of all abortions cannot be held liable for a refusal to perform one. Also, § 16-12-141(b), which was enacted in 2006, provides that a pharmacist who states in writing an objection to any abortion is not required to fill a prescription for a drug if the purpose of the drug is to terminate a pregnancy and that such refusal cannot be the basis for any claim for damages or for any disciplinary or recriminatory action. However, the objecting pharmacist must make all reasonable efforts to locate another pharmacist who is willing to fill such prescription or immediately return the prescription to the prescription holder. Moreover, this provision cannot be construed to authorize a pharmacist to refuse to fill a prescription for birth control medication, including any process, device, or method to prevent pregnancy and including any drug or device approved by the federal Food and Drug Administration for such purpose.

As for the constitutionality of the statutory scheme, it seems to be in essential compliance with relevant United States Supreme Court authority, with one exception. Certainly the requirement of § 16-12-141(b) of a licensed hospital, a licensed ambulatory surgical center, or a licensed abortion facility for post-first trimester abortions is a legitimate regulation which effectuates the state interest in maternal health. Also, the record-keeping requirement of § 16-12-141(d) is reasonably related to a legitimate state interest in health and the United States Supreme Court has upheld a similar provision. Section 16-12-141(c), however, which forbids abortions after the second trimester of pregnancy without certification of necessity to protect the mother's life or health may suffer from a constitutional defect.

Roe and later cases permit the state to bar abortions after viability. In one of its abortion decisions, the Court emphasized that viability is a medical concept and its determination must be left to physicians. While it normally occurs at the end of the second trimester (between 24-28weeks), it varies from pregnancy to pregnancy. The Court, therefore, stressed that "neither the legislature nor the courts may proclaim one of the elements entering into the ascertainment of viability—be it weeks of gestation or fetal weight or any other single factor—as the determinant of when the state has a compelling interest in the life or health of the fetus. Viability is the critical point. And we have recognized no attempt to stretch the point of viability one way or the other." (Emphasis added). It would appear that § 16-12-141(c) in proscribing post-second trimester elective abortions has done exactly that which the Court condemned—isolated the number of weeks of gestation as the dividing line between legal and illegal elective abortions instead of using the entire concept of viability. To the extent that the statute punishes post-second trimester, pre-viability abortions, it would appear to violate the constitutional right to an elective (nontherapeutic) abortion as announced in Roe and explained in Colautti.

Additionally, it ought to be noted that there is an apparent inconsistency within § 16-12-141 itself. Subsection (a) appears to validate an abortion at any point in pregnancy when the physician determines that it is "necessary." The decision as to necessity is left to the physician's "best clinical judgment." The subsection points out that nothing in the article "shall be construed to prohibit" such an abortion, commonly known as a therapeutic abortion. However, subsection (c) appears to do exactly that, by stating that "[n]o abortion . . . shall be performed after the second trimester unless the physician and two consulting physicians certify that the abortion is necessary in their best clinical judgment to preserve the life or health of the woman." Although this regulation would be constitutional to the extent that it applies after viability, it certainly appears to restrict the right to an abortion set up by subsection (a). The courts have not yet been called upon to resolve this apparent conflict.

In 1985, the General Assembly enacted a statute dealing with disposal of aborted fetuses. Under the statute, all those hospitals and clinics where abortions are performed or occur spontaneously and laboratories to which aborted fetuses are delivered must provide for the disposal of the aborted fetuses by "cremation, interment, or other manner approved of by the commissioner of community health." Annual reports to the commissioner are also required concerning the disposal. Violation of the statute is punishable by a fine of between $1,000 and $5,000. In 2005, the General Assembly added a provision to this statute that requires physicians or their agents to submit to the Department of Community Health annual parental notification report forms with the requested data entered accurately and completely. The amended statute also provides for penalties and remedies for the failure to provide such reports.

In a case involving abortion protestors, the Georgia Court of Appeals held that an abortion conducted in compliance with the law would not constitute "imminent use of unlawful force" so as to justify the defendants' obstruction of a public passage during an abortion protest.

In Hillman v. State, the defendant was indicted under § 16-12-140 for allegedly using a handgun to shoot herself in the abdomen "with intent to produce a miscarriage and an abortion of her unborn child." The Court of Appeals held that a pregnant woman cannot be prosecuted under the statute for allegedly performing a criminal abortion on herself. By its plain meaning, the statute does not criminalize a pregnant woman's actions in securing an abortion, regardless of the means utilized. The court rejected the state's construction and overbroad application of the statute which would have encompassed the defendant's conduct. Under such a construction, a woman would have been at risk of a criminal indictment for virtually any perceived self-destructive behavior during her pregnancy which could have caused a late term miscarriage. Finally, the court held that regardless of whether the pregnant woman acts alone or with assistance, she cannot be charged under the statute, as the statute is specifically directed to prevent the conduct of persons other than the pregnant woman.

2. Partial-Birth Abortion

In 1997, the General Assembly enacted a statute prohibiting partial-birth abortions. A partial-birth abortion is an abortion in which the person performing the abortion partially vaginally delivers a living human fetus before ending the life of the fetus and completing the delivery. Any person who knowingly performs a partial-birth abortion and thereby ends the life of a human fetus is punishable by a fine not to exceed $5,000, imprisonment for not more than five years, or both.

This prohibition does not apply to a partial-birth abortion that is necessary to save the life of the mother because her life is endangered by a physical disorder, physical illness, or physical injury, including a life-endangering condition caused by or arising from the pregnancy itself, provided that no other medical procedure will suffice to save the mother's life.

A woman upon whom a partial-birth abortion has been performed is not subject to prosecution for violating this law.

The father of the fetus and the parents of the mother, if she was under the age of 18 at the time of the abortion, may obtain appropriate relief in a civil action, unless the pregnancy resulted from the plaintiff's criminal conduct or the plaintiff consented to the abortion. Such relief includes money damages for all injuries, psychological and physical, and statutory damages equal to three times the cost of the partial-birth abortion.

It should be noted that United States District Court Judge J. Owen Forrester has refused to issue an injunction against the enforcement of this law. The judge stated that "the state has a legitimate and compelling interest in regulating the manner in which abortions are performed after the fetus is viable." The judge had ruled earlier in an interim order that the law applies only to viable fetuses. The state settled the case challenging the constitutionality of this law by stipulating that the law applies only to the medical procedure known as intact dilation and extraction and applies only to viable fetuses, that is, fetuses that could live outside the womb. "The effect of the settlement was to define precisely, and to limit, what kind of abortions are prohibited." This limitation of the statute's prohibition to the intact dilation and extraction of a viable fetus avoids the constitutional defect found in a partial-birth abortion statute of another state. Since the language of that state's statute could be construed to cover a much broader category of abortion procedures, it was found by the U.S. Supreme Court to place an undue burden upon a woman's right to terminate her pregnancy before viability. However, like the other state's statute, our statute is constitutionally defective for another reason. Although it provides an exception for those instances when partial-birth abortion is necessary to preserve the life of the mother, it lacks any exception for the preservation of the mother's health. The law requires a health exception in order to validate even a postviability abortion regulation.

3. Parental Notification Act

In 1987, the General Assembly enacted the Parental Notification Act. The Act provided that no physician or other person should perform an abortion upon an unemancipated minor under the age of 18 years unless the child's parent or guardian was properly notified.

A preliminary injunction enjoining the implementation of the Parental Notification Act sought by Planned Parenthood was granted by United States District Court Judge Robert Hall. The court found (1) the verification procedures of the Act were unconstitutionally burdensome and failed to provide adequate alternative means of verification, and (2) the promulgated Juvenile Court Rules requiring the inclusion on certain court documents of the minor's name and Social Security number failed to guarantee that minor constitutionally adequate anonymity in seeking judicial waiver by not requiring that the juvenile court record be sealed.

In 1988, the Parental Notification Act was amended to correct these constitutional infirmities but was again held unconstitutional. The United States District Court held that the failure of the statute to recognize more expeditious forms of written notice under § 15-11-112(a)(1)(C) was the only constitutional defect in the statutory scheme not remediable by an amendment to the Uniform Juvenile Court Rules. The court went on to find a number of defects in these rules.

In 1990, the United States Supreme Court struck down a Minnesota parental notification law which required minor women to notify both biological parents and had no judicial bypass procedure. However, the court upheld an Ohio one-parent abortion notification law which provided a judicial bypass alternative for minor women who could not notify their parents. (Note that Georgia's Parental Notification Act is a one-parent notification law with a judicial bypass procedure.)

In 1991, the Eleventh Circuit Court of Appeals, guided by these two United States Supreme Court decisions, held that the federal district court improperly enjoined the implementation of Georgia's Parental Notification Act. The court held that the Act's notification requirements taken together do not unduly burden the minor's abortion decision and that the Act's judicial bypass procedure does survive constitutional scrutiny.

Any person who violates the provisions of the Act shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and any person who intentionally encourages another to provide false information pursuant to the Act shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.

4. Woman's Right to Know Act

In 2005, the General Assembly enacted the Woman's Right to Know Act. Under this Act, no abortion can be performed in this state except with the voluntary and informed consent of the female upon whom the abortion is to be performed. Except in the case of a medical emergency, consent to an abortion is voluntary and informed if and only if the female is informed at least 24 hours before the abortion of (1) the particular medical risks to her associated with the particular abortion procedure to be employed, when medically accurate; (2) the probable gestational age of the unborn child at the time the abortion would be performed; and (3) the medical risks associated with carrying the unborn child to term. In addition, the female must be informed (1) that medical assistance benefits may be available for prenatal care, childbirth, and neonatal care; (2) that the father will be liable pursuant to § 19-7-49(a) to assist in the support of her child; (3) how to obtain a list of health care providers, facilities, and clinics that offer to perform ultrasounds free of charge; and (4) that she has the right to review printed materials provided by the state that describe the unborn child, list agencies that offer alternatives to abortion, and contain information on fetal pain.

The female must certify in writing, prior to the abortion, that the information described above has been furnished to her and that she has been informed of her opportunity to review the printed materials provided by the state. For all cases in which an ultrasound has been performed prior to conducting an abortion or a pre-abortion screen, the female must certify in writing that (1) she was provided the opportunity to view the fetal image and hear the fetal heartbeat; (2) whether or not she elected to view the sonogram; and (3) whether or not she elected to listen to the fetal heartbeat, if present. Prior to the performance of the abortion, the physician who is to perform the abortion or the physician's qualified agent must receive a copy of these written certifications and retain them on file with the female's medical record for at least three years following the date of receipt.

When a medical emergency compels the performance of an abortion, the physician must inform the female prior to the abortion, if medically reasonable and prudent, of the medical indications supporting the physician's judgment that an abortion is medically necessary to avert her death or that a 24-hour delay would create serious risk of substantial or irreversible impairment of a major bodily function. Any physician who so informs the female can not be held civilly liable for failure to obtain informed consent to an abortion.

C. Feticide

1. Legislative Background

The General Assembly enacted the original feticide statute in 1876. When the General Assembly revised the criminal code in 1968, it found the feticide statute along with a plethora of other pre-1968 statutes relating to specific types of homicide to be archaic and unnecessary. Since the General Assembly deliberately designed the homicide statutes of the 1968 criminal code to have general applicability, it decided not to include those pre-1968 statutes relating to specific types of homicide. However, apparently recognizing that there was a need for the feticide statute in the criminal code, the General Assembly resurrected the statute and incorporated it into the code in 1982. The General Assembly then amended the statute in 2006 so as to revise the definition of feticide, to prohibit the voluntary manslaughter of an unborn child, and to provide for exceptions.

2. Definition of Offense

In 2006, the General Assembly revised the definition of feticide in three ways. First, it eliminated the common law limitation that afforded protection only to those unborn children who were "so far developed as to be ordinarily called 'quick,' "i.e., so far developed as to be able to move or stir in the mother's womb. Now, the statute affords protection to all unborn children at any stage of development. Second, the General Assembly added the phrase that the cause of the unborn child's death must be "without legal justification." It would appear that this phrase permits a defense to criminal liability where the defendant can show that a justification defense applies to his case. Finally, the General Assembly added the provision that a person can commit feticide if he causes the death of the unborn child "when in the commission of a felony." With the addition of this language to the statute, the General Assembly has incorporated a rule very similar to the felony-murder rule found in the homicide statute. This rule permits the substitution of the mens rea of the underlying felony for the malice normally required for murder.

With these revisions the statute now provides that "[a] person commits the offense of feticide if he or she willfully and without legal justification causes the death of an unborn child by any injury to the mother of such child, which would be murder if it resulted in the death of such mother, or if he or she, when in the commission of a felony, causes the death of an unborn child." This offense is punishable by life imprisonment.

Although feticide is, of course, related to criminal abortion, the feticide statute is designed to prohibit a very different kind of conduct. While the criminal abortion statute prohibits conduct performed in compliance with the mother's will, the feticide statute prohibits conduct performed against her will. Indeed, the statute apparently requires that the offender act with the requisite mens rea for murder or felony murder.

3. Voluntary Manslaughter of Unborn Child

A person commits the offense of voluntary manslaughter of an unborn child when that person causes the death of the child under circumstances which would otherwise be feticide and if such person acts solely as the result of a sudden, violent, and irresistible passion resulting from serious provocation sufficient to excite such passion in a reasonable person. However, if there should have been an interval between the provocation and the killing sufficient for the voice of reason and humanity to be heard, of which the jury in all cases is the judge, the killing will be attributed to deliberate revenge and be punished as feticide. The offense of voluntary manslaughter of an unborn child is punishable as a felony by imprisonment for not less than one nor more than 20 years.

4. Exceptions

Nothing in the feticide statute can be construed to permit the prosecution of (1) any person for conduct relating to an abortion for which the consent of the pregnant woman, or person authorized by law to act on her behalf, has been obtained or for which such consent is implied by law; (2) any person for any medical treatment of the pregnant woman or her unborn child; or (3) any woman with respect to her unborn child.

5. Constitutional Issues and Construction of Statute

Since the 2006 General Assembly eliminated from the definition of feticide the common law limitation that afforded protection only to those unborn children who were "so far developed as to be ordinarily called 'quick,' "any case law construing this term would no longer be controlling authority for offenses committed on or after July 1, 2006, the effective date of the enactment. The case law discussion construing this term is included below to the extent that it may still be applicable to offenses committed before that date.

The 1982 feticide statute came under constitutional attack in Brinkley v. State, where the defendant claimed that the use of the word "quick" rendered it unconstitutionally vague. The Georgia Supreme Court, in rejecting this claim, cited a number of cases interpreting the 1876 feticide statute which used the same word. The court held that the word "quick" meant the point at which the "fetus is able to move in its mother's womb" and found that the trial court had correctly instructed the jury on that definition.

Because of the lengthy history of judicial definition of the word, there was no constitutional infirmity. The court concluded that the 1982 statute informed all of what actions the state prohibited with sufficient definiteness that ordinary people could understand. The court also pointed out that there was nothing in the United States Supreme Court abortion jurisprudence which cast any doubt on the validity of the statute. In those cases, "the court dealt with a balance between a woman's right of privacy affording her the choice to decide the question of abortion . . . as against the state's interest in safeguarding health, maintaining medical standards, and in protecting potential life. . . . But here we deal with the interest of the state in protecting both the mother and the fetus from the intentional wrongdoing of a third party who can claim no right for his actions."

In Smith v. Newsome, the Eleventh Circuit Court of Appeals held that the 1982 feticide statute was not unconstitutionally vague. The court held that the case law of Georgia had long adopted the common law understanding of "quick" as when the fetus is so far developed as to be capable of movement within the mother's womb. Furthermore, rather than adding vagueness, the final clause of the 1982 feticide statute contributed specificity to the offense. Finally, the distinction between sentences required by the 1982 feticide statute and the criminal abortion statute was rationally related to legitimate governmental purposes.

In Ward v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court held that the clause, "by any injury to the mother of such child, which would be murder if it resulted in the death of such mother," would not preclude a defendant's conviction for both murder of the mother and feticide. The court found that this language contributes specificity to the offense. A jury must make a factual finding that the defendant's actions, had they resulted in death to the mother, would have constituted murder. Moreover, as long as neither offense is included in the other as a matter of law or of fact, it would not be error to convict a defendant of both offenses.

D. Concealing Death

Another homicide-related statute punishes anyone who, by concealing the death of any other person, hinders a discovery of whether or not that person was unlawfully killed. This offense is a felony punishable by imprisonment for not less than one nor more than ten years, a fine of not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000, or both. This statute would apparently punish the concealment of all deaths because all deaths would raise the possibility of an unlawful killing.

E. Homicide by Vehicle

Prior to 1974, unintended, vehicular deaths provided a fruitful source for prosecutions under the involuntary manslaughter statute (§ 16-5-3). This source was diverted to another statute (§ 40-6-393) when the General Assembly created the offense of homicide by vehicle in 1974. With the creation of this offense, the General Assembly excepted unintended, vehicular deaths from other forms of involuntary manslaughter. Now, such deaths must be prosecuted and punished under the homicide by vehicle statute rather than the involuntary manslaughter statute.

Under the homicide by vehicle statute, if an unintended death occurs through the violation of the statutes punishing the failure to stop for a stopped school bus, the failure to stop at the scene of an accident, reckless driving, driving under the influence, or fleeing a police officer, it is first degree homicide by vehicle and punishable by three to 15 years' imprisonment. All other violations of the motor vehicle code which result in unintended deaths are second degree homicide by vehicle and are punishable as misdemeanors.

For further analysis of § 40-6-393, see MOTOR VEHICLE CRIMES.

F. Feticide by Vehicle

The offenses of feticide by vehicle in the first degree and in the second degree are punishable under § 40-6-393.1. See MOTOR VEHICLE CRIMES.

G. Homicide by Interference with Official Traffic-Control Device or Railroad Sign or Signal

The offense of homicide by interference with an official traffic-control device or railroad sign or signal is punishable under § 40-6-396. See MOTOR VEHICLE CRIMES.

H. Homicide by Vessel

The offenses of homicide by vessel in the first degree and in the second degree are punishable under § 52-7-12.2. See WATER-RELATED CRIMES.

I. Feticide by Vessel

The offenses of feticide by vessel in the first degree and in the second degree are punishable under § 52-7-

12.3. See WATER-RELATED CRIMES.

J. Homicide by Aircraft

The offense of homicide by aircraft is punishable under § 6-2-5.2. See AVIATION CRIMES.

K. Homicide by Perjury

Section 16-10-70 provides that those who cause death by their perjury are subject to enhanced punishment under the perjury statute. For further analysis of the perjury statutes, see PERJURY AND RELATED CRIMES.

IMPEDING ARREST OR PROSECUTION

See also LAW ENFORCEMENT DEFENSE.

I. Generally

There are ten code sections punishing behavior that interferes with the arrest or prosecution of violators of the criminal law. Four of the crimes (hindering apprehension, obstructing a law enforcement officer, giving a false name, address, or birthdate, and removing the firearm, chemical spray, or baton of a law enforcement officer) concentrate on behavior before or at the arrest stage, while five other crimes (compounding a crime, tampering with evidence, attempting to murder or threatening a witness in an official proceeding, intimidating a witness in an official proceeding, and intimidating a juror or court officer) are more likely to occur later in the prosecution process. The last crime, false report of a crime, punishes behavior which interferes with the law enforcement process by triggering it unnecessarily.

II. Interference with Arrest

A. Hindering Apprehension or Punishment of a Criminal

Section 16-10-50 replaces and broadens the coverage of code sections in the criminal code prior to 1968. The mens rea of this felony is an intent to hinder the apprehension or punishment of a person who the actor knows or has reason to believe is either (1) a felon, (2) an escaped inmate, or (3) an escaped prisoner. There are two alternative actus reus elements, either of which will suffice for conviction. The actor must either (1) harbor or conceal the felon, inmate, or prisoner or (2) conceal or destroy evidence of the crime committed by such a person. The latter actus reus is similar to the actus reus of § 16-10-94, which makes it a misdemeanor to tamper with evidence. The latter statute punishes those who destroy, alter, conceal, or disguise evidence or make, devise, prepare, or plant false evidence.

Once a person has concealed the evidence of a crime with the intent of protecting himself and another from punishment, the crime of hindering the apprehension of a criminal is complete. The fact that the person later reveals to the police the place where the evidence is concealed does not result in the abandonment of the crime. Thus, the defense of abandonment is not available to this person.

Section 16-10-50 has not been utilized to any great extent since its enactment in 1968 as part of the revised criminal code. One decision involved a prosecution for armed robbery in which one of the defendants complained that the testimony of a state witness who had harbored him after flight from the scene would require corroboration, it being the testimony of an accomplice. The court rejected the defense argument, pointing out that § 16-10-50 is designed to punish those formerly known as accessories after the fact and that such individuals are not parties to the crime under § 16-2-20 of the current code. Under this statutory scheme, one may not be convicted as a party to the crime and also be convicted as an accessory after the fact. Thus, where one has been convicted as a party to the crime, his conviction for hindering the apprehension of a criminal must be set aside.

A predecessor statute to § 16-10-50 was upheld in one case against a charge of unconstitutional vagueness and was held in another case to cover the situation where the defendant had actual knowledge of facts which would give him good reason to believe that the person harbored was guilty of a crime. Although the latter holding was perhaps questionable in light of the language of the prior statute which required the defendant to "know" the harbored person to be guilty, the present statute would clearly authorize the same result. It punishes those who hinder the apprehension of those they "know" or have "reasonable grounds to believe" are guilty of a felony or are escaped inmates or prisoners. This mens rea permits conviction not only for intentional activity but also for negligent activity.

Section 16-10-50, which is punishable by one to five years' imprisonment, can be seen as punishing a subset of the behavior covered by the crime of obstruction of law enforcement officers (§ 16-10-24(a)). It seems clear that an individual could not be convicted of violating both § 16-10-50 and § 16-10-24(a) on the basis of the same acts and that § 16-10-24(a) would be a lesser included offense of § 16-10-50 in that any violation of the latter statute would necessarily be a violation of the former. It should be noted that a violation of § 16-10-24(a) is punishable as a misdemeanor.

B. Giving False Name, Address, or Birthdate to Law Enforcement Officers

1. Generally

The drafters of the 1968 criminal code added § 16-10-25 to the criminal law of Georgia, promising that it would "greatly aid law enforcement." This statute makes it a misdemeanor to give a false name, address, or birthdate to a law enforcement officer who is in the lawful discharge of his official duties with the intent to mislead the officer. This statute is not written in terms of misleading only law enforcement officers of this state. It applies to any law enforcement officer. There is no requirement in the statute that the false name be given to any particular officer. Thus, there would be no fatal variance in a case where the indictment names one officer, but the evidence shows that another officer was given the false name.

It is uncertain what the purpose of this statute is since it covers behavior all of which could be punishable under § 16-10-24(a), obstruction of law enforcement officers, and since it punishes that behavior as a misdemeanor, as does § 16-10-24(a). A 1975 case, for example, held that giving an arresting officer a false name was a violation of § 16-10-24.

2. Proof of Defendant's Real Name

There must be some evidence that the name given in the subject incident was false. Generally this is established by some proof of the defendant's real name. In Agony v. State, the court held that the evidence did not establish that the name given in this incident was false as opposed to the names in the prior incidents being false. The evidence simply established that on three different occasions the defendant had given different names to a law enforcement officer. It did not support even an inference that the defendant gave a false name to a law enforcement officer on this occasion rather than on prior occasions. No other evidence of identification, such as a driver's license, and no testimony of anyone familiar with the defendant's real name was presented. As the state failed to present sufficient evidence to find the defendant guilty beyond a reasonable doubt of giving a false name, the defendant's conviction had to be reversed.

3. Lawful Discharge of Official Duties

In order to establish a violation of § 16-10-25, the evidence must show that the law enforcement officer was acting lawfully in the discharge of his official duties. In Scott v. State, the court addressed the content of the lawful duties of a law enforcement officer. In this case, the defendants were charged with giving a false name to a police officer who had arrested them for a misdemeanor. The court held that since the policeman had not witnessed the misdemeanor, the arrest would have been unlawful and, thus, the false name would have been given to the police officer while he was acting unlawfully. The court was quick to point out, however, that the policeman would have had the right to question the defendants before the misdemeanor arrest and giving a false name during such questioning would have occurred during the policeman's lawful carrying out of his duties and, therefore, would have violated § 16-10-25. In Rajappa v. State, the court held that the police officers acted reasonably in assuming that the defendant's 15-year-old daughter had sufficient control over the premises and that the daughter's consent was sufficient to authorize their entry into the premises to conduct a warrantless search. Thus, the police officers were acting lawfully in the discharge of their duties when the defendant gave them a false name.

Where circumstances do not provide an officer with articulable suspicion that the law has been or is about to be violated, the officer's act of detaining and questioning an individual is nothing more than a police-citizen encounter outside the scope of his official police duties. In Holt v. State, the defendant's only transgression was his presence in a car with a cracked windshield which was traversing the wrong parking lot, at the wrong time. The court held that because the officer could not articulate a particularized reason for questioning the defendant, other than his sense that the defendant was "making kind of furtive movements like [he was] nervous about something," and because the officer admitted that he had no basis for believing that the defendant had engaged in, was engaging in, or was about to engage in criminal activity, the officer was not lawfully discharging his official duties when he questioned the defendant. The defendant therefore did not violate § 16-10-25 when he gave the officer a false name and date of birth, and his conviction had to be reversed. In Wynn v. State, however, the court found that the officers did not lack articulable suspicion that a violation of the law had occurred. Indeed, the facts available to the officers upon their initial approach of the defendant and discovery of the open container of beer resting in plain view provided information, satisfying a probable cause standard, that the defendant was in violation of the state's open container law. Thus, the court held that there was sufficient evidence that the officers' act of questioning the defendant was more than a consensual inquiry and was within the scope of the officers' official duties so that a jury could have determined that the defendant's use of a false name was a violation of § 16-10-25.

A law enforcement officer who has identified himself as such is not required to inform anyone to whom he speaks of the nature of his inquiry in order to be in the lawful discharge of his official duties. Thus, a defendant who gives an officer a false name but corrects his misstatement before he becomes aware of the nature of the officer's inquiry would still be guilty of the offense of giving a false name to a law enforcement officer.

4. Intent to Mislead

Whether the requisite intent to mislead is manifested by the circumstances is a question for the trier of fact. The issue to be decided is not whether the officer was actually misled but whether the defendant intended to mislead him.

The quantum of proof necessary to find an intent to mislead a law enforcement officer was at issue in Johnson v. State. In Johnson, the defendant when arrested for a traffic violation gave the officer one name and then gave another the following day. The defendant claimed that he used both names on occasion, but admitted that the name first given did not appear on his birth certificate, social security card, or previous driver's license. The court upheld the conviction. This was the only evidence which was before the court and the court's affirmance here indicates that the mere commission of the prohibited act probably will be enough for a finding of the prohibited mens rea. A similar situation arose in Rajappa v. State. In Rajappa, the question was whether the defendant could be guilty of giving a false name when by custom of her native country she had two last names and when the name she gave to the police was one of those names. The court held that there was ample evidence from which the trial court could have concluded that the defendant intended to deceive the police by giving that name. Evidence of the defendant's educational background indicated that she was familiar with the customs of the United States. Also, the police officers testified that the defendant identified herself as "Mini Venkateswara" but later showed them a driver's license bearing the name "Padmini Rajappa" and admitted that was her name.

In Grisson v. State, the court held that the officer's testimony was sufficient to establish the fact that the defendant, when stopped at a license/insurance card checkpoint, did not produce a valid driver's license but instead gave a false name and date of birth. The criminal intent to mislead the officer as to the defendant's identity could have been inferred from the documentary evidence indicating that the defendant personally received notice that his driver's license and driving privileges had been revoked in Georgia for a minimum of five years.

5. Admissibility of Evidence

The giving of a false name to a law enforcement officer during the investigation of a crime is evidence which indicates a consciousness of guilt on the part of the defendant and is admissible against him. Also, the giving of a false name to a law enforcement officer at the time of arrest is admissible as evidence regarding the circumstances of the defendant's arrest.

Asking for a person's name and birthdate during the process of an arrest is not reasonably likely to elicit a response which incriminates one in the commission of a crime and, therefore, is not interrogation. No Miranda warnings are necessary in this situation. Thus, the failure to provide Miranda warnings would not render an officer's testimony about the defendant's giving a false name and birthdate inadmissible.

6. Probable Cause for Arrest

A suspect's failure to accurately repeat his birthday and social security number is sufficient evidence of a false identity as to provide probable cause for his arrest.

7. Relationship to Other Offenses

Important Notice about Repudiation of Actual or Same Evidence Test: The Georgia Supreme Court repudiated the actual evidence test in Drinkard v. Walker, 281 Ga. 211, 636 S.E.2d 530 (2006), because it found this test to be inconsistent with the statutory framework governing the prohibition against multiple convictions for included offenses in Georgia. This inconsistency resulted in years of confusion and unpredictable results. In its place, the court adopted the required evidence test and overruled any prior case law that is inconsistent with it. Thus, any prior case law applying the actual evidence test is no longer controlling and should not be relied upon to determine whether one offense is included in another under § 16-1-6(1). The discussion of such case law is included below only insofar as it may still be applicable to pending prosecutions that arose before the Drinkard decision. See MULTIPLE CONVICTIONS, II. Tests to Determine Presence of Multiple Convictions, for a complete discussion of the Drinkard decision.

While the offense of giving a false name requires that the fraud be perpetrated against a law enforcement officer, the offense of forgery in the first degree does not. Also, a forgery has to involve a writing, while giving a false name does not. As such, the two offenses do not merge as a matter of law. Furthermore, where the forgery is completed long before the defendant ever gives his false name to a law enforcement officer, the two offenses do not merge as a matter of fact.

C. Obstruction of Law Enforcement Officers

1. Generally

The criminal statutes prior to 1968 dealt with obstruction of an officer serving legal process and executing a sentence. These statutes were replaced in 1968 by a criminal statute that prohibited the knowing and willful obstruction or hindrance of a law enforcement officer in the lawful discharge of his official duties. This offense was punishable as misdemeanor.

In 1986, this statute was stricken and replaced by the current criminal statute. The current statute establishes two different grades of the offense of obstruction: misdemeanor obstruction and felony obstruction. If the obstruction or hindrance of an officer neither offers nor does violence to his person, it is punishable as a misdemeanor. If the resistance, obstruction, or opposition offers or does violence to his person, it is punishable as a felony by imprisonment for not less than one nor more than five years.

A jury charge that the definition of misdemeanor obstruction is identical to felony obstruction except that "misdemeanor obstruction is not offering to do violence, but simply resisting arrest" communicates all the elements of misdemeanor obstruction in a manner not likely to mislead a jury. However, the better practice would be to charge fully on both misdemeanor and felony obstruction.

2. Mens Rea

The mens rea for both misdemeanor and felony obstruction is knowing and willful action. Because the statutory mens rea requires knowing and willful activity, it is apparent that the individual who obstructs a policeman without knowledge of his status is not guilty of a violation of § 16-10-24. Very few cases presenting this fact situation under § 16-10-24 have been identified, however. This may be because other criminal sanctions exist with penalties just as severe. For example, simple assault or simple battery would normally be present in many of these situations. In a case which does not include such an actus reus, however, it would seem that the defendant who was hindering or obstructing the law enforcement officer without knowledge of his status would not be guilty of obstruction.

The willfulness of the defendant's actions can be established by presenting evidence of similar instances of crimes against police officers. Such evidence has been held to be admissible to show the defendant's motive, intent, and bent of mind, and to show that this is a typical way in which the defendant deals with the police.

3. Actus Reus

a. Means of Obstruction

The effectiveness of the pre-1968 obstruction statute, which defined its actus reus in terms of "obstruct, resist, or oppose," was diminished by the fact that it failed to specify the means of obstruction. The courts confined the statute's application to assaults, thus rendering the statute largely superfluous. As early as 1886, the Georgia courts interpreted that statute as requiring the use or threatened use of force. In McBride v. State, the court held that the statute required the use or threatened use of force together with the ability and the apparent intent to carry such threat into effect.

The 1968 obstruction statute, which defined its actus reus in terms of "obstructs or hinders," likewise failed to specify the means of obstruction. However, the drafters of the statute did state that the statute covered "the obstruction of law enforcement in general by the use of violence, threat of violence, or other unlawful means." In Samples v. State, the court held that the 1968 statute required proof of "forcible" resistance or opposition to the officer in the performance of his duties.

In 1986, the 1968 obstruction statute was stricken and replaced by the current statute, which establishes two different grades of the offense: misdemeanor obstruction and felony obstruction. The actus reus of misdemeanor obstruction is essentially the same as the 1968 statute. However, the misdemeanor obstruction provision does not require proof of "force" or "violence" in order to secure a conviction. This requirement is contained only in the felony obstruction provision. A conviction for felony obstruction requires proof that the defendant offered or did "violence" to the person of an officer. Thus, under the current statute, the actus reus for misdemeanor obstruction is the obstruction or hindrance of a law enforcement officer in the lawful discharge of his official duties other than by offering or doing violence to his person. Argument, flight, stubborn obstinance, and lying are all examples of conduct that may satisfy the obstruction element. The actus reus for felony obstruction is the resistance, obstruction, or opposition of any statutorily protected officer in the lawful discharge of his official duties by offering or doing violence to his person. Injury of the officer is not an element of felony obstruction.

Since the offense of misdemeanor obstruction does not contain the element of "violence" (as does the offense of felony obstruction), any allegations regarding the means by which a defendant committed violence on a police officer are unnecessary with regard to a conviction for misdemeanor obstruction and need not be proved.

Where an indictment alleges that the offense of felony obstruction was committed by "using loud and profane language and by fighting [the] officer," the state is not required to prove that the defendant physically fought with the officer. Since the word "fighting" denotes not only a physical struggle but also a verbal disagreement, it is enough for the state to show that the defendant verbally threatened the officer and acted in opposition to his authority.

Where an accusation charges the defendant with obstruction by interfering with the execution of a warrant but the defendant is convicted of obstruction by interfering with the officers' reverse sting operation, there would be no fatal variance between the accusation and the proof at trial where there is evidence that the execution of the search warrant and the sting operation occurred simultaneously.

The determination of the content of the actus reus requirement of the obstruction statute has been a fruitful source of case law. The case law indicates that the statute clearly covers verbal exchanges. Threats and abusive language which hinder or obstruct the officer in the lawful discharge of his official duties would constitute misdemeanor obstruction, while threats of violence would constitute felony obstruction. Where the offense is grounded on a verbal exchange, it is for the jury to determine whether the speech must reasonably be interpreted as a threat of violence constituting the offense of felony obstruction.

A threat of future violence, by itself, could constitute felony obstruction. However, an obstruction conviction cannot stand where there is no evidence that such threats obstructed the officer's completion of his law enforcement duties.

Other obstruction convictions have been affirmed (1) where there were repeated attempts to come onto the premises where policemen were attempting to execute a search warrant; (2) where the defendant, after being instructed by an officer not to do so, informed a third party of the presence of police and warned him not to go into a home where officers were conducting a search and a reverse sting operation; (3) where the defendant returned to the scene of a fatal shooting after being told by officers on several occasions to leave the scene; (4) where the defendant gave false information to the police officer trying to serve a warrant on another person; (5) where the defendant gave false information to a booking officer; (6) where the defendant refused to be fingerprinted; (7) where the defendant willfully refused to obey an officer; (8) where the defendant refused to remain at an alleged crime scene pending a brief official police investigation; (9) where the defendant did not respond at all to the officer's orders and forced the officer to get a warrant in an effort to effectuate his arrest; (10) where the defendant refused to provide the officer with identification; (11) where the defendant ignored repeated requests by the officer to produce her driver's license; (12) where by his statements and actions the defendant deliberately misled the officer into mistaking him for his brother; (13) where the defendant spit on the officer while refusing to identify himself; (14) where an inmate refused to enter his cell and hit a correctional officer; (15) where the defendant purposefully kicked and attempted to bite officers as they were assisting in an investigation; (16) where the defendant, when an officer began to frisk him, struck the officer in the chest and violently resisted the officer's attempt to subdue him; (17) where the defendant attacked an officer, who was attempting to escort the defendant's companion away from a bar, by tackling him from behind and driving him into a door resulting in an injury to his hand; (18) where the defendant pushed an officer attempting to take him into custody and ran away from the officer; (19) where the defendant violently resisted arrest for violating a city ordinance against disorderly conduct; (20) where the defendant shouted and cursed so that an officer could not hear what a spouse was saying concerning a domestic disturbance; (21) where the defendant hid or destroyed evidence; (22) where the defendant backed her vehicle into the officer's patrol car; and (23) where the defendant fled on foot from an officer. The holding in this last case is limited by the fact that an obstruction conviction for flight cannot be upheld if there is evidence that the defendant halted when ordered to do so or if there is no evidence that the pursuing officer, in a show of lawful authority, ordered the defendant to halt. A mere verbal exchange, boldly obnoxious and contemptuous conduct, a failure to provide identification of a person sought by the police, a mere refusal to give one's name to an officer, and a failure to respond immediately to an officer do not constitute violations of the statute.

Some of the above holdings must be reviewed in light of the United States Supreme Court decision in City of Houston v. Hill. There the United States Supreme Court found a municipal ordinance, which provided that it was "unlawful for any person to . . . in any manner oppose, molest, abuse or interrupt any policeman in the execution of his duty," to be substantially overbroad in that it prohibited willful and intentional verbal interruptions of police officers. The court stated that the freedom of individuals verbally to oppose or challenge police action without thereby risking arrest is one of the principal characteristics which distinguishes a free nation from a police state. The court's holding reflects the constitutional requirement that, in the face of verbal challenges to police action, officers and municipalities must respond with restraint. However, the decision does not leave municipalities powerless to punish physical obstruction of police action.

It is unnecessary for the state to prove that the defendant is guilty of the underlying crime that caused the officer to act in order to prove him guilty of obstruction of the officer.

An instruction on a specific means of obstruction, even though abstractly correct, should not be given to the jury unless authorized by the evidence. An unauthorized instruction could allow the jury to find the defendant guilty of the crime of obstruction under a theory unsupported by the evidence. When such an instruction is given, if it should be confusing or misleading to the jury, a new trial will be required.

Even if the trial court instructs the jury on both means of committing felony obstruction under the statute, any error in doing so would be harmless if the trial court gives a curative instruction which clearly limits the jury's consideration to the means alleged in the indictment.

b. Law Enforcement Officer

Proof that the law enforcement officer is certified is not an essential element of the offense. In Dennis v. State, one of the arresting officers had just completed his basic training course at the police academy and was a sworn reserve officer with arrest powers. The court held that this evidence was sufficient to show that the officer was a "law enforcement officer" within the meaning of the statute.

c. Lawful Discharge of Official Duties

While many of § 16-10-24 cases are those in which the defendant is charged with resisting an officer's attempt to arrest him, interference with the lawful discharge of any of the law enforcement official's duties will constitute a violation of the statute. Thus, in Allen v. State, the court upheld a conviction of a bouncer who interfered with the entrance of a sheriff into a private club when the sheriff was trying to deliver a permit to the club's owner. Likewise, in Mason v. State, a third party's interference with attempts to serve a warrant was held to be within the statute's proscription. In Banks v. State, the court held that the retrieval and preservation of evidence was within the lawful discharge of an officer's duties and that an attack on an officer performing such a duty constituted a violation of the statute. In Vaughn v. State, the court held that an officer trying to investigate a complaint of domestic violence and to ensure that everything was all right at a house was within the lawful discharge of his duties and that the defendant's actions in resisting arrest constituted obstruction of an officer. In Walker v. State, the court held that an officer who responded to a domestic dispute call was acting in the lawful discharge of his duties when he, because of his concern for the safety of himself and the victim, attempted to search the defendant for weapons. A law enforcement officer is authorized to conduct a pat-down search of an individual when he reasonably believes him to be armed or otherwise dangerous to the officer or others. Evidence of the defendant's failure to comply with the officer's attempt to search him was sufficient to authorize his conviction for obstruction. In Animashaun v. State, the court held that an officer, who was present at an apartment for the purpose of avoiding a confrontation between a husband and wife when the wife returned to the apartment to retrieve her possessions, was in the lawful discharge of his official duty when the husband interfered with the officer's attempt to maintain the peace.

In Duncan v. State, the court held that a police officer moonlighting as a bouncer was performing his lawful duties when acting as a bouncer. The court pointed out that law enforcement officials have a 24-hour duty to maintain the public peace. The court found its decision supported by strong public policy reasoning. "The presence of uniformed officers in places susceptible to breaches of the peace deters unlawful acts and conduct by patrons . . .. The public knows the uniform and the badge stand for the authority of the government."

Unless contradicted by other evidence, proof that one acted as a law enforcement officer is prima facie evidence that he was such an officer and was lawfully discharging his official duties. In Miller v. State, the officer testified that he was on duty and was lawfully discharging his duty when he attempted to reach into the arrestee's pocket to obtain his car keys so that a wrecker could pull his car from a ditch. During this attempt, the arrestee, who was sitting in the patrol car, grabbed and pulled the officer toward the car causing him to strike his head on the roof of the car. The defense did not present any evidence to contradict the officer's testimony. Thus, there was sufficient evidence to support the arrestee's conviction for felony obstruction.

Upon an individual being found guilty of a misdemeanor that contemplates imprisonment, law enforcement officials possess the duty and power to contain that individual for the purposes of carrying out the sentence. In Scott v. State, the court held that once the defendant refused to pay a fine for a traffic violation, the officers were authorized to carry out the alternative sentence of a jail term. The officers' attempts to restrain the defendant were simply a function of their continuing duty to control a person arrested, tried, and sentenced under the law. The evidence therefore supported the conclusion that the officers were acting pursuant to an official duty.

A question may arise as to the validity of resistance or obstruction of an attempt to serve process, such as a writ of possession, which is invalid. It has been stated as a matter of general law that resisting process valid on its face is illegal obstruction of law enforcement, even where there might be some underlying illegality not apparent from the face of the document. Conversely, it has been held that resisting or obstructing process which is patently void is not a crime. The purpose of these two rules is to adjust the tension between two public policies: one which favors the protection of law enforcement officials in the performance of their jobs and one which favors the protection of private citizens from illegal intrusions on their privacy and/or liberty.

The only Georgia authority in this area seems to prefer the latter policy to the former. In Searcy v. State, the court reversed an obstruction conviction because the affidavit upon which the fieri facias was based was insufficient. There is no indication that this irregularity appeared on the face of the process being served. In Gibson v. State, although the court held valid an indictment for obstruction of justice, it pointed out that evidence of a procedural failure in issuing the writ which had been resisted would be admissible at trial, implying that if the issuing magistrate had failed to require the plaintiff to post bond, resistance to the writ would not be criminal. In both of these cases, now over ninety years old, the court indicated that nonapparent irregularities in the process would justify resistance or obstruction. These cases, however, predate the current statute which seems to limit the private citizen's right to interfere with the work of law enforcement officials. A court, when confronted by Searcy and Gibson, might find them inconsistent with the current statute's broadening of the crime of obstruction.

One of the most important of a law enforcement official's duties is that of arresting violators of the law. The question of when a policeman is acting within his duty and the consequences of his acting outside it is thus a very important question under § 16-10-24. A defendant who is arrested by a law enforcement official and charged with obstruction of that arrest under § 16-10-24 may very well claim that the official's behavior placed him beyond the scope of his official duties and that the resistance was, therefore, justified. The standard for determining whether an officer was lawfully discharging his duties such that an individual's conduct would constitute obstruction is whether a reasonable suspicion existed to stop the individual charged with obstruction.

In Brown v. State, the court upheld a conviction for impeding arrest where the arresting officer was in hot pursuit of an arrestee who fled from the street into the defendant's house. Citing United States Supreme Court authority, the court held that a suspect cannot defeat a lawful arrest in public by fleeing into a private home. Thus, the pursuing officer was lawfully performing his duty to arrest, and the trial judge's refusal to instruct the jury concerning the presence of "exigent circumstances" was not erroneous.

In Animashaun v. State, the court upheld the defendant's conviction for felony obstruction, even though the officers' entry into the defendant's apartment was without a warrant. The defendant's wife willingly gave the officers her key to the apartment. At that point in time, she still possessed common authority over the premises, and the officers' entry based upon her consent was authorized.

In Brown v. State, the court concluded that the arresting officers were engaged in the lawful discharge of their official duties even though they did not have a search warrant, there were no exigent circumstances, and there was no evidence of the homeowner's proper consent allowing them to enter his home to arrest a probation violator who did not reside there. The court found that the officers had probable cause and a warrant for the violator's arrest. This gave the officers the authority to enter the third person's home to execute the arrest warrant.

In Strickland v. State, the officer not only had probable cause to arrest the defendant for obstructing the Emergency Medical Technicians (EMTs), the defendant's continued interference with the EMTs' attempt to fulfill their duty and examine the still-unattended poison victim was an exigent circumstance that would have justified the officer's entry onto private property without a warrant. The evidence showed the officer was in the lawful pursuit of his duty when the defendant offered to do violence to his person.

In Sanders v. State, the court held that probable cause existed to stop the driver of a vehicle and make a warrantless arrest of him for driving too fast for conditions. The jury was authorized to infer that the defendant as passenger knew that a police officer was attempting to perform his official duty of arresting the driver, and to find that the defendant by fleeing deliberately took action to delay, hamper or impede the officer in the performance of this duty.

In In Interest of C. W., the officer had been told by a subdivision resident that the juvenile was driving his go-cart in a dangerous manner and on private yards, which his own observations in part confirmed. When the officer attempted to stop the juvenile by signaling him with his siren so he could investigate and give a warning, the juvenile unlawfully fled. The court held that from that point, the officer was justified in apprehending the juvenile and was lawfully discharging his duties when the juvenile threatened him.

In Norman v. State, the court held that the defendant's failure to stop running after the detective identified himself as a police officer and yelled stop several times and the defendant's continued struggling with the detective after he was detained provided the probable cause for his arrest for obstruction.

In Singleton v. State, the court held that the officers were in the lawful discharge of their duties when they responded to a disorderly person call and when a radio transmission, which confirmed the outstanding warrants, established the necessary probable cause to arrest the defendant.

In Dennis v. State, the evidence showed that before the officers confronted the defendant, they had probable cause to believe he had committed battery on his wife. The court held that because the officers were acting in the lawful discharge of their duties during the incident, the defendant's resistance constituted obstruction.

In Hall v. State, the court held that the officer was acting in the lawful discharge of his official duties when he stopped the defendant's vehicle for the offense of driving an improperly equipped vehicle.

In Reagin v. State, the court held that the officer had probable cause to believe that the defendant had been driving while under the influence. The officer saw the defendant sitting in a parked car drinking from a can. The defendant attempted to conceal the can as the officer approached his car. The officer had direct knowledge of the defendant's apparent intoxication and had been told by the defendant that he drove to the rest stop only 15 minutes before the officer's arrival. It was immaterial to the legality of the arrest that the defendant was acquitted of the charge of driving under the influence. Evidence of the defendant's physical resistance to his arrest was sufficient to authorize his conviction for obstruction.

In Williams v. State, the court held that there was ample evidence from which a rational trier of fact could have concluded that the officer had probable cause to arrest the defendant for being drunk in public and to find beyond a reasonable doubt that he was guilty of misdemeanor obstruction. The fact that the trial court granted a directed verdict of acquittal as to the charge of public drunk was immaterial to the officer's probable cause to arrest the defendant.

A dispatcher who reports a crime at a specified location gives police an articulable suspicion to investigate and detain individuals at the scene, particularly where police observations on arriving at the scene corroborate the dispatcher's report. Thus, in Overand v. State, the court held that the evidence sustained a finding of an articulable suspicion. Police observations of a white female arguing vigorously with a white male in the driveway of the reported crime scene corroborated the information received from the dispatcher. While demanding that the female stay, police also discovered a pistol, further corroborating the dispatcher's report. Thus, since the police had an articulable suspicion to detain and question the female suspect, they were in the lawful discharge of their official duties when she refused to remain at the crime scene.

In Wynn v. State, the court found that the officers did not lack articulable suspicion that a violation of the law had occurred. Indeed, the facts available to the officers upon their initial approach of the defendant and discovery of the open container of beer resting in plain view provided information, satisfying a probable cause standard, that the defendant was in violation of the state's open container law. Thus, the court held that there was sufficient evidence that the officers' act of questioning the defendant was more than a consensual inquiry and was within the scope of the officers' official duties so that a jury was authorized to conclude that the lawful discharge of official duties element of felony obstruction had been proven beyond a reasonable doubt.

In Youhoing v. State, the court held that through the use of his senses and based on his conversation with the defendant, examination of her license, and the location of her car in a fire lane in front of a fast-food restaurant, the officer easily gained the personal knowledge and probable cause necessary to initiate an arrest. Due to the general exigencies involving the transient motoring public, no warrant was required for the arrest to be lawful. The officer's decision to implement a full custodial arrest, rather than a non-custodial arrest by issuing a citation, was lawful and authorized. Thus, evidence that the defendant intentionally hindered the officer by her actions when he attempted to place her under custodial arrest was sufficient to support her conviction for misdemeanor obstruction.

Where circumstances do not provide an officer with articulable suspicion that the law has been or is about to be violated, the officer's act of stopping an individual is nothing more than a police-citizen encounter outside the scope of his official police duties. In In Interest of J.T., the court initially held that because the state failed to prove the existence of the local ordinance against loitering in a known drug area, it was unable to show that the officer was in the lawful discharge of his official duties the first time he tried to stop the juvenile. The court also found that during the officer's three encounters with the juvenile, he never had any particular and objective reason to suspect the juvenile of criminal activity. Because the officer had no lawful basis for stopping the juvenile, even briefly, the court held that the juvenile did not obstruct the officer by refusing to stop.

4. Right to Resist Illegal Arrest or Excessive Force Arrest

a. Common Law Right to Resist

The right to resist forcibly an arrest which is unlawful because there is no arrest warrant when a warrant is needed or there is no probable cause was established in the English common law by 1710 and carried over to the United States. Some jurisdictions have modified this right, and the Model Penal Code advocates its total abolition on the grounds that such resistance by an arrestee is usually futile and often dangerous and that the issue of an arrest's legality is better left to resolution in later court proceedings.

An arrest is not unlawful within the common law right to resist, if the arrest is authorized by statute, even though the statute may later be declared unconstitutional. In Johnson v. State, the court held that the fact that the state was barred from securing the defendant's conviction for disorderly conduct, because the disorderly conduct statute was subsequently declared unconstitutional, was immaterial to the defendant's guilt for obstruction of the law enforcement officer. It was the legality of the defendant's arrest for disorderly conduct, not his actual conviction for disorderly conduct, that was material to his guilt for obstruction of the law enforcement officer. Thus, the defendant did not have the legal right to resist his arrest, and his motion for a directed verdict of acquittal on the obstruction charge was properly denied.

b. Lack of Probable Cause to Arrest

Because an officer making an arrest without probable cause is not lawfully discharging his official duties, physical resistance to such an arrest is not a violation of § 16-10-24. In Wagner v. State, there was no evidence that the defendant was unruly or threatened to breach the peace or even that the officer thought he was drunk. The defendant's sole offense was to refuse to give his name. The court held that this mere refusal was not probable cause for arrest. Thus, the arrest was unlawful and the defendant's physical resistance to the arrest did not violate the statute. In Brooks v. State, the evidence showed that at the moment the officers decided to seize the defendant, the facts and circumstances within the knowledge of the officers and of which they had reasonable trustworthy information were not sufficient to warrant a prudent man to believe that the defendant had committed an offense. As the officers lacked probable cause or articulable suspicion such as would have authorized the seizure, the defendant was entitled to resist the unlawful arrest by attempting to "push through" an officer to effect his escape. Since the evidence showed that the officer was not in the lawful discharge of his official duties, the defendant's conviction for obstruction was not authorized. In Woodward v. State, there was no evidence that the defendant presented a security threat, that it was unlawful for her to be in the building housing the sheriff's department, or that anyone had instructed her not to enter the second floor. A belligerent telephone call earlier in the day, without more, was not disorderly conduct and did not constitute probable cause for an arrest. As there was no evidence that the deputy was in the lawful discharge of his duties when he arrested the defendant, she had the right to resist with all force necessary for that purpose, and her conviction for felony obstruction was not authorized. In Land v. State, considering that all evidence of the contraband found in the defendant's house should have been suppressed and that the detectives gained entry to the house using an invalid search warrant, the court concluded that there was no proof that the officers were authorized to arrest the defendant. Without such evidence, the state could not establish that the detectives were lawfully discharging their official duties. Accordingly, the defendant's conviction for the offense of obstruction of a law enforcement officer was not authorized by the evidence.

In State v. Ealum, the state could not show that the defendants committed a new crime in the presence of law enforcement officers sufficient to purge the taint of the officers' prior unlawful entry into the trailer. Since the officers in the case were not lawfully discharging their duties at the time of the defendants' alleged obstructing behavior, obstruction charges would not properly lie against the defendants. Thus, the court upheld that trial court's granting of the defendants motion to suppress all tangible physical evidence, statements, and testimony resulting from the unlawful entry into their trailer.

c. Limitations on Amount Force Used to Resist Arrest

A related, although separate, question which might arise in a § 16-10-24 prosecution would be resistance to a lawful arrest which is being effectuated through the use of excessive force. In this situation, the general rule is that reasonable force may be used by the arrestee to thwart such force by the arresting officer.

The right of an arrestee to resist forcibly an illegal arrest was announced in Georgia in 1892. In Thomas v. State, the court indicated that shooting at a police officer making an illegal arrest would not be murder, but only manslaughter, presumably because this response by the arrestee was a lawful act (resistance) performed in an unlawful manner (killing). Thomas, thus, established two principles: (1) forcible resistance of an illegal arrest is permitted, and (2) there are limits to the amount of force permissible. The precise scope of the amount of force permissible was described by the Georgia Supreme Court in Perdue v. State, as "force sufficient to prevent the consummation of the arrest." Perdue suggested that even deadly force could be used in such a situation, but that it must await the use of "greater force" by the arresting officer. Taken together, Thomas and Perdue seem to indicate that an ordinary arrest could be resisted by ordinary force and an arrest being carried out with deadly force could be resisted with deadly force.

As for a lawful arrest made with an excessive use of force, the Georgia cases support the rule that such excessive force can be resisted by proportionate force and will not be seen as an obstruction of officers. In Mullis v. State, the court held that an arrestee would be justified in killing an arresting officer who used excessive force in effectuating a lawful (or unlawful) arrest. In describing such excessive force, the court mentioned unprovoked assaults with deadly weapons which were, or could reasonably be seen by the arrestee to be, intended to kill the arrestee. It should be stressed that in such a situation the killing would not be merely reduced from murder to manslaughter, but totally justified. This result is totally consistent with, and can be viewed as part of, the law of self-defense. To the extent that the policeman's force is excessive it is illegal and can be defended against.

It is axiomatic that neither the right to resist an unlawful arrest nor the right to resist an excessive force arrest is a license to act without restraint. The defendant must actually have been acting to resist the arrest and cannot later use the fact of the illegal or excessive force arrest as an excuse for striking the officer. As the court wrote in Napper v. State, "the rule applies only in those cases where the attack upon the officer is, as a matter of fact and not merely as a theory, made in defense of one's liberty . . . ."

d. Jury Instructions

The right to resist forcibly an illegal arrest was reiterated by the Court of Appeals in Brooks v. State. The Brooks court, however, seemed to be placing new restrictions on the right. In Brooks, the defendant was being arrested and grabbed for the officer's gun. He claimed, as a defense to simple assault, that he was resisting an illegal arrest. The court rejected the defendant's claim of an entitlement to an instruction on the right to resist an illegal arrest on the grounds that an arrestee can never assault an officer unless the officer has first assaulted him within the meaning of § 16-5-20, the simple assault statute.

The Brooks court held that since the officer had not placed the defendant in "reasonable apprehension of immediately receiving a violent injury," in the language of § 16-5-20(a)(2), the failure to instruct on the right to resist an illegal arrest was not error. This case appears to be in direct contradiction to an earlier case which described an illegal arrest itself as an assault justifying the use of force to prevent the completion of the arrest. In many situations, the Brooks rule will be satisfied in that the defendant will be able to demonstrate fear of violent injury at the hands of the police officer, but to the extent that a Brooks-type assault by the police officer is not present, the holding serves to limit the traditional right to resist forcibly an illegal arrest. To this extent, the Georgia courts may have been influenced by those urging limitation of the traditional right.

In Williams v. State, the court held that where the defendant testified that he struck the officer in defense of his wife, not in resistance to an unlawful arrest, it was not error for the trial court to charge the jury that it was not to consider the legality or illegality of the defendant's arrest. Nor did the trial court err in preventing defense counsel from arguing the "illegality" of the arrest.

An arrest is not unlawful within the common law right to resist if the officer has probable cause to make the arrest. In Cordis v. State, the court held that the evidence provided the requisite probable cause to arrest. The officer had seen the defendant drive around the restaurant and, upon questioning him, observed the odor of alcoholic beverages, an open container, slurred speech, bloodshot eyes, and balance problems. The defendant's subsequent acquittal on the DUI and open container charges was irrelevant to the probable cause issue. Thus, an instruction on the right to resist an unlawful arrest was not authorized by the evidence.

If the defendant has made no showing that an unlawful or illegal arrest had taken place, he would not be entitled to a charge on the right to resist an unlawful or illegal arrest by the use of force. Furthermore, if there is no evidence to support a charge on the right to resist unlawful force used in making a legal arrest, the defendant would not be entitled to such a charge.

Where an offense has been committed in the presence or within the immediate knowledge of a private person, he would be authorized by law to arrest the offender, and the offender would not be legally permitted to resist the arrest. Under these circumstances, jury instructions regarding an unlawful arrest by a private person and the offender's right to use force to resist such an unlawful arrest would not be authorized.

5. Right to Resist Allegedly Improper Sentence

When an individual has been tried, convicted, and in the process of satisfying the court's judgment, he cannot plead an allegedly improper sentence as justification for obstruction of an officer attempting to carry out the sentence imposed by the court. At that stage of the judicial process, the proper course of action is the employment of the appeals process to correct the error rather than resorting to physical resistance.

6. Defenses

Even if the defendant made an effort to get away, and not to stand and fight, this is no defense to a felony obstruction charge.

The alleged unlawfulness of the defendant's arrest is not an affirmative defense to an obstruction charge. An affirmative defense requires that the defendant admit the crime in order to raise the defense. By alleging that the arrest was unlawful, the defendant is not admitting the crime of obstruction but is asserting that the state has failed to prove an essential element of that crime. If the jury were to determine that the arrest was unlawful, it would be required to acquit the defendant because of the state's failure to prove an essential element, not because the defendant's resistance was justified. Thus, where the trial court has properly instructed the jury on the essential elements of the crime of obstruction and on the state's burden of proving each element beyond a reasonable doubt, it is not required to give the additional, requested instruction on a person's right to resist an unlawful arrest.

7. Admissibility of Evidence

Documents involving internal affairs investigations of the arresting officer, his personnel evaluations, internal department memorandums, training evaluations, and other similar matters are not admissible unless the defense is attempting to impeach the officer and has made a showing that the documents contain contradictory statements previously made by the officer as to matters relevant to his testimony and to the case.

A videotape which has captured part of the physical altercation between the defendant and the officer has substantial probative value toward establishing the facts and nature of that altercation. There is no substantial danger that the defendant would be unfairly prejudiced if the videotape is shown to a jury. To the extent that the videotape does not capture the entire course of events between the defendant and the officer and does not capture the audio portion of the encounter, other forms of evidence such as oral testimony may be presented. Moreover, the jury is authorized to consider any incompleteness of the videotape in determining the amount of weight and credibility to accord it.

A prior conviction for misdemeanor obstruction, which involves neither violence nor moral turpitude, is not admissible for impeachment purposes.

When the subject matter of an inquiry relates to numerous facts perceived by the senses that cannot be adequately described and presented to the jury, a witness may state his impressions drawn from, and opinions based upon, the facts and circumstances observed by him or the effect which they produced upon his mind. This rule applies to witnesses who personally observed the events to which they are testifying and, essentially, authorizes such eyewitnesses to present a shorthand impression of those events in situations where language fails to adequately convey their observations to the jury with the same force and clearness as they appeared to the witness. This rule would not apply, however, to a witness who did not personally observe any part of the events. In Bly v. State, for instance, the Georgia Supreme Court held that the investigating officer's testimony that he thought that the arresting officer acted appropriately as a police officer in the line of duty during the traffic stop was not a shorthand rendition of fact, because it was not based on facts and circumstances observed by him. Rather, the investigating officer's testimony constituted an opinion that was based upon his second-hand assessment of the same evidence presented by the state to the jury and was therefore inadmissible.

Even assuming that expert testimony is needed to enable an average juror to understand the standard of conduct for a police officer during a traffic stop, where no evidence is introduced at trial regarding the elements and constituent factors that guide an expert to his conclusions, his testimony would not be admissible. Moreover, whether or not a police officer, according to his version of events, acted appropriately in the line of duty is a matter regarding which the jurors can make an equally intelligent judgment of their own, independently of the opinion of an expert. Accordingly, such testimony would not be admissible as expert opinion on an issue beyond the ken of the average layperson.

Finally, the investigating officer's testimony that the arresting officer acted appropriately during the traffic stop would improperly bolster the credibility of the arresting officer, the victim of the offenses for which the defendant is being tried. Considering the critical nature of the investigating officer's testimony and its potential to influence the jury, the trial court's admission of such testimony would constitute harmful error, entitling the defendant to a new trial.

8. Relationship to Other Offenses

Important Notice about Repudiation of Actual or Same Evidence Test: The Georgia Supreme Court repudiated the actual evidence test in Drinkard v. Walker, 281 Ga. 211, 636 S.E.2d 530 (2006), because it found this test to be inconsistent with the statutory framework governing the prohibition against multiple convictions for included offenses in Georgia. This inconsistency resulted in years of confusion and unpredictable results. In its place, the court adopted the required evidence test and overruled any prior case law that is inconsistent with it. Thus, any prior case law applying the actual evidence test is no longer controlling and should not be relied upon to determine whether one offense is included in another under § 16-1-6(1). The discussion of such case law is included below only insofar as it may still be applicable to pending prosecutions that arose before the Drinkard decision. See MULTIPLE CONVICTIONS, II. Tests to Determine Presence of Multiple Convictions, for a complete discussion of the Drinkard decision.

Neither obstruction of an officer nor terroristic threats is included in the other as a matter of law or fact. Obstruction of an officer requires proof of different elements not included in terroristic threats. The crimes are mutually independent and each is aimed at prohibiting specific conduct.

Simple battery is not a lesser included offense of felony obstruction of an officer. It is a separate and independent offense wherein the intent is to make physical contact or cause physical harm. Simply because the separate offense of simple battery could be prosecuted under the same set of facts that might support an obstruction conviction does not make simple battery a lesser included offense of obstruction under the law.

Where the same evidence is used to support both obstruction and aggravated battery charges, one crime is included in the other, and the defendant cannot be sentenced for both.

Where misdemeanor obstruction of an officer is a lesser included offense of the indicted offense of felony obstruction, the trial court may charge the jury as to a possible verdict of misdemeanor obstruction as a lesser included offense. Where the evidence shows completion of the greater offense of felony obstruction, it is not necessary for the trial court to charge on such lesser included offenses as misdemeanor obstruction or simple assault.

Where an indictment alleging aggravated assault on a police officer sufficiently puts the defendant on notice that he might be convicted of the lesser offense of felony obstruction of an officer and the evidence presented at trial would support such a charge, the trial court, upon written request, must charge the jury on the lesser included offense of felony obstruction. However, where there is overwhelming evidence that the defendant committed the aggravated assault, the failure to give the requested charge is harmless error.

Where the same conduct that proves aggravated assault on a police officer proves obstruction of the same officer, the two offenses merge for sentencing purposes and the defendant can be sentenced for only one.

Because the offense of leaving the scene of an accident has different elements than the offense of felony obstruction, the two offenses do not merge as a matter of law.

Where the defendant's actions were directed against individual law enforcement officers during a single confrontation, his actions constitute separate crimes which do not merge in fact or law. Because there are separate victims, it is proper for the trial court to treat the individual obstruction counts as discrete offenses for sentencing.

Under the facts presented in Gibson v. State, the Court of Appeals found that the crime of obstructing an officer was included in the crime of fleeing or attempting to elude an officer. The indictment's allegations for fleeing or attempting to elude an officer were sufficient also to satisfy the elements of the offense of obstruction. Under the facts, there was no material distinction between "willfully" disobeying the officer's order as prohibited by § 40-6-395(a) and disobeying it "knowingly and willfully" as prohibited by § 16-10-24(a). Because the defendant's testimony provided evidence satisfying the required elements of the offense of obstruction, the court held that the trial court erred in refusing to give the requested charge on obstruction as a lesser included offense. Since the evidence supporting the greater charge was in conflict, the error was not harmless. The defendant was therefore entitled to a new trial.

9. Civil Cause of Action

Section 16-10-24 sets forth a criminal penalty for knowingly obstructing or hindering police in the discharge of their official duties and does not expressly provide for a civil cause of action as a remedy for a violation. Moreover, there is nothing in the language of the statute or in the criminal statutory scheme that provides a basis to infer that the legislature intended to create an implicit civil cause of action for damages caused by violation of the statute.

D. Removal or Attempt to Remove Firearm, Chemical Spray, or Baton from Law Enforcement Officer

It is a felony for any person knowingly to remove or attempt to remove a firearm, chemical spray, or baton from the possession of a law enforcement officer who is lawfully acting within the course and scope of his employment. The prosecution must prove that the person knew or had reason to know that the law enforcement officer was employed as such. This offense is punishable by imprisonment for not less than one nor more than five years or a fine of not more than $10,000, or both.

This offense constitutes a separate offense, and a sentence may be imposed separately from and consecutive to or concurrent with a sentence for any other offense related to the act or acts establishing the removal offense.

III. Interference with Prosecution

A. Compounding a Crime

Two offenses, compounding a crime (§ 16-10-90) and tampering with evidence (§ 16-10-94), concentrate on behavior likely to occur after the institution of proceedings against a criminal defendant. Compounding a crime is derived from the common law which originally made it a felony to bargain with a thief not to prosecute or to prosecute "faintly" in order to assure his acquittal. This crime was known as theft-bote and eventually became a misdemeanor more generally encompassing the acceptance of any valuable consideration in return for an agreement not to prosecute for any offense.

Under the current Georgia statute, the crime of compounding a crime is committed when an individual accepts, after institution of criminal proceedings and without permission of the court or prosecuting attorney, any benefit in consideration of a promise not to prosecute or aid in prosecution of a criminal offense. If the offense being prosecuted is a felony, then compounding is likewise a felony, punishable by a fine of up to $1,000 and/or one to five years' imprisonment. Compounding a misdemeanor is a misdemeanor.

Case law under the predecessor statutes does exist and ought to be examined. In Stancel v. State, the defendant accepted $500 from a person alleged to have assaulted him with intent to kill. The agreement was ostensibly to settle a civil suit for damages and the only evidence of violation of the compounding statute was the fact that the defendant absented himself from the assault prosecution. The court reversed the conviction on the grounds that there must be evidence of an agreement not to prosecute and the simple failure to appear to testify was not sufficient.

The language of § 16-10-90, which punishes a promise "express or implied," may be broader than the Stancel statute and a court might find that failure to appear in court would be sufficient evidence of an implied promise. It is also important to note that there was evidence in Stancel that the defendant had been informed, during the negotiations for the $500, of the existence of the crime of compounding and insisted that this was not the purpose of the agreement.

There is also early authority that for prosecution of compounding a felony there had to be proof that the antecedent crime which was alleged to have been compounded had actually been committed. In Hays v. State, the court wrote that "[t]here could be no compounding of a crime unless there was a crime to compound." It should be noted that prosecutions for compounding a misdemeanor statute punished those who were "informing or prosecuting under pretense of any penal law." The court, in Sheppard v. State, held that such language evinced a legislative intent to punish those who were using the criminal prosecution to benefit themselves and, thus, did not require a showing that the antecedent crime had actually been committed. Section 16-10-90, which does not simply define the actus reus of the offense as "compounding the crime," as the Hays statute did, but rather defines it in terms of an agreement "not to prosecute or aid in the prosecution of a criminal offense," would appear not to require proof of the commission of the antecedent offense.

Under the current statute, it has been held that the offense of compounding a crime is separate and apart from the underlying offense and is not, per se, based upon the successful prosecution of the offense attempted to be compounded. The crucial date is the date of the consummated agreement to conceal the crime, or abstain from prosecution, or to withhold evidence. If, on that date, the underlying criminal proceedings have been instituted, and are then pending, and the unlawful agreement is reached, the offense is complete.

B. Tampering with Evidence

Destruction of evidence was a common law offense, now codified in § 16-10-94 (tampering with evidence). This was not formerly a separate offense in Georgia, but was held to be punishable under a pre-1968 statute punishing "any . . . offense against public justice." A 1970 decision held that statute to include destruction of evidence.

The mens rea of § 16-10-94 can be satisfied with any one of three alternative intents: an intent to prevent the apprehension of any person, an intent to cause the wrongful apprehension of any person, or the intent to obstruct the prosecution or defense of any person. The crime is committed when the defendant, with any one of these intents, "knowingly destroys, alters, conceals, or disguises physical evidence or makes, devises, prepares, or plants false evidence."

The defendant's destruction or alteration of evidence of a crime committed by him can be considered by a jury in order to determine the intent of the defendant to commit the crime.

It should be noted that concealment or destruction of evidence is an alternative actus reus in the crime of hindering apprehension or punishment of a criminal under § 16-10-50. The relationship between the two statutes naturally, therefore, arises. It would appear that § 16-10-94 encompasses a broader universe of behavior. While concealment or destruction is covered by § 16-10-94, many additional types of behavior are covered. Destruction of evidence of any crime is covered by § 16-10-94, while § 16-10-50 only covers destruction of evidence of a felony. It also appears that the latter statute requires a knowledge or reason to believe on the part of the defendant that a particular person has committed a crime, while § 16-10-94 would be applicable where the defendant destroyed that which he knew was evidence of a crime even when he did not know the identity of the perpetrator.

While it has not been decided in this state whether a prosecution must be initiated before § 16-10-94 can be violated, other state courts have held that it is not necessary for the prosecution already to have begun and that the offense may be committed by one having knowledge of an official investigation even before a grand jury proceeding has begun.

Any person who tampers with evidence involving the prosecution or defense of a felony and involving another person commits a felony punishable by imprisonment for not less than one nor more than three years. However, any person who tampers with evidence involving the prosecution or defense of a serious violent felony and involving another person commits a felony punishable by imprisonment for not less than one nor more than ten years. Finally, any person who tampers with evidence involving the prosecution or defense of a misdemeanor is punishable under the general misdemeanor statute.

By its own terms, § 16-10-94(a) contemplates that a person may commit the offense by tampering with evidence in his own case or in that of another person. The term "involving another person" found in § 16-10-94(c), however, refers to a third-party perpetrator of the underlying crime and thus imposes felony punishment only when a person commits the tampering offense involving the prosecution or defense of the third-party perpetrator. Thus, where the state has not presented any allegations or evidence indicating that the defendant committed the tampering offense to prevent the apprehension or prosecution of anyone other than himself, there would be no evidence to support the imposition of a felony sentence under the sentencing provisions of § 16-10-94(c). Rather, the trial court in such a case would be required to impose misdemeanor punishment for the defendant's tampering offense.

A related statute provides that any person who, with intent to conceal any material fact relating to a potential claim or cause of action, knowingly and willfully destroys, alters, or falsifies any health record shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.

C. Murder Attempts or Threats Designed to Prevent Testimony, Production of Evidence, or Communication of Information to Authorities Relating to Criminal Activities

In 1998, the General Assembly found that witness intimidation would likely always be a factor in the prosecution of cases involving criminal gang activity. Thus, it enacted a statute to prohibit such conduct. An official proceeding need not be pending or about to be instituted before a violation of the statute can be found. Under the statute, any person who attempts to kill another person, with intent to prevent (1) a person's attendance or testimony in an official proceeding; (2) the production of a record, document, or other object in an official proceeding; or (3) a person's communication of information to authorities relating to criminal activities, is guilty of a felony punishable by imprisonment for not less than ten nor more than 20 years.

Furthermore, any person who threatens, causes, or attempts to cause physical or economic harm to or threatens to damage or damages the property of another person or a member of his family or household, with the intent to hinder, delay, prevent, or dissuade any person from (1) attending or testifying in an official proceeding; (2) reporting in good faith to the authorities information relating to criminal activities; (3) arresting or seeking the arrest of another person in connection with criminal activities; or (4) causing a criminal prosecution or a probation revocation proceeding to be sought or instituted, is guilty of a felony punishable by imprisonment for not less than two years nor more than ten years or by a fine of not less than $10,000 nor more than $25,000, or both.

Any violation of this law is considered a separate offense and does not merge with any other offense.

D. Intimidation of Witnesses

In 1998, the General Assembly found that witness intimidation would likely always be a factor in the prosecution of cases involving criminal gang activity. Thus, it amended § 16-10-93 by adding a provision to prohibit such conduct. An official proceeding need not be pending or about to be instituted before a violation of the provision can be found. Under the statute, it is unlawful for any person to use intimidation, physical force, threats, corrupt persuasion, or misleading conduct for the purpose of (1) influencing, delaying, or preventing the testimony of any person in an official proceeding; (2) causing or inducing any person to withhold or destroy evidence, to evade legal process, or to be absent from the proceeding; or (3) hindering, delaying, or preventing a person's communication of information to authorities relating to criminal activities. Any person convicted of violating this law is guilty of a felony punishable by imprisonment for not less than two nor more than ten years or by a fine of not less than $10,000 nor more than $20,000, or both.

Any violation of this law is considered a separate offense and does not merge with any other offense.

E. Intimidation of, Impeding, or Injury of Jurors or Court Officers

Section 16-10-97 provides that a person, who by threat or force or by any threatening letter or communication, intimidates, impedes, or injures any grand juror, petit juror, or any court officer while in or on account of the discharge of such juror's or officer's duties, is punishable by a fine of not more than $5,000 or by imprisonment for not more than five years, or both.

The phrase "while in the discharge of such . . . officer's duties" should not be read so as to restrict the application of § 16-10-97(1) only to those threats or other attempts to intimidate or impede which occur while the case is actually pending before the court officer. Rather, the General Assembly intended by this language simply to limit the application of this paragraph to those situations which arise out of or are related to the performance of the court officer's official duties, whether the proscribed activities occur while the court officer is actively engaged on the matter giving rise to the offense or whether the proscribed activities occur at some other juncture.

A private probation officer is an officer of the court within the meaning of § 16-10-97. Protecting probation officers from intimidation and injury comports with the obvious legislative intent behind the statute, i.e., to protect the integrity of the judicial system by protecting those who occupy positions of trust, command, and authority within it.

F. False Report of Crime

The final provision which punishes interference with arrest or prosecution of a criminal offense is § 16-10-26 which makes it a misdemeanor to give a false report or cause a false report of crime to be given to a law enforcement officer or agency of the state. The behavior it punishes seems likely to be identical to that under the crime of false statements, § 16-10-20, which is a felony. A defendant who gave a false report of a crime and was prosecuted under the latter statute would, however, undoubtedly argue that where two statutes punish the same behavior, that which more specifically covers the behavior at issue is the only one which can be prosecuted. This is similar to an argument accepted by the Georgia courts that where involuntary manslaughter is committed by the use of a car, it must be prosecuted under the more specific vehicular homicide statute which punishes the same behavior.

Section 16-10-26 sets forth a criminal penalty for knowingly giving a false report of a crime to police and does not expressly provide for a civil cause of action as a remedy for a violation. Moreover, there is nothing in the language of the statute or in the criminal statutory scheme that provides a basis to infer that the legislature intended to create an implicit civil cause of action for damages caused by violation of the statute.

It should be noted that under the Motor Vehicle Certificate of Title Act, a related statute provides that any person who knowingly makes a false report to a peace officer or the state revenue commissioner of the theft or conversion of a vehicle is guilty of a misdemeanor of a high and aggravated nature.

LAW ENFORCEMENT DEFENSE

See also IMPEDING ARREST OR PROSECUTION.

I. Generally

Under § 16-3-20(4), reasonable conduct performed in the course of making a lawful arrest is justified and is a defense to criminal prosecution. This principle contains two distinct requirements: the arrest made or attempted must be lawful and the conduct of the arresting party must be reasonable. The arrest's legality depends upon the status of the arresting party, the offense for which the arrest was made, and the circumstances under which the arresting party obtained knowledge of the offense and under which the arrest is attempted. On the other hand, the reasonableness of the arresting party's conduct depends primarily upon the nature of the offense for which the arrest is made and the conduct of the arrestee in response to the attempt to arrest him.

The law governing the legality of arrests and of the use of force to effect an arrest has developed in a variety of contexts. Many of the cases concern prosecution of an arrestee for his conduct in resisting arrest; others are appeals from convictions of an arresting party for making an unlawful arrest or for the excessive use of force in effecting an otherwise lawful arrest. Still others are cases concerned with the admissibility of evidence obtained in a search incident to an allegedly unlawful arrest, and a few cases involve civil actions against arresting parties for unlawful arrests or excessive force. To the extent that the issues in these cases overlap, the courts have been consistent in their decisions on the legality of arrests and the reasonableness of force employed. Although there is no assurance that the courts will not develop somewhat different rules in different contexts in the future, the law of arrest should be the same in each of these types of cases.

II. Lawfulness

A. Generally

The basic limitation on the lawfulness of an arrest is the requirement that the arresting party have probable cause to believe the arrestee has committed an offense. A warrantless arrest made without probable cause or an arrest for conduct which does not constitute a violation of the penal laws is false imprisonment and punishable as such. Similarly, the malicious issuance or execution of a manifestly illegal warrant is punishable as false imprisonment under color of legal process. The motive of the arresting party, however, is irrelevant, and ill will toward the arrestee will not invalidate an otherwise lawful arrest.

It should be noted that members of the General Assembly and members of the state militia enjoy a qualified immunity from arrest while in pursuit of their official duties. Presumably, therefore, an arrest under such circumstances would be unlawful, although there are no cases discussing this issue.

B. Arrests by Police Officers

The lawfulness of an arrest by a police officer is governed by § 17-4-20(a), which provides that a police officer may make an arrest "either under a warrant or without a warrant if the offense is committed in such officer's presence or within such officer's immediate knowledge; if the offender is endeavoring to escape; if the officer has probable cause to believe that an act of family violence . . . has been committed; if the officer has probable cause to believe that an offense involving physical abuse has been committed against a vulnerable adult . . . ; or for other cause if there is likely to be failure of justice for want of a judicial officer to issue a warrant." This has been construed as "a codification of the common law on the subject of arrest, with perhaps a slight enlargement of the power of arrest," and the decisions are generally in accord with the rules followed in the majority of American jurisdictions. Although it was previously held that § 17-4-20 stated the only circumstances in which an officer may make a warrantless arrest, the enactment of the Uniform Criminal Extradition Act in 1951 added a provision permitting a warrantless arrest "upon reasonable information that the accused stands charged in the courts of a state with a crime punishable by death or imprisonment for a term exceeding one year," and this has been held an expansion of the authority stated in § 17-4-20. It should be noted that a police officer who does not comply with the provisions of the Georgia Peace Officer Standards and Training Act is limited to the arrest powers of a private citizen. While, as a private citizen, a non-complying officer may effect an arrest under certain circumstances, § 17-5-20 expressly forbids the issuance of a search warrant on the application of a private citizen.

Although a police officer may arrest for any offense with a warrant, if the arrest is such that a warrant is required the warrant must be in the possession of the arresting officer or of one nearby who is working with him, unless an immediate arrest is necessary to prevent a "failure of justice." Whether an arrest is necessary in order to prevent a failure of justice is ordinarily a jury question.

A police officer may make an immediate arrest without a warrant for any offense committed in his presence, whether the offense be a felony, a misdemeanor, or a violation of a municipal ordinance. If the arrest is not made at the time the offense is committed or immediately thereafter, however, a warrant is required, at least in the case of an arrest for a misdemeanor or ordinance violation, unless the delay is caused by the arrestee's flight and subsequent pursuit. The requirement that the offense be committed "in his presence" has been construed to have the same meaning as the phrase "within his immediate knowledge" in § 17-4-60, defining the arrest powers of a private citizen; that is, if the officer obtains knowledge of the offense by means of any of his senses, the offense is committed "in his presence." On the other hand, if the officer cannot learn of the offense without searching the arrestee, the offense is not committed "in his presence."

Where an individual commits an offense in his or her home and that offense is committed "in [the] presence or within [the] immediate knowledge" of a police officer, the officer is authorized to arrest the individual in the home without a warrant only where the officer's entry into the home is by consent or where there are exigent circumstances. Absent exigent circumstances or consent, a neutral judicial officer must be allowed to assess whether the police have probable cause to make an arrest in the home.

Although § 17-4-20(a) states that a police officer may make an arrest without a warrant if "the offender is endeavoring to escape," this principle is limited by holdings that an officer generally may not arrest for a misdemeanor or an ordinance violation not committed in his presence, even if the arrestee is attempting to escape. A police officer may, however, arrest an escaped misdemeanor convict without a warrant.

Referring to the provision in § 17-4-20(a) that an officer may make a warrantless arrest when "there is likely to be failure of justice for want of a judicial officer to issue a warrant," the Court of Appeals has said that "[w]hat the . . . phrase includes is obscure . . .." Only two cases appear to apply this provision. The first involved a police officer who was given a warrant to execute, but returned the warrant when he could not find the arrestee. Shortly thereafter, the officer was involved in a near-collision in his squad car. Stopping the other driver, the officer recognized the person named in the warrant, arrested him, and searched his car. The fruits of the search were not suppressed because the arrest was necessary to prevent a "failure of justice." In the second, a county sheriff was informed by a warehouse owner that he had witnessed an on duty police officer break into his warehouse and steal $130 in marked bills. Seeking to arrest the defendant before he went off duty and had an opportunity to dispose of the evidence, the sheriff obtained a warrant from a justice of the peace, but was unable to execute it because it was improperly issued. Unable to obtain a proper warrant before the defendant was to go off duty, the sheriff arrested him without a warrant. The arrest was lawful because delay in making the arrest would have caused a "failure of justice" by giving the defendant time to rid himself of the marked money.

Section 17-4-20(d) provides: "No law enforcement agency . . . shall adopt or promulgate any rule, regulation, or policy which prohibits a peace officer from using that degree of force to apprehend a suspected felon which is allowed by the statutory and case law of this state." Under this provision, therefore, no local government or state agency could be more restrictive on law enforcement officials than the courts or legislature. If a certain amount of force is permitted by statute or case law (as indicated, the law on excessive force is case law, not statutory), no governmental restriction of that level of force can be promulgated. It is not clear whether this change in the language of § 17-4-20(d) reflects a change in the actual substantive content of the law. At the least, it certainly makes the law clearer. Under prior law, the other governmental agencies were barred from enacting policies "in conflict" with the state law.

C. Arrests by Private Citizens

The authority of a private citizen to make an arrest depends upon whether he is doing so on his own or is assisting a police officer. A private citizen summoned to assist a police officer has the same authority as the officer, and one who reasonably and in good faith volunteers his assistance is likewise protected from criminal liability to the same extent as the officer.

If he acts on his own, however, his authority is more narrow. The mere possession of a warrant by a private person does not make an arrest lawful, although the arrest is legal if he is assisting a police officer who has a warrant. Under § 17-4-60, a private citizen may arrest for an offense committed in his presence or, if the offender is escaping, upon reasonable and probable grounds to suspect that the arrestee has committed a felony. The section has been construed as a codification of the common law on the authority of a private citizen to make an arrest, and it, thus, does not authorize an arrest for an ordinance violation or a misdemeanor which is not a breach of the peace even when it is committed in his presence.

Many jurisdictions provide that citizens' arrests made where the offense was not committed in the presence of the citizen are legal only where the offense actually was committed. In these jurisdictions, the citizen must act not only reasonably, but accurately. There is no Georgia law on this point, probably because a probable cause arrest is authorized by § 17-4-60 in the only situation in which a citizen might make an arrest where the offense did not take place in his presence: where there was a felony committed and the offender is escaping. It would appear that no other citizens' arrest where the offense was committed outside the citizen's presence is authorized by Georgia law. As in the case of a police officer, a citizen's arrest for an offense committed in his presence must be made at the time of the offense; a later arrest is invalid. A private person may also make a warrantless arrest upon reasonable information under the Uniform Criminal Extradition Act. It should be noted that arrest powers of private citizens are given to private detectives and security guards in certain situations.

D. Arrests by Nuclear Power Facility Security Officers

A security officer, including a contract security officer, employed by a federally licensed nuclear power facility or licensee thereof has the authority in order to secure that facility to search any person on the premises of the facility or the properties adjacent to it if the facility is under imminent threat or danger, pursuant to a written agreement entered into with the local enforcement agency having jurisdiction over the facility, for the purpose of determining if the person possesses unauthorized weapons, explosives, or other similarly prohibited material. If the person objects to the search, he must be detained or required to immediately vacate the premises. Any person refusing to submit to a search and refusing to vacate the premises of the facility upon the request of a security officer is guilty of a misdemeanor.

In accordance with a nuclear security plan approved by the United States Nuclear Regulatory Commission or other federal agency authorized to regulate nuclear facility security, a security officer, including a contract security officer, employed by a federally licensed nuclear power facility or licensee thereof has the authority in order to secure that facility to detain any person located on the premises of the facility or on the properties adjacent thereto if the facility is under imminent threat or danger, pursuant to a written agreement entered into with the local law enforcement agency having jurisdiction over the facility, where there is reasonable suspicion to believe that the person poses a threat to the security of the facility, regardless of whether the prohibited act occurred in the officer's presence. In the event of that person's detention, the law enforcement agency having jurisdiction over the facility must be immediately contacted. The detention can not exceed the amount of time reasonably necessary to allow for law enforcement officers to arrive at the facility.

III. Reasonableness of Force Employed

For the arresting party's conduct to be justified, not only must the arrest have been lawful, but the arresting party's conduct must have been reasonable. This issue generally arises in cases wherein it is alleged that excessive force was employed to effect or attempt an arrest. Although all of these cases have involved arrests by police officers, it is likely that the same principles apply to arrests by private citizens; however, the private citizen has much less license to use force than the law enforcement official.

In Bennett v. State the Court of Appeals dealt with the use of the defense by a hybrid type of defendant, a bail bondsman. While the court correctly concluded that the bail bondsman ought not to have a greater license to use force than a law enforcement official, it left unanswered the more difficult question of whether less license is authorized. In other words, shall the bondsman be treated as a law enforcement official or a private citizen or sui generis with regard to the amount of force which can be used in facilitating an arrest?

The cardinal rule on the use of force to effect an arrest is that the arresting officer may use enough force to effect the arrest and no more; even simply pointing a pistol at the arrestee is unlawful if not reasonably necessary to effect the arrest. If the arrestee resists, the officer may use only that amount of force necessary to obtain submission. A further limitation is imposed in the case of arrests for a misdemeanor or an ordinance violation: the use of deadly force is never justified to effect an arrest for such an offense unless the arresting officer is met with armed resistance.

Although it was said in McAllister v. State that a police officer has no right to shoot or kill an arrestee if the latter is not seeking to resist arrest by force, but only to escape it by flight, it is possible that this rule is restricted to misdemeanor and ordinance violation arrests. The United States Supreme Court, in Tennessee v. Garner, has held that the use of deadly force in the effectuation of an arrest is limited by the Constitution to situations involving violent felons. The Court held that the Fourth Amendment, in restricting the police to "reasonable" arrest practices, prohibits the use of deadly force where the fleeing felon is unarmed and nondangerous. The Court did state, however, that "if the suspect threatens the officer with a weapon or there is probable cause to believe that he has committed a crime involving the infliction or threatened infliction of serious physical harm, deadly force may be used if necessary to prevent escape . . .." This ruling should not work a change in Georgia law which already seemed to have limited the use of deadly force in this way.

Often the arrestee, in resisting arrest, presents a threat to the safety of the arresting party. In that event, the arresting party may employ a greater degree of force in self-defense if necessary, than he would be justified in using to effect the arrest without resistance and this is true without regard to the lawfulness of the arrest. If an unlawful arrest is attempted for the purpose of bringing about this result, however, the killing of the arrestee is murder.

The killing of a fleeing misdemeanant is murder, voluntary manslaughter, or involuntary manslaughter in the commission of an unlawful act, depending upon the circumstances. A police officer attempting an illegal arrest who is met with resistance not disproportionate to the degree of force he is employing and who kills the arrestee is guilty of murder. An unintentional killing in the course of an unlawful arrest is at least involuntary manslaughter in the commission of an unlawful act.

Sheriffs and peace officers may use deadly force to apprehend a suspected felon only when (1) the officer reasonably believes that the suspect possesses a deadly weapon, or (2) the officer reasonably believes that the suspect poses an immediate threat of physical violence to the officer or others, or (3) there is probable cause to believe that the suspect has committed a crime involving the infliction or threatened infliction of serious physical harm. Police officers being tried for a homicide that occurred while they were acting in the line of duty in response to a report that the suspect possessed a deadly weapon are entitled upon request to a jury instruction tracking this statutory language on the use of deadly force by police officers. A justification charge applicable to ordinary citizens would be wholly inadequate to inform the jury of the law applicable to police officers acting in the line of duty.

Employees of state and county correctional institutions, jails, and other places of lawful confinement or peace officers of any agency in the state may use deadly force when reasonably necessary to prevent escapes or apprehend escapees from such institutions.

Security officers, including contract security officers, employed by federally licensed nuclear power facilities or licensees thereof have the authority in order to secure those facilities to threaten or use force against another in defense of those facilities and the persons therein as provided for under §§ 16-3-21 and 16-3-23.

MOTOR VEHICLE CRIMES

See also DECEPTIVE PRACTICES; HOMICIDE; NATURAL RESOURCES, CRIMES RELATING TO; PROPERTY DAMAGE CRIMES; THEFT CRIMES.

I. Generally

Title 40 is designed primarily to regulate behavior concerning motor vehicles and traffic. Criminal provisions concerning the Uniform Rules of the Road, the registration and licensing of vehicles, the certificates of titles of vehicles, the identification of vehicles or vehicle parts, driver's licenses, and the safety of vehicles are to be found in this title. In addition to this title, there are provisions in several other titles which have some effect on the operation of motor vehicles.

II. Serious Traffic Offenses Under the Uniform Rules of the Road

A. Generally

Enacted in 1974, the Uniform Rules of the Road regulate behavior on the state's roads. Various sections prescribe the rules concerning, for example, traffic signs; right of way; rights and duties of pedestrians; turning, starting, and signaling; speed restrictions; and stopping, standing and parking. Except for sections which provide some other specific punishment, a violation defined in any provision of the Uniform Rules of the Road is a misdemeanor.

Section 40-1-1 is an extensive definitional section, applicable to the entire title on motor vehicles and traffic. The territorial coverage of the Uniform Rules of the Road is generally limited to publicly maintained roads with six exceptions: (1) where a different place is referred to in a particular code section, (2) where a vehicle is operated at a shopping center or parking lot that is used as a through or connector street, (3) anywhere the offense involved is reckless driving, driving under the influence, or homicide by vehicle, (4) any parking area where the offense involved is hit and run, striking an unattended vehicle, or striking a fixture, (5) where a vehicle is operated on any private property that fronts on coastal marshlands or estuarine area, and (6) where a vehicle is operated within a privately owned residential area located in a county or municipality. The rules apply, where appropriate, to riding animals or animal drawn vehicles. The rules are inapplicable to those working on the highways while they are doing so. Those who are operating authorized emergency vehicles or law enforcement vehicles are exempted from general coverage of the rules and are subject only to some general constraints.

The most serious traffic offenses of the Uniform Rules of the Road are set out in Article 15 of Chapter 6 of Title 40. They are reckless driving (§ 40-6-390), driving under the influence (§ 40-6-391), homicide by vehicle (§ 40-6-393), feticide by vehicle (§ 40-6-393.1), serious injury by vehicle (§ 40-6-394), fleeing or attempting to elude a police officer (§ 40-6-395), homicide or serious injury by interference with an official traffic-control device or railroad sign or signal (§ 40-6-396), and aggressive driving (§ 40-6-397).

B. Reckless Driving

1. Generally

Section 40-6-390 punishes those who drive "in reckless disregard for the safety of persons or property." A similarly worded predecessor statute withstood a challenge that it was unconstitutionally vague. In Lancaster v. State, the Court of Appeals held that the statute was precise enough. In defining the content of reckless conduct, the court stressed that it is more than mere negligence and approvingly quoted a law dictionary definition which described it as a "contemptuous willingness to injure and disregard of the consequences to others."

Considering the general standard and the variety of types of behavior possibly included in the definition, a listing of situations covered by the statute would be fruitless. It should be noted, however, that the court has held that intoxication evidence is relevant to the issue of recklessness. It should also be noted that while § 40-6-390 is a misdemeanor itself with enhanced punishment for repeat offenders, it is rarely used in prosecutions by itself. Almost invariably, the section is utilized only as the underlying crime in a prosecution under § 40-6-393 for homicide by vehicle.

Speeding, unaccompanied by other traffic violations, can form the basis for a reckless driving conviction if the state presents evidence that a defendant was driving at an excessive rate of speed given the posted speed limit and the driving conditions existing at the time.

2. Indictments or Accusations

The exact location is not a material element of reckless driving, and an indictment is sufficiently certain if it charges that the offense was committed in a particular county. Thus, a variance between the exact location of the reckless driving alleged in the indictment and that proved at trial is not fatal.

One panel of the Court of Appeals has held that if an accusation charging someone with reckless driving is worded so plainly that the nature of the offense is easily understood, the failure to allege the essential element of "disregard for the safety of persons or property" does not render the accusation invalid. However, another panel has held that if the accusation fails to include this crucial language, it is substantively defective. Until the Court of Appeals reconciles this conflict in its decisions, the better practice would be for the state to include this language in its accusations for reckless driving.

Where an indictment charging the defendant with reckless driving alleges that the offense was committed conjunctively in separate ways and the state offers proof to show commission of the offense in any one of these ways, a jury charge in the disjunctive is not error.

A count charging a defendant with reckless driving based on marijuana consumption is not subject to dismissal as a violation of equal protection. Although the Georgia Supreme Court has determined that § 40-6-391(a)(6) is unconstitutional as a denial of equal protection because of its disparate treatment of legal and illegal marijuana users, in a prosecution of reckless driving based on marijuana consumption, it does not matter whether the defendant consumed the marijuana legally or illegally. The charge merely includes the fact that marijuana was found in the defendant's blood because it is relevant to the jury's determination that the defendant drove in reckless disregard for the safety of persons or property, which is what the state must prove beyond a reasonable doubt. The state does not have to prove the defendant guilty of driving under the influence of marijuana.

No victim need be named in an indictment for reckless driving because, unlike the offense of aggressive driving, reckless driving is not directed toward a specific person. Instead, it is the act of driving in such a manner as to demonstrate a reckless disregard for all people or property generally, whether or not any specific person or property is in fact endangered at the time of the indicted act. Thus, precisely the same reckless acts of driving cannot be punished multiple times by simply naming a different person or property that the acts allegedly endangered. Consequently, the counts of an indictment charging the accused with the same acts of reckless driving directed toward each of the passengers of a vehicle would be subject to demurrer as a matter of law.

2.1. Admissibility of Evidence

Where an accused is charged with reckless driving, test results showing his use of drugs are admissible because the reckless driving violation could have been precipitated by the drug usage.

Evidence of the hazardous design and consequent malfunctioning of an intersection during the time of a collision and evidence of the corrective measures taken by the Department of Transportation since the collision, demonstrating its knowledge of the intersection's hazardous design, would be relevant to negate the elements of criminal negligence and proximate cause in regard to a reckless driving charge and to support a defendant's affirmative defense of accident. Furthermore, evidence of subsequent modifications to the intersection would be relevant not only to attempt to show that there were known flaws in the intersection, and hence known dangers, at the time of the collision but also that the Department of Transportation was the responsible party. Such evidence would be relevant and admissible as tending to exonerate the defendant.

3. Relationship to Other Offenses

Important Notice about Repudiation of Actual or Same Evidence Test: The Georgia Supreme Court repudiated the actual evidence test in Drinkard v. Walker, 281 Ga. 211, 636 S.E.2d 530 (2006), because it found this test to be inconsistent with the statutory framework governing the prohibition against multiple convictions for included offenses in Georgia. This inconsistency resulted in years of confusion and unpredictable results. In its place, the court adopted the required evidence test and overruled any prior case law that is inconsistent with it. Thus, any prior case law applying the actual evidence test is no longer controlling and should not be relied upon to determine whether one offense is included in another under § 16-1-6(1). The discussion of such case law is included below only insofar as it may still be applicable to pending prosecutions that arose before the Drinkard decision. See MULTIPLE CONVICTIONS, II. Tests to Determine Presence of Multiple Convictions, for a complete discussion of the Drinkard decision.

If the jury reveals which of the lesser included offenses serves as the foundation for finding a person to have been a "less safe" driver under the DUI statute or for finding a person guilty under the vehicular homicide statute, a sentence on the remaining lesser offense of reckless driving may be appropriate. Since reckless driving requires a reckless disregard for the safety of another person, an element not required by the DUI statute to be alleged and proven, it is not a lesser included offense as a matter of law. It also is not a lesser included offense as a matter of fact, unless the accusation includes an allegation of reckless disregard for the safety of another person and there is proof of such at trial.

Where the evidence shows that different facts establish the offenses of speeding and reckless driving, a conviction for speeding does not factually merge into a conviction for reckless driving. However, where the state uses up the evidence that the defendant was speeding to prove the reckless driving offense, the speeding conviction factually merges into the reckless driving conviction. Although it would be proper to prosecute the defendant for both speeding and reckless driving, he can be convicted and sentenced only for reckless driving.

C. Aggressive Driving

In an effort to reduce the number of traffic accidents and deaths caused by what is commonly known as road rage, the General Assembly enacted § 40-6-397 in 2001 to prohibit and punish this behavior.

Under § 40-6-397, a person commits the offense of aggressive driving when he operates any motor vehicle with the intent to annoy, harass, molest, intimidate, injure, or obstruct another person, including without limitation violating § 40-6-42 (overtaking and passing of vehicles), 40-6-48 (driving on roadways laned for traffic), 40-6-49 (following too closely), 40-6-123 (turning movements and required signals), 40-6-184 (driving at such a slow speed as to impede the movement of traffic), 40-6-312 (operating motorcycles on roadways laned for traffic), or 40-6-390 (reckless driving) with such intent. Any person convicted of aggressive driving is guilty of a misdemeanor of a high and aggravated nature.

Aggressive driving, unlike most other traffic offenses, is not a strict liability offense. Thus, aggressive driving will be more difficult to prove because the state must establish more than the mere intent to do the act which results in the traffic violation. Rather, it must establish that the traffic violation was committed with the specific intent to "annoy, harass, molest, intimidate, injure, or obstruct another person." The issue of intent is a question for the finder of fact.

Section 40-6-397 does not limit the applicability of the offense as going toward another driver. Rather, the state may indict a suspect for aggressive driving against any or all of the occupants of the vehicle and may attempt to show that the suspect operated his vehicle with the specific intent to "annoy, harass, molest, intimidate, injure, or obstruct" each person therein.

D. Homicide by Vehicle

1. Generally

As a result of the enactment of Georgia's vehicular homicide statute in 1974, a vehicular homicide which formerly was prosecuted as involuntary manslaughter must now be prosecuted under the vehicular homicide statute. Section 40-6-393 establishes two different grades of the offense of vehicular homicide: homicide by vehicle in the first degree and homicide by vehicle in the second degree. If the death results from a violation of § 40-6-163(a) (duty to stop before reaching a school bus stopped on the highway with visual signals in operation), § 40-6-390 (reckless driving), § 40-6-391 (driving under the influence), or § 40-6-395(a) (fleeing a police officer), the offense is homicide by vehicle in the first degree, which is a felony punishable by imprisonment for not less than three nor more than 15 years. Also, if the death results from an accident involving the driver and the driver leaves the scene of the accident in violation of 40-6-270(b) (duty to stop at the scene of the accident to give information and to render reasonable assistance), the offense is likewise homicide by vehicle in the first degree, which is a felony punishable by imprisonment for not less than three nor more than 15 years. Finally, if the death results from a habitual violator's operation of a motor vehicle while his license is in revocation, the offense is homicide by vehicle in the first degree but is punishable by imprisonment for not less than five nor more than 20 years.

If the death results from a violation of any other provision of the title on motor vehicles and traffic, the offense is homicide by vehicle in the second degree, which is punishable as a misdemeanor. Any provision of the title which does not set forth a specific violation cannot form the basis for this offense.

A violation of § 40-6-391(k)(1) is a valid statutory predicate for first degree vehicular homicide.

The plain language of § 40-6-393(a) makes clear that a person is guilty of homicide by vehicle if he causes the death of another, without malice aforethought, by illegally overtaking a school bus, driving recklessly, driving under the influence, or fleeing or attempting to elude an officer. There is nothing in the statute that would prevent a person of ordinary intelligence from understanding that actions taken to elude police that result in the death of another person could lead to a prosecution and conviction for first degree homicide by vehicle.

2. Causation

It is clear that some relationship between the traffic violation and the death must be demonstrated. In Johnson v. State, the court upheld an instruction which stated that in order to find the defendant guilty of first degree homicide by vehicle, the jury must find a violation of the Uniform Rules of the Road and must then find that such violation was the direct and proximate cause of the victim's death. The trial court properly defined proximate cause as "the act or omission [which] played a substantial part in bringing about or actually causing the injury or damage and . . . the injury or damage was either a direct result or a reasonably probable consequence of the act or omission."

The state's showing of proximate cause may be based upon direct or circumstantial evidence. Thus, the state is not required to produce direct evidence showing that the defendant's impaired driving ability proximately caused the collision.

If the defendant could have reasonably anticipated or foreseen intervening acts that might have caused the fatal accident, the causal connection is not broken and the defendant would be responsible for all of the consequences resulting from the intervening acts.

Where the defendant's theory of intervening criminal causation is not supported by the facts or the evidence, the trial court is not obligated to give an instruction on this theory.

An instruction on sudden emergency is not appropriate in a vehicular homicide case.

Inasmuch as the defendant's conduct is a substantial factor in causing the victim's death, it is a proximate cause of the victim's death, and the victim's failure to wear a seat belt can play no role in determining whether the defendant is guilty of vehicular homicide.

Although §§ 40-6-391(a)(1) and 40-6-393(a) require the state to prove only that the intoxicated driver caused the victim's death as a result of driving under the influence to the extent it was less safe for him to drive, the negligent operation of the vehicle by the defendant and the behavior of the victim remain relevant to the issue of causation in a vehicular homicide case. Where the evidence supports a finding that the victim's death resulted from an unavoidable accident but also supports a fault-based finding, it is for the jury to determine whether, in the absence of the defendant's negligent operation of his vehicle, the decedent's death could have been avoided.

In a vehicular homicide case, evidence of the other driver's drug use is inadmissible when it is intended only to impugn his character and has no relevance to any disputed issues in the case. However, evidence that the other driver may have been impaired by drug use, and thereby less able to avoid a fatal accident, would clearly be relevant in such a case. The conduct of all drivers involved in the accident is relevant to the extent it may impact the jury's determination of which driver's actions caused the fatality or whether the fatality resulted from an unavoidable accident.

The other driver's possible impairment would not be rendered irrelevant by expert testimony that the defendant's actions left the other driver with no way to avoid the accident. Whether or not the other driver was impaired, and whether or not his impairment contributed to the accident, would be for the jury to determine after considering all the relevant evidence.

The language of § 40-6-393(d) clearly requires that the state prove not only that the accused was operating a motor vehicle after having been declared a habitual violator, but that such act caused the death of another person.

Prior to 2008, a conviction for first degree vehicular homicide predicated on a hit-and-run required proof of all the elements of felony hit-and-run plus the additional element that the defendant's violation of § 40-6-270(b) was a contributing cause of the victim's death. The Court of Appeals's previous interpretation of § 40-6-393(a) in Klaub v. State, as not including a requirement that the defendant cause the victim's death through his failure to stop and render assistance after the accident, eliminated a key element that distinguished first degree vehicular homicide through a hit-and-run from the offense of felony hit-and-run and therefore overruled this interpretation. Thus, where the evidence in Henry v. State showed only that the driver caused the victim's death and then failed to stop and render assistance, the court concluded there was no evidence of causation that could sustain the defendant's conviction of first degree vehicular homicide through a violation of § 40-6-270(b) and remanded the case to the trial court for sentencing on the lesser included offense of felony hit-and-run.

In 2008, apparently dissatisfied with the result in Henry v. State, the General Assembly eliminated from § 40-6-393(a) the requirement that the defendant cause the victim's death through his failure to stop and render assistance after the accident. The General Assembly replaced this requirement with a new definition of first degree vehicular homicide predicated on a hit-and-run. This offense is committed when the defendant causes the victim's death by causing the accident that kills him and when the defendant then leaves the scene of the accident in violation of § 40-6-270(b). Under this definition, the contributing cause of the victim's death is not the defendant's violation of § 40-6-270(b) but his causing of the fatal accident. Thus, where the evidence shows that the defendant caused the victim's death by accident and then failed to stop and render assistance, there would be evidence of causation that could sustain the defendant's conviction of first degree vehicular homicide. With the enactment of this definition, the General Assembly has apparently overruled the decision in Henry. Since this decision is no longer controlling authority, it should not be followed.

3. Intention or Criminal Negligence

Except for aggressive driving, violations of the Uniform Rules of the Road are strict liability offenses. Thus, in most cases the criminal intent that the state must prove is simply the intent to do the act which results in the violation of the law, and not the specific intent to commit the crime itself. In Hoffer v. State, where the defendant was convicted of running a red light and of homicide by vehicle in the second degree, the court held that the state was not required to prove that the defendant intentionally drove through a red light, or even that the defendant knew that the light was red. The state was simply required to prove that the defendant intended to drive his car through the intersection at a point in time when the red light facing the defendant's lane of travel was red.

Criminal negligence is applicable to first degree homicide by vehicle. In Johnson v. State, the Court of Appeals approved the trial court's instruction on criminal negligence. Despite the fact that the vehicular homicide statute does not explicitly include any requirement of culpability other than that which attaches to the predicate traffic violation, the court pointed out that a traffic violation constitutes criminal negligence when the violation is " 'intentional, wilful, or wanton, or [when] the violation, though unintentional, is accompanied by recklessness or is under circumstances from which probable death or injury to others might be reasonably anticipated.' "

An instruction as to criminal negligence has also been held applicable to second degree homicide by vehicle. However, where the theory of criminal negligence is not supported by the facts or the evidence, the trial court is not obligated to give such an instruction.

It is for the jury to determine whether the defendant operated his vehicle in a criminally negligent manner in violation of a traffic safety statute or whether he operated it in response to an emergency situation created by the victim's vehicle when it obstructed the roadway.

3.1. Party to Crime

Where there is evidence to support a finding that the defendant was a party to the underlying crime of driving under the influence of alcohol and that his actions played a substantial part in causing the victims' deaths, such evidence would be sufficient to convict him of homicide by vehicle even though he was neither driving nor riding in the car involved in the fatal accident.

4. Indictments

An indictment charging a violation of § 40-6-393 must make clear which grade of the offense is being charged: homicide by vehicle in the first degree or homicide by vehicle in the second degree. An indictment which directly tracks the language of § 40-6-393(a) is sufficient to charge a defendant with homicide by vehicle in the first degree. This offense may be charged in various ways in different counts of an indictment to meet the evidence. An indictment which contains such alternative counts is not subject to a special demurrer. Finally, the indictment must allege the traffic violation that was the proximate cause of the victim's death.

An indictment that omits an essential element of the predicate traffic offense in a homicide by vehicle count can nonetheless satisfy the requirements of due process as long as the indictment charges the predicate traffic offense completely in a separate count.

As to an indictment for the commission of vehicular homicide in the first degree, a verdict of guilty of vehicular homicide in the second degree may be returned thereon, such a verdict not constituting an unauthorized amendment of the indictment. This would be especially true where the very indictment itself alleges the defendant's commission of a less culpable traffic offense as a separate count. The entirely separate less culpable traffic offense does not merge into the more culpable traffic offense. Thus, it is possible to return a verdict of guilt as to DUI and a verdict of guilt as to second degree vehicular homicide.

Homicide by vehicle punishes behavior which would otherwise be "unlawful act" involuntary manslaughter.

The courts have held that an indictment for "involuntary manslaughter" alleging facts which bring the case under § 40-6-393 is valid, but can support only a § 40-6-393 conviction because an indictment is to be judged by its allegations, not the label it places on them. A very significant practical difference occurs, however, when the homicide by vehicle is of the misdemeanor variety (i.e., the traffic violation was not a violation of § 40-6-163(a), 40-6-270(b), § 40-6-390, § 40-6-391 or § 40-6-395(a)). In this situation, what otherwise would be a felonious involuntary manslaughter is only misdemeanor homicide by vehicle under § 40-6-393(c) and the punishment is less.

The distinction between "unlawful act" involuntary manslaughter and misdemeanor homicide by vehicle was challenged by the state as unconstitutional in State v. Edwards. In that case, the state argued that classifying homicides by vehicle resulting from traffic violations differently from other homicides in the commission of unlawful acts was an unconstitutional classification denying equal protection of the law. The Georgia Supreme Court rejected this argument, holding that the legislation defining homicide by vehicle and prescribing misdemeanor punishment in certain cases did not treat persons similarly situated differently. The General Assembly was authorized to find that "unlawful act" involuntary manslaughter differs from homicide by vehicle.

Where the acts alleged in the indictment fit the requirements for both felony murder and vehicular homicide, the defendant may be prosecuted for each crime. Although the defendant may not be properly sentenced for each crime, that does not prevent his trial on both charges.

5. Similar Transactions

Before introducing evidence regarding the defendant's prior accidents, the state must provide written notice of its intent to use such evidence to the defendant's counsel and file it with the trial court at least ten days before trial, unless the time period is altered by the judge. The judge must then hold an evidentiary hearing to determine if the evidence should be admitted. The defendant's failure to object to the lack of notice and the required hearing does not constitute a waiver of the procedure. The lack of notice and the required hearing can constitute harmful error entitling the defendant to a new trial if the admitted evidence does not demonstrate substantial relevancy for a proper purpose or if such relevancy is substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice.

6. Relationship to Other Offenses

Important Notice about Repudiation of Actual or Same Evidence Test: The Georgia Supreme Court repudiated the actual evidence test in Drinkard v. Walker, 281 Ga. 211, 636 S.E.2d 530 (2006), because it found this test to be inconsistent with the statutory framework governing the prohibition against multiple convictions for included offenses in Georgia. This inconsistency resulted in years of confusion and unpredictable results. In its place, the court adopted the required evidence test and overruled any prior case law that is inconsistent with it. Thus, any prior case law applying the actual evidence test is no longer controlling and should not be relied upon to determine whether one offense is included in another under § 16-1-6(1). The discussion of such case law is included below only insofar as it may still be applicable to pending prosecutions that arose before the Drinkard decision. See MULTIPLE CONVICTIONS, II. Tests to Determine Presence of Multiple Convictions, for a complete discussion of the Drinkard decision.

Concerning double jeopardy protection, homicide by vehicle is analogous to felony murder. Just as a defendant cannot be convicted and sentenced for both murder and the underlying felony in felony murder, in a § 40-6-393 prosecution based, for example, on driving under the influence, there cannot be sentencing both for driving under the influence and homicide by vehicle. A traffic violation underlying the offense of vehicular homicide constitutes a lesser included offense, and conviction of both offenses is proscribed. Accordingly, a conviction for such an underlying offense would merge into the offense of vehicular homicide.

When valid guilty verdicts are returned on both alternative counts of felony murder and vehicular homicide, the alternative vehicular homicide count is vacated by operation of § 16-1-7. Since the vehicular homicide conviction has been statutorily vacated, there is no vehicular homicide count into which the underlying traffic offense can merge. Thus, it is proper for the trial court to treat the vehicular homicide count as merely surplusage and then to proceed to determine whether a separate sentence on the underlying traffic offense may be authorized for lack of merger, as a matter of fact, into the extant felony murder conviction.

Where felony murder and vehicular homicide in the first degree are based on separate and distinct underlying actions, it is neither legally nor logically impossible to convict the defendant of both offenses.

In Brock v. State, the defendant had already pleaded to driving under the influence when the state later tried to prosecute under § 40-6-393. The court held that the rule against successive prosecutions prevented the second prosecution because both the DUI and the homicide were within the jurisdiction of the same court and had been known by the prosecutor. While the court did not purport to reach the claim that the second prosecution also violated the rule against multiple convictions, it did describe the DUI conviction here as a lesser included offense of § 40-6-393. Thus, since conviction of both the greater and the lesser offense is precluded by statute, it would seem clear that even if both prosecutions had been brought at the same time only one conviction could stand.

Where a person is charged with felony vehicular homicide, a probate court does not have jurisdiction to try the person for that charge, and § 40-6-376(d)'s restrictions on jurisdiction over underlying offenses apply. This provision narrowly divests a court of jurisdiction over certain underlying traffic offenses charged against the particular person whose vehicular homicide charge cannot also be considered by that court. The purpose of § 40-6-376(d) is to prevent, whether by inadvertence or chicanery, the separation of the underlying traffic offense from the vehicular homicide and its disposition in another court, thereby preventing prosecution of the vehicular homicide because of double jeopardy. Thus, because a judgment entered by a probate court on an underlying traffic offense of a felony vehicular homicide would be "null and void" under § 40-6-376(d), a defendant cannot plead prior jeopardy if subsequently indicted for the vehicular homicide in a court having jurisdiction thereof.

In State v. LeMay, the court held that where the state sought to prosecute a defendant on the greater offense of vehicular homicide and the lesser included offense of driving under the influence in a single prosecution, and the defendant received a mistrial on the greater offense, the remaining conviction of the lesser offense did not bar retrial of the greater offense. Of course, the court held should the defendant be convicted of vehicular homicide on retrial, the trial court must set aside the conviction of driving under the influence since it was an offense included in vehicular homicide.

Where a jury has reached an unspecified agreement on the lesser included offense of DUI but still is in disagreement as to the additional elements of the greater offense of vehicular homicide, which has DUI and reckless driving as the underlying offenses, the trial court does not have to stop all deliberations and require the jury to return a verdict on the lesser included offense, thereby precluding all further deliberations on the greater offense. A jury may agree on some elements of an offense but require more deliberative time on other elements. Under these circumstances, requiring further deliberations which eventually result in a guilty verdict on both DUI and vehicular homicide would not be erroneous.

In a first degree vehicular homicide case, where the undisputed evidence shows that the defendant was operating the motor vehicle while his license was revoked due to habitual violator status, it is not error to refuse to give a charge on second degree vehicular homicide. Although the evidence shows the defendant unintentionally caused the death of the victim while speeding or failing to maintain a lane, the lesser offense of second degree vehicular homicide is not available to him because of his habitual violator status.

Where one is charged with the vehicular homicide of different people in different counts and is found guilty on each count, he may be sentenced separately on each count to run consecutively for the reason that the killing of different people constitutes separate crimes even though done at the same time with one stroke of the same death-dealing instrument. Thus, even though the vehicular homicide counts arise from a single incident, they do not merge for sentencing purposes.

7. Murder by Vehicle

With the enactment in 1974 of the vehicular homicide statute (§ 40-6-393), a murder charge cannot be predicated upon a vehicular homicide resulting from "reckless disregard for the safety of persons" as that phrase is used in the reckless driving statute (§ 40-6-390). Such an offense is expressly made "homicide by vehicle in the first degree" by § 40-6-393. Thus, an allegation in an indictment of "reckless disregard for human life and safety of persons using [the] highway" will not support an indictment for murder.

Although the vehicular homicide statute has displaced the involuntary manslaughter statute as to vehicular homicides, it has not displaced the general malice murder statute. The vehicular homicide statute applies only to vehicular homicides caused "without malice aforethought" and "without an intention to do so." Thus, malice murder by vehicle, just as malice murder by other means, still falls under the general malice murder statute. In Anderson v. State, the defendant's conviction for malice murder by vehicle was predicated on evidence of the defendant's implied malice. The evidence showed that the defendant drove, at a speed of 68 miles per hour, across the center line striking head-on another vehicle, without attempting to brake his vehicle or otherwise avoid the collision, and killed the driver of the other vehicle. The court held the defendant's statement to law enforcement officers that he regretted the victim's death, "but it had to be somebody," was evidence of an intent to kill someone else in order to take his own life. In Chester v. State, the court upheld the defendant's conviction for malice murder by vehicle, where the jury's finding of implied malice was based on evidence that at the time of the accident the defendant was angry at women, and was speeding and drunk. Although he was drunk, he knew that he struck two girls, and that one of the girls was in the bed of his truck. Moreover, he knowingly dumped this girl's body at an isolated abandoned railroad track, thus making it highly unlikely that anyone would render aid to her to save her life.

Under an indictment for murder by vehicle, homicide by vehicle rather than involuntary manslaughter is the lesser included offense applicable to the case. If sufficiently supported by the evidence, a conviction for homicide by vehicle can be obtained but not for involuntary manslaughter.

7.1. Defenses

An instruction on accident or misfortune would be authorized in vehicular homicide/DUI cases, if there is evidence that the defendant could not have avoided the collision due to circumstances beyond his control.

When the DUI predicate offense is set out only as an element of the offense of vehicular homicide and not as a separate crime for which the defendant risks separate criminal liability, the state has not commenced a prosecution against the defendant for DUI to which the misdemeanor statute of limitation applies. Rather, the state has commenced a prosecution for vehicular homicide only, and the four-year limitation period applies.

8. Verdicts

Malice murder is defined as the killing of another "with malice aforethought, either express or implied." Vehicular homicide is defined as killing another while operating a car, "without malice aforethought" and "without an intention to do so." Hence, when a jury returns verdicts finding the defendant guilty of the malice murder and vehicular homicide of another, the jury has convicted the defendant of killing both with and without malice aforethought. Obviously, the two verdicts are mutually exclusive, and it is proper for the trial court to refuse to accept these verdicts and send the jury back to continue its deliberations.

Given the statutory definitions of first and second degree vehicular homicide, it cannot be said that verdicts finding a defendant guilty of first degree vehicular homicide by reckless driving in the deaths of two victims are mutually exclusive of verdicts finding him guilty of second degree vehicular homicide in the deaths of two other victims. A finding of second degree vehicular homicide does not mandate a conclusion that the defendant did not drive in a reckless manner. The jury could have believed that although the defendant was reckless, that reckless driving did not cause the two other deaths. Instead, the jury might have concluded that some other traffic offense caused these deaths.

9. Unborn Child Not Person Within Meaning of Statute

In Billingsley v. State the court stated that the legislature did not intend for the term "person" as used in the vehicular homicide statute to encompass unborn children. The court supported this interpretation by the fact that the legislature re-enacted a feticide statute in 1982, a course of action which would have been unnecessary had unborn children been considered persons within the meaning of the existing homicide statutes. Because an unborn child cannot be considered a "person" within the meaning of § 40-6-393, the court concluded that the appellant's conviction of vehicular homicide arising from the death of an unborn child must be reversed.

However, in State v. Hammett, the court found that an unborn child who was delivered through an emergency Caesarean section and who lived approximately eleven hours before dying from the injuries he had received in a vehicular accident was a "person" under § 40-6-393(b) [now (c)] at the time of his death. The court held that it was not the victim's status at the time the injuries were inflicted that determined the nature of the crime, such as vehicular homicide, but that it was the victim's status at the time of death which was the determinative factor.

Apparently, these two decisions served as the impetus for the General Assembly's enactment in 1991 of the feticide by vehicle statute, which is discussed below.

E. Feticide by Vehicle

A person commits the offense of feticide by vehicle in the first degree if he causes the death of an unborn child by any injury to the mother of such child which would be homicide by vehicle in the first degree as provided in § 40-6-393(a), (b), or (d) if it resulted in the death of the mother. The offense of feticide by vehicle in the first degree is punishable by imprisonment for not less than three years nor more than 15 years.

A person commits the offense of feticide by vehicle in the second degree if he causes the death of an unborn child by any injury to the mother of such child by violating any provision of the title on motor vehicles and traffic other than § 40-6-390 (reckless driving) or § 40-6-391 (driving under the influence), which would be homicide by vehicle in the second degree as provided in § 40-6-393(c) if it resulted in the death of such mother. The offense of feticide by vehicle in the second degree is punishable as a misdemeanor.

Apparently, the feticide by vehicle statute was enacted because the conviction of a defendant in a vehicular homicide case involving the death of an unborn child could not be upheld, as an unborn child is not considered a "person" under the vehicular homicide statute. A defendant's conviction for vehicular homicide in such a case could be upheld only if the unborn child had been injured in a vehicular accident and had died from the injuries after his birth, i.e., after he had become a "person" under the vehicular homicide statute.

For a discussion of the feticide statute, see HOMICIDE.

F. Serious Injury by Vehicle

In 1979, the General Assembly enacted § 40-6-394, which makes it a felony to seriously injure a person through the violation of § 40-6-390 (reckless driving) or § 40-6-391 (driving under the influence). The punishment for this offense is imprisonment for not less than one nor more than 15 years.

Serious injury is described in the statute as bodily harm which deprives a person of a member of his body, renders a member of his body useless, seriously disfigures his body or a member thereof, or causes organic brain damage rendering his body or any member thereof useless. There is no requirement that, in addition to being "serious," the member of the victim be permanently rendered useless. Whether the bodily harm to the victim constitutes serious disfigurement is a jury question. Although there are no well-defined guidelines for the serious disfigurement element, the Georgia Supreme Court has held that the language of § 40-6-394 is not so vague and ambiguous as to fail to place a defendant on notice as to what type of injuries would constitute serious disfigurement.

Where the victim's serious injuries were not the result of some unforeseeable intervening act but were substantially caused by the defendant's criminal acts, some other factor contributing to the victim's injuries would not break the causal connection between the defendant's wrongful conduct and those injuries. The finder of fact would be authorized to find the defendant guilty of serious injury by vehicle.

Whether the evidence is sufficient to show that the victim died immediately upon impact or that he survived but died shortly thereafter as a result of serious bodily harm caused by the impact is an issue for the jury to resolve.

Where it is alleged in one count of an indictment that the defendant's act of driving under the influence seriously injured the victim by rendering a member of his body useless and it is alleged in another count that the same act seriously injured the victim by rendering another member of his body useless, the defendant can be prosecuted on both of these counts but cannot be convicted and sentenced on both. The single instance of the defendant's act of driving under the influence is "used up" in proving one of the counts and cannot be used again as the predicate for a conviction and sentence on the other.

Photographs taken of the victim while hospitalized are relevant to show the seriousness of the victim's injuries. Also, a videotape depicting the rehabilitation of the seriously injured victim is relevant and has probative value in that it illustrates for the jury the extent of the victim's injuries.

A separate conviction for driving under the influence or a separate conviction for reckless driving can merge into a conviction for causing serious injury by vehicle.

Reckless driving is a crime founded upon an act of criminal negligence rather than an intentional act. Aggravated assault with a motor vehicle, which is based on attempting to commit a violent injury to the person of another under § 16-5-20(a)(1), requires a finding of an intentional infliction of injury, which precludes the element of criminal negligence in reckless driving. Accordingly, a verdict of guilt as to aggravated assault with a motor vehicle based on § 16-5-20(a)(1) would be mutually exclusive with a verdict of guilt as to serious injury by vehicle predicated on reckless driving.

G. Homicide or Serious Injury by Interference with Official Traffic-Control Device or Railroad Sign or Signal

In 1996, the General Assembly enacted § 40-6-396, adding two more offenses to its classification of serious traffic offenses.

Any person who, without malice aforethought, causes the death of another person by violating § 40-6-26(a) commits the offense of homicide by interference with an official traffic-control device or railroad sign or signal. The punishment for this offense is imprisonment for not less than two not more than 15 years.

Any person who, without malice aforethought, causes bodily harm to another person by violating § 40-6-26(a) commits the offense of serious injury by interference with an official traffic-control device or railroad sign or signal. Serious injury is described in the statute as bodily harm which deprives a person of a member of his body, renders a member of his body useless, seriously disfigures his body or a member thereof, or causes organic brain damage rendering his body or any member thereof useless. The punishment for this offense is imprisonment for not less than one nor more than five years.

H. Driving Under the Influence

1. Generally

By far the most heavily litigated motor vehicle crime is § 40-6-391 which punishes drivers or operators of vehicles whose ability is impaired by alcohol or drugs. It punishes those who drive or who are in actual physical control of moving vehicles if they are in one of six conditions: (1) under the influence of alcohol to the extent that it is less safe for the person to drive; (2) under the influence of any drug to the extent that it is less safe for the person to drive; (3) under the intentional influence of any glue, aerosol, or other toxic vapor to the extent that it is less safe for the person to drive; (4) under the combined influence of any two or more of these substances to the extent that it is less safe for the person to drive; (5) the person's alcohol concentration is 0.08 grams or more at any time within three hours after such driving or being in actual physical control from alcohol consumed before such driving or being in actual physical control ended; or (6) there is any amount of marijuana or a controlled substance present in the person's blood or urine, or both, including the metabolites and derivatives of each or both without regard to whether or not any alcohol is present in the person's breath or blood. The statute also punishes those who drive or who are in actual physical control of moving commercial motor vehicles while there is 0.04 percent or more by weight of alcohol in their blood, breath, or urine and punishes those persons under the age of 21 who drive or who are in actual physical control of any moving vehicle while their alcohol concentration is 0.02 grams or more at any time within three hours after such driving or being in physical control from alcohol consumed before such driving or being in actual physical control ended.

The statute also provides that the offense of endangering a child by driving under the influence of alcohol or drugs is committed when a person under the influence transports in a motor vehicle a child under the age of 14 years. This offense does not merge with the offense of driving under the influence for the purpose of prosecution.

2. Constitutional Issues and Statutory Construction

In Cargile v. State the Georgia Supreme Court held that there was sufficient definiteness in the DUI statute. The court pointed out that it had previously rejected vagueness attacks on the predecessor statute and found that the phrase "driving under the influence of alcohol" is universally recognized and understood "and is not indefinite or unintelligible."

In Head v. State the Georgia Supreme Court rejected an attack on § 40-6-391 which claimed a violation of due process in the failure to require distributors of alcoholic beverages to inform consumers as to what quantity of the beverage is required to make them intoxicated under the law. The court said that the statutory language was sufficient to inform potential defendants of their legal responsibilities.

In Bohannon v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of the three-hour rule found in § 40-6-391(a)(5). The court held that this provision was reasonably related to a legitimate state interest and was neither vague nor overbroad.

In Love v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court concluded that § 40-6-391(a)(6), which prohibits driving while marijuana residue is circulating in the bodily fluids, bore a rational relationship to the legitimate state purpose of public safety. For this reason, the provision was not an unconstitutional denial of equal protection. However, it violated equal protection for another reason. The statute allowed a driver with metabolites of legally-used marijuana in his bodily fluids to be convicted only if it was established that he was "rendered incapable of driving safely," while a driver with metabolites of illegally-used marijuana could be convicted without evidence of impairment. This disparate treatment was predicated on whether the marijuana use was legally sanctioned. In light of the rational relationship between the statute and the legitimate state purpose of public safety and the fact that the effects of legally-used marijuana were indistinguishable from the effects of illegally-used marijuana, the court concluded that the legislative distinction between users of legal and illegal marijuana was not directly related to the public safety purpose of the legislation. The Court of Appeals, however, has held that there is nothing in this decision which states that the statute is unconstitutional when applied to those convicted of driving with a detectable level of cocaine in their system. Furthermore, there would never be an instance of a legal cocaine user so as to make the statute unconstitutional as a denial of equal protection.

In Barnett v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court held that § 40-6-391(k), which sets forth the blood alcohol concentration standard for underage drivers, bore a reasonable relationship to the legitimate state purposes of protecting the public safety and safeguarding the physical well-being of children. Since the General Assembly had a rational basis for enacting this provision, the provision did not violate the defendant's equal protection rights by setting forth a standard that was different from the standard for persons above age 21.

In Proo v. State, the Court of Appeals held that it is apparent that the intent of the legislature in its 1988 amendment to § 40-6-391 was to make uniform the standards for different types of intoxication, i.e., to apply the "less safe" standard to both alcohol and drug intoxication, and that its intent was clearly not the repeal of criminal sanctions for driving under the influence of alcohol.

In State v. Kachwalla, the Georgia Supreme Court held that because "less safe to drive" found in § 40-6-391(a) and "rendered incapable of driving safely" found in § 40-6-391(b) set the same standard of impairment necessary to establish that a driver is driving under the influence of alcohol or other intoxicating substance, one accused of violating § 40-6-391(a)(2) does not suffer unconstitutional disparate treatment under the statute.

In Lockett v. State, the Court of Appeals concluded that the General Assembly used the terms "alcohol concentration" expressed in grams and "percent . . . by weight of alcohol" interchangeably. Alcohol concentration expressed in grams and percentage of alcohol by weight are simply two phrases which indicate blood alcohol level is measured using the weight of pure alcohol in a certain volume of blood. When the terms are considered in their statutory context, it is clear the General Assembly was concerned with providing accurate evidence as to the amount of alcohol or drug in a person's blood at the alleged time, regardless of whether the chemical test is performed on the driver's blood, breath, or urine. Thus, the trial court did not err by denying the defendant's motion to suppress because the Intoxilyzer 5000 rendered his results in "alcohol concentration" rather than "by weight of alcohol" as required by § 40-6-391(i).

In Noble v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court rejected the defendant's claim that § 40-6-391(a)(5) was unconstitutionally vague because the term "breath" was not defined therein. When measured by a common understanding of the term, the court found that § 40-6-391(a)(5) provided more than adequate notice to a person of ordinary intelligence that driving with an alcohol concentration in excess of 0.08 grams, as measured by grams of alcohol per liters of breath, was criminal conduct.

3. Jury Instructions

A charge to the jury that includes all of the provisions of § 40-6-391(a), although some of them are not applicable, may confuse or mislead the jury and may be reversible error.

A charge defining "alcohol concentration" as "grams of alcohol per 100 milliliters of blood or grams of alcohol per 210 liters of breath" should not be give to a jury where it is not relevant to the case and would only confuse and mislead the jury.

An instruction on driving under the influence that does not inform the jury that it may convict the defendant of DUI based on the odor of alcohol alone, or unduly emphasize evidence of such an odor, but specifically informs the jury that such an odor alone is insufficient evidence upon which to base a conviction would not be erroneous.

4. Indictments or Accusations

The phrase "driving under the influence," with respect to both alcohol and drugs, and the phrase "to the extent it is less safe for the person to drive" are not two separate elements but are equivalent concepts describing the same physical condition. Thus, an indictment that alleges that the defendant was "driving under the influence . . . contrary to the laws of [this] State" is sufficient to charge the defendant with a crime under § 40-6-391. The failure to also allege "to the extent that it was less safe for the person to drive" would not require the quashing of the indictment.

An indictment charging a defendant with driving under the influence of alcohol or drugs, which does not specify "to the extent it was less safe for the person to drive," is an indictment that charges the defendant with violating § 40-6-391(a) in one of the three ways specified by subsections (a)(1), (2), or (3) [now (4)]. Such an indictment, however, would not put a defendant on notice that he or she could be convicted under § 40-6-391(a)(4) or

(5) [now (a)(5) or (6)], which do not contain the phrase "under the influence" and do not require the state to prove impaired driving ability. Thus, an indictment, which alleges that the defendant caused the death of the victim by driving his vehicle "in reckless disregard for the safety of persons and property by driving under the influence of drugs," only puts the defendant on notice that he can be convicted if the drugs made him a less safe driver under § 40-6-391(a)(2). The indictment does not put the defendant on notice that he can be convicted solely on the physical act of driving with any amount of drugs in his blood or urine under § 40-6-391(a)(5) [now (a)(6)]. Because this indictment only alleges that the defendant was "driving under the influence of drugs" and thus only puts him on notice that he can be convicted of vehicular homicide based on a violation of § 40-6-391(a)(2), the defendant cannot be found guilty based on a violation of § 40-6-391(a)(5) [now (a)(6)].

While it is impermissible to join distinct offenses in a single count of an indictment or accusation, the Georgia Supreme Court has held in Lester v. State that § 40-6-391 establishes one crime and that subsections (a)(1) and (a)(4) [now (a)(5)] merely set out two different methods of proving the same crime. An indictment or accusation is not subject to the objection of duplicity or multifariousness where these alternative methods of violating § 40-6-391(a) are alleged in a single count. Further, it has been held that an accusation charging a violation of § 40-6-391, which does not specify whether subsection (a)(1) or (a)(4) [now (a)(5)] will be the method of proof used, is not harmful error. Where the state does charge the defendant with two alternative counts of DUI arising from the same conduct, a defect in one count does not affect the validity of the other, alternative count. The state is not required to elect to prosecute under one subsection or the other. Where there is evidence to support a verdict of guilty under either subsection, the jury is not required to disclose the subsection on which it based its verdict. It is clear, however, that the substantive double jeopardy rule forbids convictions being entered under both subsections predicated on the same conduct. If the offenses charged under both subsections are based on the same conduct, they merge under the rule.

Where a defendant is tried on an accusation which charges him with violating only § 40-6-391(a)(4) [now (a)(5)], the state cannot prove the defendant violated § 40-6-391(a) other than by driving while having 0.12 percent [now 0.08 percent] or more by weight of alcohol in his blood. Accordingly, circumstantial evidence of the defendant's intoxication at the time of his arrest would not be admissible in the case as proof that he had violated § 40-6-391(a)(1). Such evidence is, however, admissible as evidence of the circumstances surrounding the defendant's arrest for having violated § 40-6-391(a)(4) [now (a)(5)].

In Purser v. State, the Court of Appeals construed § 40-6-391(a)(4) [now (a)(5)] to prohibit both driving with a blood-alcohol concentration of 0.12 grams [now 0.08 grams] or more and driving with a blood-alcohol concentration that measures 0.12 grams [now 0.08 grams] or more at any time within three hours of ceasing to drive. Under this construction, the state does not have the burden of proving that a person registering such a blood-alcohol concentration shortly after driving also possessed such a blood-alcohol concentration at the time he was in control of the vehicle.

Where the defendant is charged with violating § 40-6-391(a)(3) [now (a)(4)], that the evidence showed use only of alcohol and not of drugs does not create a fatal variance between the accusation and the proof.

Where the defendant is charged with violating § 40-6-391(a)(6) by having marijuana and its metabolites present in his urine while driving, the fact that the evidence deals with metabolites in the blood rather than in the urine does not create a fatal variance between the accusation and the proof. The presence of marijuana metabolites in the blood is circumstantial evidence from which a jury can conclude that they were also present in the urine, as specifically charged.

The definition of "marijuana" contained in the Controlled Substances Act is inapplicable to offenses indicted under the Motor Vehicles Act. The definition of "marijuana" contained in the Motor Vehicles Act includes tetrahydrocannabinol (THC) in the definition for purposes of determining whether one is driving under the influence thereof. Indeed, since THC in the blood or urine is the method by which the presence of marijuana is detected, THC must be considered "marijuana" in order for § 40-6-391(a)(6) to even be actionable. Thus, no fatal variance exists between an allegation of driving under the influence of marijuana and proof of the presence of THC in the defendant's urine.

The terms "alcohol concentration" and "grams" as used in an accusation are not necessary facts which the state is required to prove, and the state's failure to offer proof in those specific terms does not amount to a fatal variance between the allegata and probata. The word "concentration" as used in an accusation does not mean something other than "the amount of alcohol in a person's blood." Moreover, although the test results are expressed in numbers which represent the percentage of alcohol in the blood by weight, or grams, those results frequently have been referred to without qualifying them with either the term "percent" or the term "grams." Thus, evidence adduced that shows test results of 0.12 and 0.11 would be sufficient to show an unlawful blood alcohol level.

The inclusion on the Uniform Traffic Citation (UTC) of a test result does not preclude the state from proving its case by other admissible evidence. The test result, which is noted on the UTC in a separate section pertaining to tests administered, is simply not a part of the formal charge made. Although such notations and remarks on a UTC may apprise the defendant of the nature of the charges against him, that does not necessarily mean they constitute formal allegations which must be proven at trial.

Where no prosecution has actually commenced on a Uniform Traffic Citation (UTC), the fact that the charges in a subsequent accusation are different from those in the UTC issued to the defendant does not affect the accusation's validity.

A Uniform Traffic Citation (UTC) charging a violation of § 40-6-391(a)(1) to (5) alleges a single statutory offense. The various subsections under § 40-6-391(a) are not different offenses in and of themselves, but different methods of proving a violation of § 40-6-391(a), which may be charged in one count. Thus, the UTC would not be subject to a motion to quash on the basis that it charges more than one offense.

Where a Uniform Traffic Citation (UTC) uses the term "DUI" and indicates a violation of "Code Section 40-6-391," it would put a defendant on notice that he could be prosecuted for less safe DUI, per se DUI, or both.

If the accusation refers to the DUI statute, § 40-6-391, the absence of the statutory language "drive or be in actual physical control of a moving vehicle" does not render the accusation defective, technically or otherwise.

The description of the DUI offense charged prevails over any provision of the DUI statute cited. Thus, where the count charges the accused with "unlawfully driv[ing] a moving vehicle while there was any amount of marijuana in the accused's urine," which clearly tracks the language of § 40-6-391(a)(6), it is not rendered misleading by the fact that it incorrectly cites subsection (a)(5) rather than (a)(6). Since this count would properly place the accused on notice that he is being charged under § 40-6-391(a)(6), which clearly prohibits the presence of "metabolites" in the driver's urine, it is of no consequence that the count does not specifically set forth that the accused unlawfully drove a moving vehicle with a "metabolite" of marijuana.

The trial court may submit the issue of driving under the influence to the jury even though the accusation does not state the date on which the offense occurred. When the date is not an essential element of the case, the state is only required to prove that the incident occurred within the two year statute of limitation period prior to the filing of the accusation.

5. Actus Reus

The crime of driving under the influence to the extent that it is less safe to drive consists of three actus reus elements: (1) the driving or actual physical control of a moving vehicle, (2) the circumstance of being under the influence, and (3) impaired driving ability. Although the third element requires proof of impaired driving ability, it does not require proof of an actual unsafe act. No mens rea is specified by the statute, so nothing more than voluntary action need be shown.

As for the actus reus of driving or being in actual physical control of a moving vehicle, under a predecessor statute, which defined the actus reus as "operating" a vehicle, it was held that steering the car after a push by others was covered by the statute. It would seem that being in actual physical control of a moving vehicle, under the current statutory language, would also cover such a situation. On the other hand, the holding in Flournoy v. State, which construed the term "operating" to include sitting in a stationary car with the motor running, would apparently no longer be valid because of the requirement of a moving vehicle by § 40-6-391. However, in Phillips v. State, the facts were similar to those in the Flournoy case, but the court held that although no one saw the defendant driving the vehicle, the circumstantial evidence demonstrated that he had been in physical control of a moving vehicle shortly before the police arrived. It should be noted, however, that it is not a crime merely to occupy a parked automobile while under the influence of alcohol.

As for the actus reus of being under the influence, the question has arisen as to what being "under the influence" means. It is clear that it need not be proven that the defendant was in a total stupor. In Harper v. State, the court held that the state must show that the defendant's intoxication was such that it was less safe to operate the vehicle than it would have been if he were not affected by the intoxicating liquor. Although this standard can be described as a minimal one, the Harper court rejected a jury instruction which authorized a conviction where the defendant was under the influence of an intoxicant "to any extent whatsoever." In Wallace v. State, on the other hand, the court held that a charge is harmfully incomplete where it does not inform the jury that being under the influence of alcohol means that consumption of alcohol has rendered the defendant a less safe driver. In Gilmore v. State, the court held that the investigating officer's detection of a strong odor of alcohol on the defendant and the defendant's involvement in an accident constitutes evidence of impaired driving ability caused by alcohol.

It should be noted, however, that the statute does not require the state to show that the person actually committed an unsafe act, nor does it require the jury to find that the driver was actually unsafe. The statute simply requires a finding that the person was a less safe driver than he would have been if he were not under the influence of alcohol. Thus, under the statute, a jury can consistently find that a person's driving, although not unsafe, was less safe than if the person were not under the influence of alcohol.

Where the defendant has been charged with violating § 40-6-391(a)(3), the state is required to prove only that the defendant was under the influence of a glue, aerosol, or other toxic vapor to the extent that it was less safe for him to drive. Because the presence of a specific chemical is not an essential element of the crime, the state is not required to prove the chemical composition of the inhalant. Rather, the identity of the inhalant may be established circumstantially.

As for the actus reus of being under the influence "per se," the state does not have to prove that the defendant was a less safe driver by virtue of his intoxication. A showing that the defendant's blood-alcohol concentration was 0.08 grams or more is all that is necessary to prove that he is under the influence. Moreover, the state does not have to prove that the defendant was under the influence at the time of driving. The state need only prove that the defendant's blood-alcohol concentration was 0.08 grams or more at the time of the test or at any time within three hours of driving or being in control of a vehicle.

As for the actus reus of having any amount of a controlled substance present in the defendant's blood or urine, or both, a showing that the defendant's blood or urine contained an amount greater than zero is all that is required. The state is not required to prove that the defendant's driving ability was impaired or that he was a less safe driver. If there is conflicting evidence concerning the presence of the controlled substance in the defendant's blood, a finding by the trier of fact that the evidence showing its presence was more reliable than that showing its absence will not be disturbed on appeal if there is any evidence to sustain the finding.

It has been held that merely observing a can of beer in the hand of one who is otherwise driving a car in a safe manner does, in and of itself, constitute an articulable suspicion that a violation of § 40-6-391 may be occurring so as to authorize a brief investigatory stop. Even though such an observation may not demonstrate probable cause to believe that such a violation is actually occurring, it does demonstrate an articulable suspicion warranting further investigation into whether the imbibing operator of the car nevertheless has a blood-alcohol level of .12 percent [now 0.08 percent] or greater.

The exact location is not a material element of driving under the influence, and an accusation is sufficiently certain if it charges that the offense was committed in a particular county.

6. Admissibility of Evidence

a. Opinions and Observations as to Intoxication

The admissibility of certain kinds of evidence has been litigated often in connection with the current and predecessor statutes. It has been held that lay witnesses can express their opinions as to intoxication; police officers can express their opinions as to intoxication and as to the extent of intoxication that would render the defendant a less safe driver; and testimony regarding the speed and manner of driving is admissible to show intoxication. Evidence of post-driving drinking can be used to show drinking while driving, but testimony that the witness has seen the defendant drinking at other times is not admissible. However, if a defense witness testifies that the defendant did not appear intoxicated on the day of his arrest, the state is entitled to cross-examine that witness to determine the facts upon which the witness's observation was based, including the witness's observations of the defendant's drinking on previous occasions.

A mug shot that has been identified as fairly and accurately representing the defendant's appearance shortly after his arrest is admissible where the incident of driving under the influence is being re-created for the jury and the defendant's appearance is "some evidence" of his intoxication.

The failure to give Miranda warnings does not require the suppression of a police officer's testimony about his mere observations of the suspect at the scene of the traffic stop.

b. Field Sobriety Test Results

If there exists a reasonable and articulable suspicion that a driver may be intoxicated, he may be detained by the police and field sobriety tests may be administered in order to determine whether he had been driving under the influence. In order for the field sobriety test results to be admissible at trial, the state must offer evidence that the arresting officer had a reasonable and articulable suspicion to justify the administration of the tests. The trial court must closely scrutinize the facts of the case to ensure that reasonable suspicion actually was present at the initiation of the DUI investigation and was not invented after the arrest to cover a scheme of screening routine traffic stops without observing constitutional safeguards. Routine traffic stops cannot be used as a screening device for DUI offenders absent specific facts authorizing such inquiry in a case.

A screening officer at a roadblock need only be sufficiently trained to enable him to make a determination as to which motorists should be asked to take the field sobriety tests. Evidence of the officer's considerable experience in handling DUI arrests would be sufficient to establish his ability to make a reasoned judgment as to which motorists should be asked to take the tests.

Although there is no statutory scheme covering field sobriety tests and other initial screening tests, lack of such a scheme does not prevent the admission of field sobriety test results into evidence at trial. A law enforcement officer who has been properly qualified may testify about the effects of alcohol consumption on the body and how field sobriety tests are designed to detect someone who has been drinking. The officer may testify regarding these tests without first requiring expert testimony as a foundation for admission.

The results of field sobriety tests constitute admissible evidence of probable cause to support an arrest for driving under the influence. The fact that the arresting officer did not fully comply with every National Highway Traffic Safety Administration guideline for administration of the tests does not destroy the probative value of the tests and render them inadmissible, but affects only the weight and credibility of the behavioral observations made by the officer.

Because a defendant generally is not in custody or under arrest at the time field sobriety tests are administered, Miranda warnings generally are not necessary prior to administering the tests. The fact that the defendant may have no apparent way of leaving or that he owes a legal duty to remain at the scene for other reasons does not mean that he is in custody for Miranda purposes. Furthermore, the results of field sobriety tests given without the benefit of Miranda warnings need not be excluded under the Fifth Amendment of the United States Constitution because the results of these tests are not evidence of a testimonial or communicative nature. Likewise, any slurring of speech and other evidence of lack of muscular coordination revealed by a defendant's responses to an officer's direct questions constitute nontestimonial components of those responses and thus are not inadmissible. Even if the defendant's performance on the tests is influenced by his relatively minor injuries, this would be a factor affecting the weight of this evidence, not its admissibility. If the trial court finds, however, that the defendant was under arrest at the time he took the field sobriety tests and that the officer failed to give the required Miranda warnings, it is proper for the trial court to suppress the field sobriety test results. In order to make this finding the trial court must determine whether the officer made any statement or overt act that would cause a reasonable person to believe that he was under arrest and not temporarily detained during the investigation. The officer's "belief" that probable cause existed to make the arrest does not determine when the arrest was effectuated.

If the defendant is not under arrest at the time of his refusal to perform additional field sobriety tests, his refusal would not be protected by the privilege against self-incrimination. Accordingly, evidence of his refusal would be admissible at trial.

Section 40-6-392 deals only with chemical tests for alcohol or drugs in blood. It is inapplicable to field sobriety tests. Accordingly, the General Assembly's failure to state in § 40-6-392 that the refusal to submit to field sobriety tests is admissible in evidence against a defendant is neither significant nor an indication of legislative intent to make such refusals inadmissible in evidence.

The horizontal gaze nystagmus (HGN) test can provide competent evidence that the defendant was impaired by some substance. Although this evidence might not be sufficient to sustain a conviction for driving under the influence of marijuana, this sign of impairment together with red, glassy eyes and the smell of marijuana can be used to determine whether probable cause exists to arrest a person for driving under the influence.

The horizontal gaze nystagmus (HGN) test is an accepted, common procedure that has reached a state of verifiable certainty in the scientific community and is admissible as a basis upon which an officer can determine that a driver was impaired by alcohol. Evidence of the HGN test is admissible without first requiring expert testimony as a foundation for its admission. The HGN test is admissible as valid to show a symptom indicative of, though not determinative of, the presence of alcohol. An arresting officer's testimony that the HGN test results showed a certain level of impairment caused by alcohol is also admissible. An officer's testimony about his observations while administering the HGN test are admissible even though he is not qualified to testify about the results of the test. Evidence of the improper administration of the HGN test goes to the weight of the test and not to its admissibility. It has yet to be decided whether the results of the "hippus" test would be admissible as evidence of being under the influence.

If the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration's rules and procedures for administering sobriety tests are not part of a police officer's training in Georgia, the cross-examination of an officer regarding these rules and procedures would be irrelevant. Furthermore, if the state chooses to have the officer testify as a lay witness and describe the actions of the defendant in performing the sobriety tests without referring to NHTSA procedures, cross-examination on these procedures is irrelevant, regardless of whether the officer is trained in them or not.

A conviction under § 40-6-391(a)(5) does not require the state to prove impaired driving ability. Thus, even if the results of the field sobriety tests should have been excluded, it is highly probable that such error would not contribute to the judgment. The breath test results alone would provide sufficient proof of the per se violation. Any error in denying a defendant's motion to suppress the results of the field sobriety tests would therefore be harmless.

In Howell v. State, the court held that the trial court did not err in instructing the jury that "[f]ield sobriety evaluations, as with any other form of evaluation, may be subject to human error in their administration or interpretation, and the burden of showing such errors rests with the party who is challenging the weight of said evidence." The jury instruction did not relate to any element of the crime. It was merely an application of the principle, as contained in § 24-4-1, that the burden of proving a fact generally lies upon the party who is asserting it. The charge was not burden shifting under Sandstrom.

c. Silent Witness Law

Under the silent witness theory, a videotape of the commission of an alleged DUI offense constitutes independent probative evidence of what it shows. Authentication of the subject videotape is always required. The foundational requirements for the admissibility of videotapes under the silent witness theory are (1) expert testimony establishing that the videotape had not been altered or manipulated; (2) testimony establishing the date and place the videotape was taken; and (3) testimony establishing the identity of the relevant participants depicted. The admission of a videotape under the silent witness theory does not violate the rights provided to the defendant by the Confrontation Clause.

In 1996, the General Assembly enacted the silent witness law which establishes significantly different foundational requirements for the admissibility of a videotape in the absence of an authenticating witness. By this enactment, the General Assembly has implicitly rejected the theory adopted by the Court of Appeals. Section 24-4-48 provides for the admissibility of a videotape when the authenticating witness is unavailable and when the videotape tends to show reliably the fact or facts for which it is offered. This Code section also provides for the admissibility of a videotape made by a self-operating camera, such as a patrol car camera, when the videotape tends to show reliably the fact or facts for which it is offered. However, the date and time must be contained on the videotape and must be shown to have been made contemporaneously with the events depicted. The chain of custody requirement does not apply to such a videotape because it is a distinct and recognizable physical object that can be identified upon observation.

d. Defendant's Statements or Responses to Arresting Officer

When a police officer is conducting a preliminary on-the-scene investigation to determine the nature of the situation, no Miranda warning is necessary, and the driver's statements or responses to the officer's questions are admissible. The fact that the officer retains the driver's license for a short period during the course of the investigation does not necessarily mean that the driver is in custody, even if at that point, by leaving, the driver could be arrested for violating state law. Furthermore, because ordinary traffic stops do not involve custody for purposes of Miranda, evidence is not inadmissible for lack of Miranda warnings. However, if the trial court finds that the driver was under arrest at the scene of the initial stop and the officer failed to give the required warnings, it is proper for the trial court to suppress reference to conversations between the driver and the police. But if the driver while in custody made his statements voluntarily and not in response to any form of custodial questioning and interrogation by the police, his statements would not be inadmissible for lack of Miranda warnings. However, a remark made by an officer after the driver's arrest, which the officer should have known was reasonably likely to elicit an incriminating response from the driver, would amount to interrogation. In the absence of Miranda warnings, the driver's post-arrest response to such a remark would be involuntary and therefore inadmissible.

Under our criminal discovery provisions, the defendant is entitled to have a copy of any statement made by him while in police custody. However, since a preliminary on-the-scene investigation does not constitute a custodial situation, the state is not required to furnish to the defendant statements he made to an officer at the scene. Thus, the state's failure to produce those statements for the defense pursuant to a demand under the discovery provisions does not render those statements inadmissible.

e. Defendant's Identification as Driver of Vehicle

In a DUI trial, when the factual issue of the identity of the driver is brought into dispute by the testimony of a defense witness that he, and not the defendant, had been driving the vehicle at the time of the accident, the state may introduce a hospital intake report made after the accident, showing that the defense witness had stated that he had been the passenger. Once a proper foundation has been laid, the report is admissible as a business record to impeach the defense witness by proof of a prior inconsistent statement which happened to be recorded in the ordinary course of the hospital's intake procedures.

Testimony by an officer, who did not observe the defendant operating the vehicle, that he was informed by another at the scene of the arrest and in the presence of the defendant that the defendant had been operating the vehicle is admissible under the res gestae exception to the hearsay rule.

A deputy coroner, who is a licensed paramedic and whose testimony is carefully limited by the trial court to the manner and cause of the defendant's and the victim's injuries, may testify that the defendant's injuries were consistent with a finding that he was the driver of the vehicle at issue.

f. Defendant's Alcohol Consumption

Because a defendant's reputation for sobriety does not tend to prove or disprove whether the defendant's alcohol consumption on the night in question rendered him a less safe driver, such evidence is irrelevant and therefore not admissible.

Where there is evidence that the defendant participated in drinking at a neighbor's apartment, it would not be an abuse of discretion for the trial court to admit evidence that other individuals in the neighbor's apartment were also drinking alcohol.

g. Defendant's Prior DUI Offenses

Where there are sufficient similarities between prior offenses and the offense charged in a DUI case, the admission of the prior offenses is warranted to show course of conduct and bent of mind. The fact that the defendant did not "contest" the prior offenses is of no relevance in determining whether they were of sufficient factual similarity to warrant their admission for those purposes. Because the admission of evidence of prior offenses is the exception rather than the rule, the state has the burden of ensuring that the necessary requirements are met before such evidence may be admitted. This includes ensuring that the defendant is given sufficient notice of the state's intent to present evidence of the prior offenses, that the hearing on the prior offenses is taken down or recorded, and that the trial court's determination that the state has made the three affirmative showings is on the record. Otherwise, the admission of such evidence is improper. It should also be noted that a limiting instruction about the specific purpose for which the prior offenses can be considered must be given to the jury by the trial court upon request by the defense. Unless the defense has explicitly requested that the limiting instruction be given immediately upon the admission of evidence of prior offenses or otherwise has asserted any such right, the trial court's giving of the limiting instruction in its closing charge to the jury would not constitute reversible error.

h. Officer's Entry into Defendant's Home

Upon a showing of probable cause to arrest for the offenses of DUI or reckless driving, either of these offenses would be sufficiently serious criminal activity to justify an officer's warrantless, nonconsensual entry into a suspect's home to arrest him, if exigent circumstances exist to justify the entry. Where the officer has no probable cause to arrest the suspect for DUI before entry is made into his home, the suspicion that the suspect drove his car under the influence of alcohol would provide no basis for the officer's entry into the home to investigate that suspicion without a warrant or consent. Even if there is probable cause to arrest the suspect for reckless driving before entry is made into the home, since the reckless operation of the car and the consequent threat to public safety would be at an end, exigent circumstances would no longer exist justifying a nonconsensual, warrantless entry to arrest for this offense. Under these circumstances, any questioning of the suspect inside his home would violate his Fourth Amendment right to be secure in his home from unreasonable searches or seizures. Thus, all evidence obtained during the questioning would be inadmissible at trial. However, other evidence obtained after the suspect has complied with the officer's request to step outside his home would still be admissible.

i. Officer's Search of Vehicle

When an officer arrests a driver for DUI, the officer may conduct a warrantless search of the passenger compartment of the driver's vehicle for the purpose of obtaining evidence of intoxication.

j. Officer's Response to Defendant

An intake officer's response, as testified to by the defendant to prove the truth of her testimony that she had requested an independent test, would be an out-of-court statement inadmissible under the hearsay rule.

k. Expert Testimony

An expert witness may testify as to what effect a 0.16 Blood Alcohol Content (BAC) has on a person's ability to drive a motor vehicle. The qualitative relationship between a quantitative BAC and driving ability is beyond the ken of the average juror.

An arresting officer with over four years of law enforcement experience, training in DUI detection and field sobriety testing, and involvement in over a hundred DUI arrests would be qualified to testify about the effects of alcohol consumption on the body.

A defense expert, who is unfamiliar with the workings of the Intoxilyzer 5000, would not be qualified to testify as an expert on infrared breath-testing machines.

Expert testimony that the defendant's blood-alcohol content was.11 grams percent was held to be admissible, even though the defendant's blood was tested approximately two hours after the collision. Although the expert did not pinpoint the amount of alcohol in the defendant's blood at the time of the collision, he testified that it takes approximately 30 minutes for the level of blood alcohol to peak and that it diminishes over time. The clear implication of the expert's testimony was that the defendant's blood alcohol level exceeded.11 grams percent at the time of the collision.

Evidence of an independent blood test taken by the defendant several hours after his arrest is not admissible without expert testimony showing the relevancy of the test results to the defendant's blood alcohol level at the time of his arrest.

Where evidence of the defendant's exposure to paint fumes has been presented, expert testimony about the effect of substances within the paint on the defendant's breath test results is limited to the substance proven to have been present in the paint to which the defendant was exposed. The expert may not testify about the effect of other substances unless evidence providing a basis for his opinion has been admitted into evidence.

Where there is evidence of the defendant's physical activities prior to his taking the state-administered test, a defense expert should be allowed to testify about how alcohol is absorbed and eliminated by the human body, how a reading on the Intoxilyzer 5000 might be elevated because of these activities, and how another machine might possibly yield a different alcohol concentration.

A forensic expert is allowed to testify that a urine specimen that he has analyzed is positive for particular substances without quantifying the amounts. Once the arresting officer has testified to the degree of impairment as manifested by the defendant's behavior, the forensic expert is allowed to testify that such behavior would be consistent with the behavior of someone who was under the influence of those substances, and that the influence of those substances would impair the person's ability to operate an automobile safely. An expert is also allowed to testify, based on his knowledge and experience, on the characteristics of a drug that the disclosed scientific test results had shown to be present in the defendant's system.

Absent the chemical analysis referenced in former § 40-6-392(b), a defense expert's testimony about the defendant's blood alcohol content based upon the Widmark formula is irrelevant, and the only issue is whether the defendant's driving ability was impaired by alcohol to the point he was less safe to drive.

l. Certificate of Blood or Urine Analysis

Section 35-3-16, which was enacted by the General Assembly in 1994, authorized in any prosecution for the offense of driving under the influence of alcohol or drugs the admission in evidence of a sworn certificate of blood or urine analysis by a state crime lab analyst. A properly executed certificate was "admissible evidence of the composition, quality, and quantity of the substance submitted to the laboratory for analysis." This certificate, rather than the lab analyst's testimony, was to be used to authenticate the results of the blood or urine analysis.

In Miller v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court held that this certificate, as hearsay evidence, did not fit within any statutorily-recognized hearsay exception in Georgia. Since the certificate did not fall within a firmly rooted exception to the hearsay rule, the Confrontation Clause of the federal constitution barred receipt of the certificate in evidence without a preliminary showing of reliability or without determining that the lab analyst was not available to testify. The court found that the increased work demands of the state crime lab did not make a lab analyst "unavailable" to testify. The court also held that subsection (c) of § 35-3-16 did not guarantee a defendant the opportunity to cross-examine the lab analyst. A defendant's filing of an objection to the admission of the certificate only authorized the trial court to make a determination concerning the admissibility of the certificate and would not result in the lab analyst's appearance in court. When measured against the state constitution, the court found § 35-3-16 to be exceedingly troublesome. Because this Code section authorized the introduction of an ex parte affidavit into evidence against a criminal defendant, in contravention of the defendant's constitutional guaranty that he be confronted with the witnesses against him and be permitted to cross-examine them, it was unconstitutional. Also, requiring a defendant to request the presence of the witnesses against him and to explain why he requires their presence in order to be afforded his constitutional right of confrontation placed too heavy a burden on the assertion of a constitutional protection. Furthermore, the Code section impermissibly shifted the burden of proof from the state to the defendant against whom the state wished to introduce a certificate.

Apparently because of these constitutional infirmities, the General Assembly repealed § 35-3-16 in 1997.

m. Blood Alcohol Level Test Results

The test results of persons other than the defendant would shed no light on the issue of whether the defendant was under the influence of alcohol to the extent that it was less safe for him to drive. Any mere disparity between the defendant's test results and those of others charged with DUI would not be reflective of the differing effect that a given blood alcohol level might have on the ability of different individuals to drive safely. Thus, questioning a witness whether the defendant's test was low compared to those normally given to people who are charged with DUI is not allowable.

Upon a proper foundation being laid, a hospital record is admissible under the business record exception to the hearsay rule to show the test results of a hospital-administered test of the defendant's blood alcohol level. Since the hospital record is admissible under this exception, it bears an "indicia of reliability" sufficient to satisfy the Confrontation Clause.

Valid breath test results, which are otherwise determined to be inadmissible on procedural grounds, may be properly admitted for impeachment purposes.

The length of time one is detained in a police car before being transported to jail affects the weight, not the admissibility, of breath test results.

A photocopy of the results of the state-administered test showing the defendant's blood-alcohol level may be admitted into evidence without accounting for the original.

The results of a random drug test administered by a probation office shortly after a probationer's DUI arrest would be relevant to his defense. The statutorily created privilege protecting the confidentiality of probation records must, under these circumstances, yield to an accused's constitutional right to information which is material to his defense. Because the administrative process to obtain information contained in probation records fails to include any requirement for timeliness of production or the automatic right to material essential to a defense in a criminal proceeding, there is no merit to the position that the procedures set forth in the statute provide the accused with an adequate means to obtain the confidential records. Therefore, under these circumstances, the statute unconstitutionally limits the accused's constitutional right to compulsory process.

An acquittal on a per se DUI charge in one trial does not necessarily include a finding that the breath test results are unreliable for any purpose. The fact that some level of alcohol was detected in the defendant's system after his arrest would be relevant to a less safe driver charge in a second trial of the defendant. Thus, the state is not precluded by the doctrine of collateral estoppel from introducing evidence of the breath test results in the second trial.

7. Sufficiency of Evidence

As for the quantum of evidence sufficient to support a § 40-6-391 conviction, the leading case is Stephens v. State. In Stephens there was no direct evidence of the defendant having driven the car in question, the only witnesses having first seen him staggering up an embankment away from a car. The blood test establishing intoxication was not administered until one hour after the accident. Faced with a line of cases seeming to require direct testimony from a witness who had seen the defendant driving, the court affirmed the conviction based on the positive blood test and the defendant's admission that he had been alone in the car. The mere failure of direct testimony of anyone who saw the defendant driving did not, in the court's view, preclude a finding of guilt. Also, it has been held that the absence of testimony concerning the defendant's unsafe driving would be immaterial to establishing a violation of the statute.

"If circumstantial evidence may be used in establishing" more serious crimes, the court in Stephens v. State opined, "[T]here is simply no logic . . . for holding that it cannot be used in establishing the guilt of one charged with [DUI]." The prior contrary cases were overruled. The Stephens rule has since been applied to affirm a conviction in a case where the defendant made no admission at all. It should be noted that the confession of a defendant alone is not sufficient for a conviction. As in other crimes, there must be corroborating evidence from another source to establish the corpus delicti.

When driving under the influence of alcohol is alleged, the presence of alcohol must be proven by the state. Even though there is evidence of unsafe driving, unless there is some evidence of alcohol indicia, the evidence will be insufficient to convict the defendant of driving under the influence of alcohol.

In Campbell v. State, the officer, prior to stopping the defendant for another matter, did not see anything about the defendant's driving that indicated he was driving under the influence of alcohol. However, the court held that evidence of the alcohol content of the defendant's blood combined with evidence of the defendant's bloodshot eyes and unsteadiness on his feet was sufficient to convict the defendant of driving under the influence of alcohol.

In Hurd v. State, after the defendant was stopped at a roadblock, the officer noticed a strong odor of alcohol and that the defendant's eyes were red. Also, the defendant's intoximeter test registered.10 approximately 30 minutes after the stop. The court held that this evidence was sufficient to convict the defendant and that the evidence introduced by the defendant did not rebut as a matter of law the presumption of intoxication created by the intoximeter test results. It should be noted that the statutory basis for this presumption of intoxication was eliminated by the General Assembly in 2001.

In Banks v. State, the officer testified that the results of the state-administered tests were.121 and.116 and that the machine tested specifically for alcohol. The jury was charged concerning the statutory definitions of alcohol concentration and the requirements for conviction. The court held that even though no evidence was presented explaining the meaning of ".121 and.116," the evidence was sufficient to support the defendant's conviction of driving with an unlawful alcohol concentration.

In Potts v. State, the court held that where the defendant had refused to take the state-requested test, an officer's opinion based upon his experience and observations that the defendant was intoxicated to the extent that he was a less safe driver was sufficient to support a conviction. However, in Clay v. State, the court concluded that the officer's opinion that the defendant was under the influence of alcohol to the extent that it was less safe for him to drive was without evidentiary foundation. The jury rejected the results of the defendant's intoximeter test as being unreliable, based on the testimony of his expert. The sole evidentiary basis offered by the officer for his opinion consisted of his observations that the defendant's "eyes were red and glassy, and he had an odor of alcoholic beverage about his breath." However, it was established without dispute that the defendant's eyes normally appeared red and bloodshot, and the mere fact that he had an odor of alcohol on his breath clearly was not sufficient, in and of itself, to give rise to an inference that he was intoxicated. Like Clay, the jury in Gilbert v. State rejected the results of the defendant's intoximeter test. However, unlike Clay, the officer's testimony showing that the defendant was in an intoxicated state was not the sole evidence adduced to support the defendant's conviction. The officer also testified that he discovered the defendant at the scene of an accident beside a damaged vehicle that the defendant admitted driving. The court held that the officer's testimony was sufficient to support the defendant's conviction.

In Davis v. State, even less evidence was presented in support of the verdict than was adduced in Clay. In Davis, two witnesses testified that they observed the defendant drinking out of a beer can earlier in the evening before the accident, and the investigating officers testified that they smelled alcohol at the accident scene but could not trace the source. The court held that evidence that defendant consumed alcohol did not prove that he was under the influence of alcohol to the extent he was a less safe driver, and that evidence that the officers smelled alcohol at the scene was also insufficient, especially given other evidence that passengers with the defendant had been drinking as well. Additionally, although there was evidence that the defendant was a less safe driver, no evidence was adduced to show that he was a less safe driver as a result of being under the influence of alcohol. Moreover, the defendant rebutted the charge of DUI by introducing the results of a blood test performed three hours after the accident, which was negative for alcohol and drugs.

In Sieveking v. State, the intoximeter test was administered but its results were suppressed because of an inadequate implied consent notice. Nevertheless, the evidence was sufficient to support the conviction for driving under the influence. In addition to the officer's testimony that the defendant showed all six possible indications of impairment on the HGN test, the officer testified that he showed four of eight possible clues of impairment when performing the heel-to-toe test. The alcosensor test was positive, there was an odor of alcoholic beverage from inside the car, the defendant's eyes were glassy, and he was unsteady on his feet. The court held that the jury was authorized to consider these as reliable indicators that the defendant was impaired by alcohol to the extent it was less safe for him to drive.

The manner of the defendant's driving can support a reasonable inference that, as a result of alcohol consumption, the defendant was a less safe driver. In Heath v. State, the trial court refused to admit the blood test results into evidence because the state failed to lay a proper foundation for admission. Nevertheless, there was evidence that while at the emergency room following the accident, the officer saw the defendant exhibiting signs of intoxication in that he had a strong odor of alcohol and was acting in a belligerent manner. In addition to signs of intoxication, evidence of the accident showed that despite good driving conditions, the defendant slammed with great force into the rear of a clearly visible car stopped in his lane of traffic without applying his brakes. The Court of Appeals held that there was evidence authorizing a reasonable inference that only a short time passed between the time of the accident and the time of the officer's observations of the defendant's signs of intoxication. The manner in which the accident occurred, i.e., the defendant's failure to apply brakes prior to the collision, also supported a reasonable inference that, as a result of alcohol consumption, the defendant was not as alert or physically capable and was a less safe driver. In Gentry v. State, the court held that evidence that the defendant was driving under the influence of alcohol and cocaine, along with evidence that the fatal collision occurred when he lost control of the vehicle while traveling at a high rate of speed in excess of the posted speed limit, was sufficient to allow the jury to conclude that the defendant was a less safe driver as a result of the influence of the alcohol and cocaine. In Lanier v. State, the court held there was sufficient evidence to show that the defendant operated his vehicle in a less safe manner. The officer testified that the defendant failed to heed his audible and visible signals to stop at the intersection where road flares and flashing blue lights had been posted. After the defendant traveled an additional 100 yards before stopping, the officer detected a strong odor of alcohol about the defendant and that his eyes were red, his speech was slurred, and he was unsteady on his feet.

In Johnson v. State, the court found that the defendant's refusal to take the state-administered chemical test was circumstantial evidence of his intoxication. Furthermore, although the videotape of the stop refuted the officer's testimony that the defendant's speech was slurred, the officer also testified that the defendant's eyes were bloodshot, his pupils dilated, and his face was flushed. Additionally, the officer testified about the manner in which the defendant was driving, specifically that he came up fast behind other cars and abruptly passed them. Finally, although there were deviations from protocol in the manner in which the field sobriety tests were conducted, the videotape clearly showed that the defendant failed on several occasions to follow the officer's instructions on how to perform the tests, which was an indicator that he was under the influence of intoxicants. The court held that the evidence was sufficient to authorize the trier of fact to find that the defendant was under the influence to the extent that it was less safe for him to drive.

The failure of an officer to testify to any less safe behavior on the defendant's part does not render the evidence insufficient to support the conviction. An officer's opinion is not critical to establish the fact of the defendant's less safe driving, as the trier of fact can form its own opinion based on the indicia pointing to that fact. For instance, the circumstantial evidence of the defendant's physical appearance and demeanor would be sufficient for the trier of fact to determine that the defendant was less safe to drive in his condition.

Evidence that the defendant had ingested cocaine is by itself insufficient to support a conviction of driving under the influence in violation of § 40-6-391(a)(2). There must be additional evidence from which the jury can infer that the defendant was under the influence of cocaine to the extent that he was a less safe driver, such as evidence of his physical condition or conduct at the time of arrest. Evidence presented by expert witnesses indicating the adverse physical and psychological effects of cocaine in the system is sufficient evidence from which a jury can infer that such adverse effects on the defendant's body and psyche could have rendered him a "less safe" driver.

Notwithstanding the Intoxilyzer 5000's margin of error, properly admitted Intoxilyzer results would provide ample evidence of a defendant's guilt of a per se charge.

Expert testimony to the effect that the defendant's blood-alcohol content at the time of the accident was between.105 and .13 percent was held sufficient when combined with other evidence, even though the analysis of the defendant's blood sample obtained following the accident revealed a blood-alcohol content of .08 percent.

Evidence establishing that the defendant's test results indicated a blood alcohol concentration of.21 grams percent along with expert testimony from a trauma team nurse and physician that the defendant was under the influence of alcohol upon his arrival at the hospital to the extent that his motor abilities and reaction time were impaired by alcohol was held sufficient to allow the jury to conclude that the defendant was under the influence of alcohol to the extent that he was a less safe driver.

Where there is no evidence as to the alcohol content of the blood, in order to find one guilty of driving under the influence there must be some definite evidence as to the quantity of alcohol consumed and as to the time span over which the alcohol was consumed. However, the failure to show the quantity of alcohol consumed and the time span in which it was consumed will not prevent a trier of fact from determining whether the defendant was a less safe driver where there is evidence about the defendant's conduct and his manner of unsafe driving.

8. Chemical Tests

a. Generally

Although a § 40-6-391 conviction can be obtained without the introduction of chemical tests of a bodily substance, most prosecutions do include such evidence. The introduction of evidence of chemical tests is governed by § 40-6-392. This section's detailed set of rules determines admissibility in both civil and criminal trials.

b. Licensed Individual and Certified Testing Instrument Required for State-Administered Test

In order for a test result to be considered valid, the state must prove that the test was performed according to the requirements of § 40-6-392(a)(1)(A). Substantial compliance with these statutory requirements can be established by circumstantial evidence arising from the testimony of the chemist who operated the machine and performed the test.

It should be noted that charging a jury that the chemical analysis of a person's breath "shall be considered valid" if it has been performed according to these statutory requirements creates a mandatory presumption in violation of the person's due process rights under the federal and state constitutions. Such a charge constitutes harmful error where the person's defense is that the breath-testing instrument overstated his true blood alcohol concentration and that the amount of alcohol he admitted drinking did not render him a less safe driver.

The statute requires that the test be performed according to methods approved by the Division of Forensic Sciences of the Georgia Bureau of Investigation. Approval of these methods through the Administrative Procedure Act is not required for the test results to be admissible at trial. The lack of testimony regarding the Division of Forensic Sciences' unpublished guidelines and compliance or noncompliance with them does not affect the admissibility of these results.

It is sufficient for an operator to testify to the facts upon which a trial court can base a conclusion that the chemical test complied with § 40-6-392(a)(1)(A). It is not necessary that the operator additionally testify to his opinion that the test was performed according to methods approved by the Division of Forensic Sciences.

The statute also requires that the test be performed by a competent, licensed individual; and blood used for a blood test must be drawn by a qualified person. As to this last requirement, the results of a blood test are inadmissible unless the state presents competent evidence showing that the blood was withdrawn by a person qualified under the statute. Introducing privately held records related to the blood drawer's employee training would not be an acceptable method of proving his qualifications. Given the potential impact on the defendant's right of confrontation, acceptable methods of proving the blood drawer's qualifications would be by his testimony at trial or by introducing the statutorily authorized certification. Because this certification falls within the firmly rooted hearsay exception for public records, it may be admitted to establish the qualifications of the blood drawer without violating a defendant's right of confrontation under the federal and state constitutions. Another acceptable method, added by the General Assembly in 2001, would be by the testimony, under oath, of the blood drawer's supervisor or medical records custodian that the blood drawer was properly trained and authorized to draw blood as an employee of the medical facility or employer.

A licensed individual does not have to have an expert's knowledge of the underlying scientific principles governing the functioning of the testing device. Nor does he have to know how to calibrate the device.

An Intoxilyzer's insufficient sample reading on its face fails to produce a Blood Alcohol Content evaluation. An officer/operator is not required either by statute or by GBI guidelines to go behind the insufficient sample reading and perform an evaluation of the numeric air flow volume, which may vary from subject to subject.

The statute also requires that the test be performed on a machine that is operated with all its electronic and operating components prescribed by its manufacturer properly attached and in good working order. The operation and maintenance of the machine must be approved and certified by the Division of Forensic Sciences. A 1995 Act made these requirements retroactively applicable to all cases pending on April 25, 1995.

The Division, in cooperation with the Georgia Peace Officer Standards and Training Council, must provide for the training and certification of operators of breath test equipment. A copy of the operator's certificate is prima-facie evidence in any civil, criminal, or administrative proceeding that the operator was qualified to operate the equipment.

c. State-Administered Tests

i. Initial Alcohol Screening Test

If there exists a reasonable and articulable suspicion that a person is intoxicated, he may be detained by the police and an initial alcohol screening test may be administered in order to determine if it is safe for him to drive.

Since a person is not under arrest when an initial alcohol screening breath test is administered and since § 40-6-392 is inapplicable to the initial alcohol screening breath test, there is no requirement that administration of the screening test be preceded by advising the person of his right to an independent test. Since the person is not in police custody, there is no requirement that the request to undergo the screening test be preceded by Miranda warnings. Nor is there a requirement that the request be preceded by a reading of the implied consent notice.

The results of this testing device are admissible as evidence if its design is approved by the Division of Forensic Sciences. These results are admissible to show the presence of alcohol rather than the amount of alcohol percentage. Although the state rules and regulations provide that an initial alcohol screening breath test may be performed, an arresting officer is not required to give such a test.

Because a person is not in police custody at the time the initial alcohol screening breath test is requested, the constitutional and state statutory protections against self-incrimination are not applicable. Accordingly, evidence of a person's prearrest refusal to undergo the screening test is not rendered inadmissible by the lack of Miranda warnings prior to the test.

The state is not required to establish a foundation of the alco-sensor's acceptability before evidence of a defendant's refusal to submit to testing can be admissible. Nor is the state required to establish the same foundation for admitting an alco-sensor refusal as evidence as it must to admit an alco-sensor test result as evidence when the device has not actually been used in the former situation.

Informing a suspect that he is not entitled to an attorney prior to taking an alco-sensor test but is entitled to one once arrested and taken to jail is not a misleading statement that would render evidence of the suspect's failure to take the test inadmissible.

ii. Breath-Testing Instruments

Breath tests other than the initial screening test may be conducted on an approved breath-testing instrument. An instrument which determines the amount of alcohol in one's breath (by whatever means) and calculates therefrom the blood alcohol content performs a "chemical analysis" or "chemical test" pursuant to § 40-6-392(a)(1). An approved breath-testing instrument is considered accurate if properly operated.

The results of such a test are admissible as evidence if the state establishes that the instrument has been approved for use in this state. At one time, a properly authenticated record or testimony from the director of the state crime lab was required to authenticate the director's approval of the instrument used in a case. Now, if the state establishes that the instrument has been approved for use in this state as specified by administrative rule or as authorized by the Director of the Division of Forensic Sciences, the test results of the instrument are admissible. It has been held that where the Director of the Division of Forensic Sciences has issued a permit for the operation of an instrument, it may be inferred that its design has been approved by him and thus the results of the test are admissible. It has also been held that even when an instrument has had one of its components disengaged by the manufacturer, if the instrument as modified has been approved in accordance with the statutory requirements, the test results of the instrument are admissible. This holding, however, has been legislatively overruled by the 1994 amendment to § 40-6-392. For the test results of an instrument to be considered valid and thus admissible under this amendment, the instrument must have all of its electronic and operating components prescribed by its manufacturer properly attached and in good working order. A 1995 Act made this requirement retroactively applicable to all cases pending on April 21, 1995.

The state must establish that the instrument has been maintained in good operating condition in order for test results of the instrument to be admissible. The Director of the Division of Forensic Sciences is required to cause each instrument to be checked periodically for calibration and operation and a record of the results of all such checks to be maintained. There is a presumption that the Director has caused the instrument used to administer a breath test to be checked periodically for calibration, and the defendant must adduce sufficient competent evidence to overcome this presumption.

Beginning in 1995, each time an inspector from the Division of Forensic Sciences inspects an approved breath-testing instrument, he must certify that the instrument has all of its electronic and operating components prescribed by its manufacturer properly attached and in good working order. When properly prepared and executed, the inspector's certificate is self-authenticating, is admissible in any court of law, and satisfies the requirement that the Division certify that the instrument is being properly operated and maintained. A 1995 Act made these certification requirements retroactively applicable to all cases pending on April 25, 1995.

An inspection certificate prepared under § 40-6-392(f) is a record made and promulgated in the regular course of business. It is not made in an investigatory or adversarial setting; nor is it generated in anticipation of the prosecution of a particular defendant. Thus, an inspection certificate is not testimonial hearsay that would be inadmissible under Crawford v. Washington.

Because this self-authenticating certificate comes within the firmly rooted hearsay exception for business records, the certificate, upon a proper foundation being established, may be admitted at trial without violating a defendant's right of confrontation under the federal and state constitutions. Likewise, printouts attached to the certificate purporting to be the test results from the inspection, upon an adequate foundation being laid, may be admitted as business records without violating the defendant's right of confrontation. There is no requirement that, in order to lay a proper foundation, the person who conducted the inspection, or someone who actually witnessed it, appear in court to testify about the inspection or the completion of the certificate. It should be noted, however, that the foundation for the admission of the certificate under the business records exception is rendered unnecessary if the statutory foundation requirements have been satisfied. These requirements are: (1) the certificate must be signed under oath by the inspector; and (2) the certificate must contain the requisite language of § 40-6-392(f). Once completed as specified under the statute, the certificate is admissible in any court of law without further proof. There is no requirement that the state attach the test cards to the certificate. Furthermore, there is no requirement that certification and inspection of a machine occur on the same day as the testing or that the machine be inspected directly before and after each test. Nor is there a requirement that the certificate be prepared on the day of inspection. Any discrepancy between the date of inspection and the date of the certificate goes to the weight of the evidence and not its admissibility. This certificate is not the type of investigation-generated written scientific report subject to the state's criminal discovery provisions. Thus, the certificate may be introduced even though it has not been provided to the defendant before trial. A photocopy of the certificate may be admitted into evidence where the state has accounted for the absence of the original. The photocopy does not need to be certified to be admissible.

If the state fails to produce the certificate, it must establish by other admissible evidence that the statutory foundation requirements have been met. For instance, the fact the machine had all its requisite parts and was in good working order can be established circumstantially through the testimony of the technician who operated the machine and performed the test or through the testimony of an area supervisor who bases her opinion on certain documents printed by the machine during its most recent inspection by another officer. A malfunction of the printer or internal clock does not affect the admissibility of the test results but goes to the weight of those results. The statute does not require that a machine, which is working properly according to Division of Forensic Sciences approved diagnostic tests, be taken apart and each component tested individually in order to lay the required foundation for the admission of the test results.

A pretrial motion in limine is the proper vehicle by which to interpose an objection to the admissibility of test results on the basis of noncompliance with the statutory foundation requirements. The trial court's determination of admissibility, pursuant to these requirements, controls this matter of law, and the state is not required to reprove the legal issue of admissibility to the jury. Since this determination of admissibility is never a jury question, a jury instruction as to the foundational requirements would not be authorized. There is no requirement, however, that the foundation be laid outside the presence of the jury; the contemporaneous objection rule applies when presenting such preliminary, foundational evidence.

Due process under the federal constitution and the Georgia Constitution does not require that law enforcement agencies preserve breath samples in order to introduce breath-analysis tests at trial. Nor does due process require that an independent expert be allowed to examine the instrument that was used to test the defendant's breath.

Prior to January 1, 1995, breath tests to determine blood alcohol concentration were usually conducted on the Intoximeter 3000 machine. Having been decommissioned on December 31, 1994, this machine is no longer used in this state and its test results are no longer admissible in court. Effective January 1, 1995, breath tests are to be conducted on the Intoxilyzer 5000 machine. However, the Director of the Division of Forensic Sciences is authorized to approve the design of any other type of breath alcohol analyzer used in this state. There is a procedural difference between the use of the Intoxilyzer 5000 and the Intoximeter 3000. The Intoximeter 3000 only required one breath sample. The Intoxilyzer 5000 requires two breath samples that must be within 0.020 grams of each other. If the two samples are not within this narrow window, the test will not be considered valid. If the samples fall within the window but differ, the operator is instructed to use the lower reading. Apparently, because of this procedural difference, the General Assembly amended § 40-6-392 to provide that in all cases where the arrest is made on or after January 1, 1995, and the state selects breath testing, two sequential breath samples are to be requested for the testing of alcohol concentration. For either or both of these sequential samples to be admissible in the state's or plaintiff's case-in-chief, the readings cannot differ from each other by an alcohol concentration of greater than 0.020 grams and the lower of the two results is determinative for accusation and indictment purposes and administrative license suspension purposes. No more than two sequential series of a total of two adequate breath samples each are to be requested by the state. Both of the sequential test results may be admitted into evidence and may go out with the jury. Any margin for error relates to the weight rather than the admissibility of the results. The results are admissible without testimony as to what significance should be attributed to them. The credibility of a defense expert's attack upon the reliability of the results is an issue for the jury to resolve.

Because § 40-6-392(a)(1)(B) clearly contemplates the admission of both sequential test results, it does not limit the state to using only the lower of two samples to prosecute a DUI charge and in excluding evidence of the result of the second breath sample solely on that basis.

Cross-examination regarding the Intoxilyzer 5000 would be irrelevant in a case where only the Intoximeter 3000 was utilized.

A trial court may not instruct the jury that the Intoxilyzer 5000 machine's margin for error does not diminish the evidentiary value of the test results. Such a conclusion is rightly within the jury's domain. While it is within the province of the trial court to determine the admissibility of the test results, it is within the province of the jury to determine what weight should be given to those results.

While the defendant may always introduce evidence of the possibility of error or circumstances that might have caused the Intoxilyzer 5000 to malfunction, he is not entitled to an instruction that such evidence may be considered by the jury in evaluating evidence of the defendant's blood alcohol level. The absence of such an instruction would not deprive him of the defense that the test results were incorrect.

An Intoxilyzer 5000's margin of error relates to the weight given to the test results rather than to their admissibility. In addition, these results are direct evidence of guilt. The evidence supporting a per se charge would not be rendered insufficient simply because the Intoxilyzer's margin of error brings a test result below Georgia's legal limit for blood-alcohol content. Thus, even if the evidence establishes a margin of error, the defendant would not be entitled to a directed verdict on this basis.

After instructing the jury that the relationship between alcohol in the blood and in the breath is a ratio of 1 to 2,100, the trial court may, but is not required to, instruct the jury that it can give the test results the weight that it deems fit, including no weight at all.

While the defendant may attack the Intoxilyzer 5000 test by attempting to show the machine was not in good working order and thus not operating properly when he was tested, he is not entitled to admission of evidence as a matter of law that is of remote relevance, if any, to the operating condition of the machine on the date of his test. In one case, the trial court ruled a "service work order" for the machine inadmissible as not relevant. The defendant proffered that the work order and the arresting officer's testimony would have shown that various parts of the machine were replaced and that the machine was malfunctioning months after the defendant's test. The Court of Appeals held that in the absence of any other evidence which would have linked the proffered evidence with the condition of the machine on the date of the defendant's test, the proffered evidence would not have logically raised a reasonable inference that the machine was not in good working order on that date. Thus, the trial court did not abuse its discretion.

iii. Authority to Request Test and Analyze Sample

Once an arrest for driving under the influence is made, an officer is authorized by the implied consent law to request a chemical test. However, the implementation of the implied consent law is not restricted solely to arrests for driving under the influence. If a person is under arrest for "any offense" arising out of acts concerning which the arresting officer has at least "reasonable grounds" to believe that a violation of § 40-6-391 has occurred, the officer may request a chemical test, even if then short of probable cause to arrest for driving under the influence.

The coincidence of probable cause to arrest a suspect for a violation of the DUI statute and the suspect's actual arrest, albeit for a non-DUI offense, means that the suspect is, as a matter of law, arrested for an offense arising out of acts alleged to have been committed in violation of the DUI statute. Thus, the defendant's arrest for such an offense would not subject the results of his state-administered breath test to suppression.

Formerly, if a person was "involved in any traffic accident resulting in serious injuries or fatalities," the officer was authorized by § 40-5-55(a) to request a chemical test without first placing that person under arrest. In 2003, however, the Georgia Supreme Court held that this provision authorizes unreasonable searches and seizures in violation of the state and federal constitutions to the extent that it requires chemical testing of the operator of a motor vehicle involved in a traffic accident resulting in serious injuries or fatalities regardless of any determination of probable cause. In the absence of probable cause that the operator has violated the DUI statute, an officer would not be legally authorized to inform the operator of his implied consent rights. Consequently, informing the operator of these rights would be misleading, and any consent based upon this misrepresentation would be invalid. Thus, the results of a blood test procured pursuant to § 40-5-55(a) would have to be excluded at trial.

The Supreme Court's decision makes it clear that § 40-5-55(a) is unconstitutional to the extent that it can be interpreted to require an individual to submit to chemical testing solely because that individual was involved in a traffic accident resulting in serious injuries or fatalities. On the other hand, where an individual has been involved in a traffic accident resulting in serious injuries or fatalities and the investigating officer has probable cause to believe that the individual was driving under the influence of alcohol or other drugs, the constitutional infirmities are no longer present, and the ensuing search is both warranted and constitutional. In such a case, § 40-5-55 does not require that the individual be arrested in order to trigger his implied consent to testing. This is so because the individual may be so incapacitated as a result of the traffic accident that a formal arrest would be unwarranted under the circumstances. Furthermore, an individual involved in such an accident, rather than someone who is merely stopped while driving, is on notice that some inquiry will be made regarding the cause of and responsibility for the accident, and this knowledge would give context to the subsequent reading of implied consent rights.

In circumstances where there has been no traffic accident resulting in serious injuries or fatalities, but the investigating officer has probable cause to believe that the suspect was driving under the influence of alcohol or other drugs, the statutory mandates of § 40-5-55 require an arrest prior to any reading of implied consent rights. The arrest necessary before the reading of implied consent, however, does not have to be a formal arrest in which the officer explicitly states to the suspect that he has been arrested. Implied consent is triggered at the point that the suspect is not free to leave and a reasonable person in his position would not believe that the detention is temporary, regardless of whether a formal arrest has occurred.

In Cornwell v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court held that the implied consent statute (§ 40-5-55) as applied to the defendant was not unconstitutional because it allowed for the warrantless compelled testing of a driver's bodily fluids without proof of the existence of exigent circumstances. Since a driver is deemed to have consented to tests of his bodily substances when probable cause exists to arrest him for an alleged violation of § 40-6-391, the court found that the existence of exigent circumstances is wholly irrelevant. Indeed, where the driver has been arrested based on probable cause and the state has complied with the statutory implied consent requirements, the driver cannot complain that testing done by the state for the presence of alcohol and drugs violated his rights under the state and federal constitutions to be free from unreasonable searches and seizures.

Prior to 1998, the plain language of § 40-5-67.1(a) authorized the arresting officer to select a breath test and a urine test or a blood test and a urine test. In State v. Warmack, the Court of Appeals held that nothing in the statutory scheme authorized the officer to require, as opposed to request, additional testing after the officer selected a breath test. Once the officer designated the test, the statute provided no authority for making another selection when the officer became dissatisfied with the results of the state-administered test. Under these circumstances, the defendant had a right to refuse any additional testing. Apparently dissatisfied with this result, the General Assembly amended the language of § 40-5-67.1(a) in 1998 to provide that an officer has the authority to designate which test or tests are to be administered "initially and may subsequently require a test or tests of any substances not initially tested." The General Assembly found, contrary to the decision in Warmack, that the officer "should be allowed to initially require a combination of tests and should subsequently be allowed to require additional tests of any substance not initially tested." Now that this amendment authorizes an officer to require subsequent tests, a request to undergo additional testing need not be preceded by Miranda warnings. The statutory scheme also provides that where a person is involved in a traffic accident resulting in serious injuries or fatalities, the investigating officer is authorized to designate which test or tests must be administered, provided that a blood test with drug screen may also be administered. This testing must be administered "as soon as practicable under the circumstances." This testing is permitted only if the investigating officer has probable cause to believe that the individual involved in the accident was driving under the influence of alcohol or other drugs.

The authority of an officer to require additional samples for retesting will be limited by the reasonableness of the delay and reasonableness of the inconvenience to the person. An officer may take a portion of the blood legitimately drawn during the person's independent test and may send the sample to the crime lab for subsequent testing, either for control purposes or for potential rebuttal evidence, or both.

Nothing in the statutory scheme prohibits an officer from requesting multiple tests at one time. However, in all cases where the arrest is made on or after January 1, 1995, if the officer selects breath testing, he can request no more than two sequential series of a total of two adequate breath samples each. If both the first and second samples produce printed alcohol concentration analyses, the officer is without authority to conduct another breath test on the defendant.

The import of the language in § 40-5-55 is that the arresting officer must have reasonable grounds to believe that the suspect has been driving under the influence before requesting that a chemical test be performed. There is nothing in that language that would exclude testing for drugs as well as alcohol as long as the suspect is properly advised pursuant to the implied consent notice that the tests were being administered for the purpose of determining whether he was under the influence of alcohol or drugs. Although § 40-5-55 goes on to provide that, subject to § 40-6-392, the officer must designate whether a breath, urine, or blood test will be performed, that language means that the officer must advise the suspect of which test or tests he is requesting the suspect undergo. This language does not require the officer to request that the crime lab test for drugs as well as alcohol. Thus, the officer's failure to make such a request would not render the test results inadmissible.

Nothing in the statutory scheme relating to chemical testing or implied consent states that an officer who obtains consent for more than one chemical test is required to administer all of the tests for which consent was obtained. As long as a defendant's right to an independent chemical test is clear, an officer may obtain consent for more than one chemical test and then elect which consented-to test or tests will be administered.

If the state has a blood sample analyzed by the state crime lab, the blood test itself is state-administered. The fact that the drawing of the blood may have been done at an independent medical facility does not affect admissibility.

The scope of the consent granted by a defendant to a test to determine alcohol or drug content of blood, as well as the legislative intent embodied in the implied consent statutes, may be derived from the wording of the implied consent notice read to a defendant. The notice requests a defendant to submit to a test "for the purpose of determining if you are under the influence of alcohol or drugs." The representations in the notice concerning the nature of the test to be performed or the use to which the test results will be applied are binding upon the state. Consequently, the test results can be used against a defendant only for the purpose of determining whether he was driving "under the influence of alcohol or drugs" or has committed some other driving-related offense. Thus, while the test results can be used for the purpose of determining whether the defendant was driving with the presence of drugs in his blood, they cannot be used as the sole basis for a drug possession charge, nor can a blood sample be subjected to additional DNA testing so that it may be used as the basis for a sexual offense charge. These uses would exceed the scope of the consent granted by the defendant.

Whatever a hospital consent form may say or lead a defendant to believe, it has no bearing on the state's right to test the defendant's blood and urine for alcohol or drugs pursuant to the consent given by the defendant after receiving the required implied consent notice. Nothing on such a form, including a statement signed by the arresting officer, can be construed as action taken by the state in violation of the statutory requirements of implied consent.

Our implied consent law does not permit a suspect under arrest for driving under the influence to withdraw his consent to a state-administered blood test before the sample is analyzed.

In 2005, the Georgia Supreme Court held in State v. Collier that an officer did not have the authority to seek a search warrant to compel a person to submit blood and urine samples for drug testing when that person had invoked his right under the implied consent law to refuse such testing. Section 40-5-67.1(d) plainly required that if an individual did not consent to the designated chemical test, then no test was to be administered. This precluded any discretion on the part of the officer to attempt to obtain such testing. Furthermore, the legislatively-created sanctions for refusing such testing did not include being compelled to submit to testing through the use of a search warrant.

In 2006, apparently disapproving of this construction of the statute, the General Assembly enacted a provision that legislatively overrules the Supreme Court's decision in Collier. This provision states that nothing in § 40-5-67.1 should be deemed to preclude the acquisition or admission of evidence of a violation of § 40-6-391 if obtained by voluntary consent or a search warrant as authorized by the constitution or laws of this state or the United States. Because this amendment, which took effect in July 2006, is not merely a procedural or evidentiary change but one eliminating a defendant's substantive right to refuse to submit to testing, it should not be applied retroactively.

iv. Authority to Administer Test to Unconscious Person

The test can be administered without the actual consent of the tested party if he is unconscious, dead or otherwise incapable of refusal. In this situation, the statute provides that the original implied consent to such tests expressed by driving on state roads is operative to authorize the test administration. Yet there is no statutory requirement compelling the state to conduct a test.

The provision authorizing a test in this situation has withstood a constitutional attack based on the privilege against self-incrimination. In Strong v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court relied heavily on Schmerber v. California, a United States Supreme Court decision which rejected a Fifth Amendment self-incrimination attack on a similar California procedure.

An Equal Protection attack on the statutory scheme was raised in Williams v. State. The defendant, who had been unconscious at the time of the test, sought to have the evidence of the test excluded on the grounds that had he been conscious he could have refused to have the test administered and he ought to be treated equally with conscious individuals. The court rejected the claim summarily, over a vigorous dissent which argued that § 40-6-392 requires actual consent to the test and that the implied consent provision of § 40-5-55(b) requires total compliance with § 40-6-392.

There is nothing in the statutes or case law which requires the state to take and retain blood samples for use by an unconscious defendant in the event he desires an independent test by someone of his own choosing after regaining consciousness.

Where an individual has been involved in a traffic accident resulting in serious injuries or fatalities and the investigating law enforcement officer has probable cause to believe that the individual was driving under the influence of alcohol or other drugs, the drawing of the individual's blood while he is unconscious is both warranted and constitutional. However, the mere odor of alcohol emanating from the unconscious individual would not be sufficient to establish probable cause. There must be other evidence of impairment such as the individual's unsafe driving act on which to base probable cause to draw his blood while he is unconscious.

v. Legality of Test

There has been considerable litigation concerning the appropriate procedural device by which to raise the issue of the legality of the state-administered tests. In State v. Johnston the court held that allegations of noncompliance with the statute or departmental regulations are not properly cognizable in a pretrial motion to suppress, but pointed out that a trial judge can choose to treat such a motion as a motion in limine and decide the issues it presents before trial. The court also held that a motion to suppress hearing contemplates the suppression of tangible evidence only, but refused to decide the question of how to litigate the admissibility of testimonial or nontangible evidence before trial. A grant of a motion in limine is directly appealable by the state under § 5-7-1.

The courts have been hesitant to suppress evidence based on the state's noncompliance with administrative rules. Such rules and regulations are not construed to have the force and effect of law, but are deemed to be policy statements. Thus, in State v. Richardson, the court held that the breath test was not subject to suppression because the officer failed to comply with the "20-minute rule" of the department, which requires officers to wait 20 minutes to observe the defendant prior to the giving of a breath test. In several other cases the appellate courts held that minor violations of administrative rules were not enough to cause exclusion of the test results.

Although a police vehicle used to make a traffic arrest is required to be distinctly marked with the name of the police agency, a traffic arrest made in an unmarked vehicle is not invalid. Thus, an officer in an unmarked vehicle, who has observed erratic driving, is authorized to arrest the driver, and the driver's arrest, being legal, cannot be the basis for suppressing his breath test results.

Formerly, a person involved in a traffic accident resulting in a serious injury was deemed by operation of law to have given consent to a chemical test of his bodily substances for the presence of alcohol or any other drug. The results of a chemical test given under these circumstances was not subject to suppression. In 2003, however, the Georgia Supreme Court held that this provision of the law authorized an unreasonable search and seizure in violation of the state and federal constitutions to the extent that it required chemical testing of the operator of a motor vehicle involved in a traffic accident resulting in serious injuries or fatalities regardless of any determination of probable cause. Thus, the results of a chemical test procured pursuant to this provision would be subject to suppression at trial.

The Supreme Court's decision makes it clear that § 40-5-55(a) is unconstitutional to the extent that it can be interpreted to require an individual to submit to chemical testing solely because that individual was involved in a traffic accident resulting in serious injuries or fatalities. On the other hand, where an individual has been involved in a traffic accident resulting in serious injuries or fatalities and the investigating officer has probable cause to believe that the individual was driving under the influence of alcohol or other drugs, the constitutional infirmities are no longer present, and the ensuing search is both warranted and constitutional. In such a case, § 40-5-55 does not require that the individual be arrested in order to trigger his implied consent to testing. This is so because the individual may be so incapacitated as a result of the traffic accident that a formal arrest would be unwarranted under the circumstances. Furthermore, an individual involved in such an accident, rather than someone who is merely stopped while driving, is on notice that some inquiry will be made regarding the cause of and responsibility for the accident, and this knowledge would give context to the subsequent reading of implied consent rights.

An officer's failure to read the defendant his Miranda rights prior to requesting and obtaining a urine sample or prior to administering the state-administered breath test does not render the test results inadmissible. Moreover, because the test results are not evidence of a testimonial or communicative nature, their admission would not violate the defendant's Fifth and Fourteenth Amendment rights. Also, their admission would not violate the defendant's statutory right against self-incrimination because, although he is in custody when he takes the test, that right is not applicable until he has been charged in a criminal proceeding.

d. Implied Consent Notices

Prior to January 1, 1993, the arresting officer in his implied consent notice was required to inform the DUI suspect (1) that §§ 40-5-55 and 40-6-392 required him to submit to state-administered chemical tests for the purpose of determining alcoholic or drug content, (2) that he had the right to an additional test by personnel of his own choosing, and (3) that his refusal to submit to the state-administered chemical tests would result in the suspension of his driver's license for 6 to 12 months. The General Assembly revised the requirements relative to a DUI suspect's implied consent rights in 1992, 1994, 1995, 1997, 1998, and 2001. Now, there are separate implied consent notices for (1) suspects under age 21, (2) suspects age 21 or over, and (3) suspects who are commercial motor vehicle drivers. The arresting officer is required to select and read to the suspect the appropriate implied consent notice. Each notice informs the suspect (1) that Georgia law requires him to submit to state-administered chemical testing for the purpose of determining if he is under the influence of alcohol or drugs, (2) what will be the consequences if he refuses state-administered testing, (3) what will be the consequences if he submits to state-administered testing and the results indicate that he is under the influence "per se," and (4) that after submitting to state-administered testing he is entitled to additional testing at his own expense and from qualified personnel of his own choosing. Once a suspect has been informed of his implied consent rights, he is deemed to have been properly advised of those rights and the results of any chemical testing or his refusal to submit to such testing is admissible into evidence against him. Failure to provide any notice as set out above does not invalidate the suspension of any driver's license.

Prior to 2006, in all cases in which police officers requested a chemical test of a person's blood, urine, or other bodily substances in connection with the operation of a motor vehicle for the purpose of determining whether the driver was under the influence of alcohol or drugs, they had to give the notice or warning required by the implied consent statute. Police officers were not permitted to circumvent the implied consent statute by merely requesting consent without giving any implied consent notice or warning. In 2006, the General Assembly added subsection (d.1) to § 40-5-67.1 which provides that nothing in § 40-5-67.1 should be deemed to preclude the acquisition or admission of evidence of a violation of § 40-6-391 if obtained by voluntary consent or a search warrant as authorized by the constitution or laws of this state or the United States. This amendment eliminates the need to give an implied consent warning where an individual "voluntarily" agrees to testing. This amendment not only changes the substance of the implied consent warning, it does away with the requirement that the warning be given at all where an officer manages to otherwise lawfully obtain consent to testing. This is not merely a procedural or evidentiary change, but one eliminating a defendant's substantive right to refuse to submit to testing. Therefore, this amendment, which took effect in July 2006, should not be applied retroactively.

Prior to 1995, although the implied consent notice given to a DUI suspect had to be complete, informing the suspect of all the types of tests available to him and of his right to choose his own qualified person to administer the test, the notice did not have to track the exact language of the implied consent statute. The General Assembly in its 1995 Regular Session amended § 40-5-67.1(b) to provide that a law enforcement officer is required to give to the suspect the appropriate implied consent notice in the language specified in the statute. This amendment was effective April 21, 1995.

In Martin v. State, the Court of Appeals found that Section 5 of the amending Act provided that § 40-5-67.1(b) applied to all cases pending on April 21, 1995, the date that the Governor approved the amended statute. Since the defendant's case was pending on April 21, 1995, the implied consent notice prescribed by the amended statute was required to be given to the defendant. Obviously, since the defendant was arrested and given his implied consent notice on September 10, 1994, the arresting officer could not have given the specific implied consent notice prescribed by the amended statute. Nevertheless, inasmuch as the General Assembly made the amended statute applicable to pending cases, the Court of Appeals, after comparing the notice given to the notice required, found the notice to be insufficient.

The General Assembly in its 1995 Extraordinary Session added subsection (b.1) to § 40-5-67.1 in response to the Court of Appeals decision in Martin v. State. This amendment was effective August 18, 1995. Under subsection (b.1), § 40-5-67.1(b) applied to any case wherein the request for chemical testing was made regarding an offense committed on or after April 21, 1995. Section 40-5-67.1(b) did not apply to any case wherein the request for chemical testing was made regarding an offense committed prior to April 21, 1995, in which case the former provisions governing the content of implied consent notices applied.

In State v. Martin, the Georgia Supreme Court concluded that the Court of Appeals's opinion had to be reversed pursuant to the August 1995 amendment. Although the Court of Appeals correctly applied the April 1995 amendment at the time its opinion was rendered, the August amendment rendered the April amendment applicable only to those stops made after April 21, 1995. The Supreme Court concluded that the August amendment was valid under the state and federal constitutions and by its plain language it applied to the defendant's case. Thus, the implied consent notice given the defendant satisfied the applicable statutory requirement under former law, and the trial court did not err by denying the defendant's motion in limine to suppress his breath test results.

For offenses committed on or after April 21, 1995, the Court of Appeals held that the arresting officer was required to read the exact language mandated by § 40-5-67.1(b). Substantial compliance with the statute was not sufficient. Strict compliance, which meant reading the notices exactly as written in the statute, was required. Apparently disapproving of this construction of the statute, the General Assembly found and declared in 1998 that while DUI suspects "should be informed of their rights regarding the administration of chemical testing, no such suspect is entitled to a notice which tracks the exact language of the implied consent statute . . . " The notice must "be read in its entirety but need not be read exactly so long as the substance of the notice remains unchanged." Thus, contrary to holdings of the Court of Appeals, "substantial" rather than "strict" compliance is the applicable standard. This 1998 amendment is retroactive in its application.

The purpose of the requirement that the notice be read in its "entirety" is to ensure that the officer read through the entire notice rather than only a portion of it. Thus, a notice that has been read all the way through but has had a word omitted would still satisfy this requirement, and a trial court would be able to consider whether the substance of the notice has been changed by the omission. As long as the notice's meaning has not been affected, the omission of a word would not alter its substance.

In Klink v. State, the Georgia Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of § 40-5-67.1 against a challenge that it violated due process. The court concluded that the choices provided by the implied consent notices in the statute are not so incomplete, misleading, or coercive that no real choices exist. Furthermore, the implied consent notices do not violate due process because they fail to include a notice that the test results may be used against the suspect at trial. The court also upheld the implied consent statute against an equal protection challenge in Lutz v. State. The court held that the statute does not provide different administrative penalties for people who drive under the influence of alcohol than it provides for people who drive under the influence of other, illegal drugs. Both groups of impaired drivers are subject to having their licenses suspended administratively without having been prosecuted for DUI.

Merely because the notices set forth in the implied consent statute inform suspects that their refusal to submit to a bodily alcohol concentration test may result in a driver's license suspension and may also be introduced against them at trial, it does not follow that the notices are defective for failing to inform suspects that the state is permitted to use alcohol concentration test results in a DUI prosecution. The failure to so inform the suspect does not render his consent to take the test unknowing and involuntary. Chemical tests may be administered to the suspect without first notifying him that the test results may be used in a DUI prosecution. Accordingly, the use of the test results at the suspect's DUI prosecution would not violate his rights under the Fourth Amendment.

The implied consent notice to be given to commercial motor vehicle driver suspects is to be read to drivers of commercial vehicles, not to drivers of private vehicles who happen to hold commercial driver's licenses.

In circumstances where there has been no traffic accident resulting in serious injuries or fatalities, the investigating officer should inform the suspect of his implied consent rights at the time of arrest or as close to that time as circumstances warrant. The suspect must be arrested before he can be deemed to have given consent to have a chemical test performed to determine the presence of alcohol or other drugs. The existence of mere probable cause to arrest is not sufficient. Thus, even where there is probable cause to arrest for a violation of § 40-6-391, an implied consent notice given to a suspect several days prior to his arrest for DUI can in no way be considered contemporaneous to that arrest and would therefore be inappropriate. Under these circumstances, the suspect's refusal to submit to a chemical test would be warranted, and evidence of this refusal would be inadmissible at trial.

On the other hand, where an individual has been involved in a traffic accident resulting in serious injuries or fatalities and the investigating officer has probable cause to believe that the individual was driving under the influence of alcohol or other drugs, chemical testing is both warranted and constitutional. In such a case, § 40-5-55 does not require that the individual be arrested in order to trigger his implied consent to testing. This is so because the individual may be so incapacitated as a result of the traffic accident that a formal arrest would be unwarranted under the circumstances. Furthermore, an individual involved in such an accident, rather than someone who is merely stopped while driving, is on notice that some inquiry will be made regarding the cause of and responsibility for the accident, and this knowledge would give context to the subsequent reading of implied consent rights.

It should be noted, however, if the injury suffered in the accident is not one of the serious injuries specified in § 40-5-55(c), the rules associated with the reading of an implied consent notice to a suspect following a traffic accident with serious injuries or fatalities would not apply. Rather, the defendant's implied consent rights must be analyzed under that portion of § 40-5-55(a) regarding an individual who has been arrested for any offense arising out of acts alleged to have been committed in violation of § 40-6-391.

Based on the plain wording of § 40-5-55(a), which requires only that the person be involved in a traffic accident resulting in serious injuries or fatalities, there is no requirement that the serious injury or fatality occur prior to reading the implied consent warnings, only that an individual be deemed to have given consent "when" or "if" this circumstance exists. It is not unreasonable to expect that in some cases it will not be evident or known to police that the accident resulted in a serious injury or fatality until long after the accident itself has occurred. In Snyder v. State, the trooper had probable cause to believe that the defendant was driving under the influence of alcohol based upon his observations at the scene and the result of the AlcoSensor test. Because the traffic accident also subsequently resulted in a fatality, the defendant was therefore deemed to have consented to a test of his blood. Accordingly, his arrest was not required prior to the reading of the implied consent warnings.

The officer has no duty to repeat the notices and rights to a suspect and is not required to give the notices to a suspect who is unconscious. The implied consent law is not violated if an officer other than the arresting officer informs the suspect of his rights.

Miranda warnings are not required prior to the giving of an implied consent notice to a DUI suspect in police custody. Furthermore, the notice itself need not inform the suspect of the privilege against self-incrimination. Because the suspect's consent to take the state-administered test is neither testimonial nor communicative in nature, it is not protected by the privilege against self-incrimination. Thus, the absence of Miranda warnings would not require the suppression of the suspect's consent under federal law. Also, the suspect's consent is not protected by the statutory right against self-incrimination because, although he is in custody when he consents to take the test, that right is not applicable until he has been charged in a criminal proceeding.

A suspect is not entitled to advice of counsel when confronted with a decision as to whether to submit to a test under the implied consent law or with a decision as to whether to request an independent examination. Thus, evidence as to the test should be suppressed where the suspect is misled by an officer's statement to believe that he is entitled to advice of counsel prior to submitting to the test.

In the event of a multi-car collision involving more than one drunk driver, simultaneously informing the drunk drivers of their implied consent rights will not result in the suppression of a state-administered breath test result, if the drivers are also independently informed of their rights before they are subjected to a state-administered test.

Sections 40-5-67.1 and 40-6-392(a)(3) do not require that implied consent notices be read only in English. Nor do they require that the notices be read to suspects in their native language. They only require that the notices be read to the suspects. The statutes thus, on their face, do not create a classification of English-speaking and non-English-speaking suspects. Absent a showing that these statutes were enacted or applied with a discriminatory purpose, they do not violate equal protection. Furthermore, implied consent notices are a matter of legislative grace, and due process does not require that the notices be given in languages that suspects understand.

Where the arresting officer cannot communicate to the suspect his implied consent rights because the suspect cannot speak English, any failure to obtain an additional test is justifiable and the results of the state-administered test are admissible.

Where a defendant, who speaks only broken English, testifies through an interpreter that he did not understand his implied consent notices, the state may seek to impeach the defendant by questioning him concerning any prior DUI arrests during which chemical tests had been performed on his bodily substances. The fact that the defendant had submitted to chemical tests after having been given the notices on prior occasions increases the likelihood that he understood the notices on this occasion. The probative value of the elicited testimony would outweigh its prejudicial effect. Since the state is seeking to impeach the defendant with evidence concerning the circumstances of his arrest, not his criminal conviction, it is not required to prove the prior convictions by introducing certified copies or otherwise.

If the arresting officer cannot communicate to the suspect his implied consent rights because the suspect is hearing impaired, the officer or his department is required by the hearing impaired law to request a qualified interpreter from the Department of Human Resources once the suspect is taken into custody. If no such request is made and no qualified interpreter is present, the suspect cannot be properly informed of his implied consent rights, and the results of the state-administered test are not admissible in any criminal proceeding against the suspect. When the request has been made for an interpreter and the required one-hour waiting period lapses, the officer may proceed with his investigation under the implied consent law. If, however, the suspect intelligently waives the one-hour requirement, then the officer may proceed with written interrogatories and the suspect should answer in writing.

The state must show that the arresting officer properly advised the suspect of his implied consent rights. If the state fails to make this showing, the state-administered test results are inadmissible. Formerly, the arresting officer's testimony that he read the suspect his implied consent rights from a card that he carried for that purpose constituted a prima facie showing that the officer informed the suspect of his implied consent rights. Since this card now contains notices for three different types of DUI suspects, one of which the arresting officer must select and read to the suspect, the officer's mere conclusory statement that he read the suspect his implied consent rights as set forth on a card issued to him by his department would fail to meet the state's burden of proving compliance with the implied consent notice requirements. The state must now present further evidence specifying the substance of the notice allegedly given. For instance, testimony from the arresting officer that he read the Georgia implied consent law from 1997 for suspects over 21 and the officer's recitation of a portion of the notice given at trial would be sufficient to prove compliance with these requirements.

Where the arresting officer, at a hearing on a motion in limine, erroneously testifies that he read the suspect the incorrect implied consent notice, the state, realizing that the officer had done so after he had been excused, may be allowed to reopen the evidence and use a videotape of the traffic stop to demonstrate that the officer gave incorrect testimony at the hearing and that he actually gave the suspect the correct implied consent notice. Since the videotape contradicts the officer's testimony, the rule against impeaching one's own witness would be inapplicable.

Sufficient compliance with the implied consent statute is also established by evidence showing that the suspect was given timely notice of his implied consent rights and thereafter made no request for an independent chemical test. It has been held that the state has only to show that the suspect, after being advised of his rights, did not refuse to submit to the state-administered test. The state need not show compliance with the implied consent statute's mandatory language where the defense has expressly stipulated, at trial, that the implied consent notice was given. Inherent in such a stipulation is that the implied consent notice was valid.

An inaccurate notice will render the state-administered blood alcohol test inadmissible. The erroneous admission of this test probably will not affect a conviction for driving while under the influence of alcohol to the extent that it was less safe for the defendant to drive, where other evidence, including the arresting officer's observation of the defendant's driving, is amply sufficient to support the defendant's conviction.

Breath test results, which were suppressed because an inaccurate notice was given to the defendant, may be subsequently admitted by the trial court to allow the state to rebut a defendant's expert opinion concerning the amount of alcohol in the defendant's body at the time of his arrest.

An arresting officer's failure to file a DPS 1205 form immediately after the defendant's arrest in order to initiate administrative license suspension proceedings does not render the implied consent notice given to the defendant defective or misleading.

The implied consent notice should not be read before the administration of the alcosensor test because that may mislead the suspect into believing that he is required to submit to that test. However, unless the suspect can show that the timing of the reading of the notice was so confusing that he was unable to make an intelligent decision about whether to submit to the state-administered test, it will not render the results of the state-administered test inadmissible.

The "under 21" implied consent notice is not misleading as to the purpose of the breath test. It specifically informs the suspect that the purpose of the test is to determine whether he was driving under the influence of alcohol and that a 0.02 blood alcohol concentration (BAC) will result in such violation. The presence of the prohibited 0.02 BAC renders the suspect under the influence of alcohol for purposes of the notice. Thus, the suspect's consent to testing for the purpose of determining whether he was driving under the influence does not limit the state to prosecution solely under the less safe driver provisions of our DUI laws but includes prosecution for the presence of alcohol under the per se BAC provisions as well.

License suspension is a true and legitimate consequence of refusing to submit to or submitting and failing the test. There is no unlawful coercion where the officer merely informs the arrestee of the permissible range of sanctions that the state may ultimately be authorized to impose. The fact that his license is not ultimately suspended does not mean he was not informed of the true and legitimate consequences of a refusal or a failed test.

In 2004, the Court of Appeals held that by threatening to obtain a search warrant in order to obtain the necessary samples by force, the police would be misleading the suspect about the consequences of refusing to consent to the requested tests. Where police mislead a suspect about his implied consent rights, any consent based upon the misrepresentation would be invalid. All results of such coerced tests should therefore be excluded. Apparently dissatisfied with this result, the General Assembly amended § 40-5-67.1 in 2006 to provide that nothing in this Code section should be deemed to preclude the acquisition or admission of evidence of a violation of § 40-6-391 if obtained by voluntary consent or a search warrant as authorized by the constitution or laws of this state or the United States. Because this amendment, which took effect in July 2006, is not merely a procedural or evidentiary change but one eliminating a defendant's substantive right to refuse to submit to testing, it should not be applied retroactively.

The DUI suspect not only has a right to an independent test of his own choosing, but also, under § 40-6-392(a)(4), has the right to be informed about this right. It has been held that the failure to inform the suspect of this right to an independent test will render the state's test evidence inadmissible in both criminal and civil cases.

In State v. Dull, the court held that Steed v. City of Atlanta, as only a two-judge decision, possessed no precedential value. The court declined to endorse the novel requirement announced in Steed. Neither the Court of Appeals nor the Supreme Court, prior to Steed, ever construed § 40-6-391 as requiring an affirmative showing of waiver or an actual request of an additional chemical test. In summary, the failure to inform a defendant of the right to an additional chemical test, and not the failure to obtain and show a waiver affirmatively, renders inadmissible the results of a chemical test administered at the request of the arresting officer. Where there is a conflict over whether a defendant was advised of his right to an additional test, resolution of the question of credibility is for the trial court.

The Court of Appeals has made it clear that the admissibility of chemical tests is a question of law for the judge to decide and, therefore, the jury need not be informed of the provisions of § 40-6-392(a) dealing with the requirement of notification to the defendant of alternative means of testing.

It should be noted that a defendant can complain only about a failure to warn him of his own rights. In Johnson v. State, a defendant was held to be without standing to object to the admission of a chemical test administered to a third party.

e. Independent or Additional Test Requested by Suspect

After the suspect has been informed of his right to an independent test, he must effectively communicate to the officer a desire for an independent test. This right is invoked by some statement of the suspect that reasonably can be construed in light of the circumstances to be an expression of a desire for an independent test. The officer is not required to ask the suspect where and by whom he wishes the independent test performed. It is the responsibility of the suspect, not of the officer, to designate the specifics of the independent testing and the officer must be apprised by the suspect of those specifics before the officer has a duty to facilitate the suspect's election. Accordingly, any interpretation of the applicable statutory provisions as would preclude the arresting officer from engaging in any further inquiry with regard to the specifics of the suspect's election of an independent test must be rejected. If the suspect does not apprise the officer of those specifics, the officer's action in taking the suspect to the nearest hospital in accordance with departmental policy would be reasonable.

The officer must make a reasonable effort to accommodate the suspect who seeks an independent test and must permit the suspect or afford him the opportunity to make the necessary arrangements. Obtaining bond is not a prerequisite to the officer's reasonable accommodation of the suspect.

The suspect's request must be made within a reasonable time after his arrest. A request made after the suspect has been informed of his implied consent rights but before the state-administered test has been given is not premature but timely. Also, the suspect may request more than one test, for example, a breath test and a blood test.

After the suspect has made the necessary arrangements for his independent test, he has the right to be transported to the place of testing. However, there is no duty on the part of an officer to transport a suspect to a hospital that has refused to perform the test without a doctor's order. If the suspect has elected to be taken to a facility that only would draw but not test the blood sample, it is the responsibility of the suspect to request thereafter to be transported to a place where the sample can be tested.

The cost of the independent test, to be administered by a qualified person of the suspect's own choosing, must be borne by the suspect, at least where he is able to pay. Who pays for the blood test, however, does not affect admissibility.

Since the statutes entitle a suspect to have an "additional" test, not necessarily an independent test, he may affirmatively choose at his own expense to have the state's qualified testing officer perform an additional breath test. Upon his affirmative request, the suspect should be permitted to obtain a second, state-administered breath test.

Where there is a conflict over whether the suspect requested and was denied an independent test, resolution of the question of credibility is for the trial court. If there is evidence to support the trial court's finding of fact that the suspect did not request an independent test, it would not be clearly erroneous for the trial court to deny the suspect's motion to suppress.

The failure to allow a suspect to obtain an independent test requires the suppression of the results of the breath test, unless the state presents evidence at the suppression hearing from which the trial court can find that the failure to respond to the suspect's timely request was justified. Although depriving the suspect of the means of obtaining an independent test would render the state's test inadmissible, it would not warrant the dismissal of the entire case where there is sufficient competent evidence to find him guilty of driving under the influence.

Separate and apart from the statutory right, created by § 40-6-392(a), to an independent test when the state administers an alcohol concentration test, a defendant in a DUI case has a due process right to establish potentially exculpatory evidence if he requests an independent chemical test. The only meaningful time for obtaining such evidence is at the time of arrest. While it may be true that a defendant is denied his statutory right to "a chemical test or tests" if he is not permitted to order the test of his choice, his due process rights are not denied if he is not permitted to order the test of his choice, so long as he is provided the opportunity to establish potentially exculpatory evidence by a competent and approved method.

While the statutory scheme adequately safeguards the defendant's equal protection and due process rights to gather exculpatory evidence through an independent test, the procedure mandates that the defendant voluntarily submit, first, to a state-administered test. If the defendant refuses to cooperate with the state-administered test, he intentionally refuses and rejects the very protection provided by the statutory scheme, thereby waiving not only his statutory right to an independent test but also his due process right to obtain exculpatory evidence for use in his defense.

The suspect's refusal to provide the second breath sample as provided in § 40-6-392(a)(1)(B) does not constitute a refusal to comply with the state's request to provide a breath sample. Accordingly, as long as the suspect provides the state with one admissible breath sample, he retains his right to an independent analysis of his blood.

Because an independent test is not performed at either the request or direction of a law enforcement officer, it is not subject to the dictates of § 40-6-392, and the party seeking to admit the test results must satisfy the trial court that the results are admissible pursuant to the rules of evidence. Documentary evidence of an independent test designed to measure a person's alcohol concentration level may be admitted into evidence under the business records exception to the hearsay rule, when the party seeking to admit the test results lays a proper foundation by offering the testimony of the custodian of records of the laboratory where the independent test was conducted. Also, the document may be admitted under this exception where it contains only the numerical result of the alcohol concentration level test performed on the defendant's blood and contains no opinions in addition to the test result. The exclusion of independent test results can be harmful error if these results would tend to create doubt concerning the accuracy of the results of the first test.

The state may not introduce the results of an additional, but not independent, blood alcohol test requested by the suspect as the result of a deficient notice. The failure to properly advise a suspect of his right to an independent, additional blood alcohol test prevents the state from introducing the results of the additional test. These results must be excluded from the state's case-in-chief just as the results of the state's test are excluded. The failure to give a proper notice invalidates the results of any test.

f. Refusal to Submit to State-Administered Test

A suspect has a right to refuse to submit to the state-administered chemical tests under the implied consent law. To be a correct and complete statement of the law, a jury instruction on the suspect's right to refuse must also instruct the jury that evidence of the suspect's refusal may be used against him at trial.

It has been held that a failure to inform the suspect of his right to an additional independent test not only bars the admission of the results of the state test, but also justifies a refusal to submit to the state test. In Garrett v. Department of Public Safety, the Georgia Supreme Court held that a refusal to be tested is justified and can, therefore, not be the basis of a driver's license suspension where the suspect was not warned of his right to an independent test.

The Garrett case points out a very important fact. In most situations, an actual consent by the suspect must be obtained before the state-administered chemical test will be performed. If the suspect refuses to submit to the state test, no test will be performed. Although § 40-6-392 gives the suspect the right to an additional test, it does not satisfy his obligation to submit to the state-administered test. Thus, if the suspect refuses to take the state-administered test, he has no right to an additional test.

A suspect may rescind his initial refusal to submit to a chemical test if such rescission is made in accordance with the following guidelines. A subsequent consent after a refusal to take a chemical test must be made (1) within a very short and reasonable time after the prior first refusal; (2) when a test administered upon the subsequent consent would still be accurate; (3) when testing equipment is still readily available; (4) when honoring the request would result in no substantial inconvenience or expense to the police; and (5) when the suspect requesting the test has been in the custody of the arresting officer and under observation for the whole time since arrest. Once the trial court has ruled in a hearing on a motion in limine to exclude evidence concerning the suspect's attempted rescission of his initial refusal to take the chemical test, the defense may not present this evidence during trial in order to impeach the state's witnesses on this issue.

In Howell v. State, upon being read implied consent warnings by one of the arresting officers, the defendant unequivocally revoked his implied consent. Without engaging the defendant in further discourse, the officer arrested him and transported him to a police station where he directed another officer to administer the breath test. The second officer instructed the defendant to blow into the breath testing device. There was no evidence the defendant was asked a second time whether he would consent to a state-administered test and no evidence that he rescinded his refusal and thereafter consented. He was thus administered a breath test simply because he did not refuse to cooperate. The court could not deem such a procedure to be fair or such actions by an officer to be reasonable. Consequently, the trial court erred in denying the defendant's motion to suppress.

A police officer may attempt to persuade a suspect to rescind his initial refusal to submit to chemical testing, so long as any procedure utilized by an officer in attempting to persuade a defendant to rescind his refusal is fair and reasonable. In Stapleton v. State, the Court of Appeals held that police conduct met this fair and reasonable requirement. Although the defendant clearly refused to take a breath test when asked at the scene, she rescinded that refusal by agreeing to take the test at the police station. No evidence was presented showing that the officer coerced or threatened the defendant to take the test or that she was intimidated in any way by the officer's request. Under these circumstances, the court determined that the officer did not act unreasonably when he again asked the defendant to take a breath test following her initial refusal at the scene. Therefore, the court affirmed the trial court's denial of the defendant's motion to suppress the test results.

Prior to 1993, there was neither a statutory nor a constitutional requirement that the arresting officer inform the suspect of the consequences of the refusal to submit to the state-administered test. Where the arresting officer did inform the suspect of the consequences of the refusal, it was held that the giving of such information to a suspect did not, as a matter of law, unlawfully coerce his submission to the state-administered test. Effective January 1, 1993, the arresting officer is required by statute to inform the suspect of the consequences of his refusal at the time the state-administered test is requested. The arresting officer's repeatedly informing the suspect, after she has initially refused to submit to the state-administered test, that if she does not submit to the test, the officer will have to suspend her driver's license for one year has been found not to be harmful. Such a statement is not false or misleading and directly and personally brings home to the suspect the consequences of her refusal.

Prior to 1995, the arresting officer had to inform a nonresident suspect in a separate notice that the consequences of his refusal to submit to the state-administered test would be the loss of his driving privileges, "at least on the highways of this state," for the statutorily specified period of time. Since this language is now a part of the implied consent notices prescribed by § 40-5-67.1(b), which the arresting officer is required to select and read to each suspect, a separate notice for nonresident suspects is no longer required.

In 1989, the General Assembly enacted the Uniform Commercial Driver's License Act in order to implement the mandatory provisions of the federal Commercial Motor Vehicle Safety Act of 1986. Under the federal Act, Georgia's disqualification of a driver from operating a commercial motor vehicle, based on his refusal to submit to alcohol testing, in fact does disqualify the driver from driving anywhere in the United States for at least one year. Therefore, the Court of Appeals has held that this state's informed consent statute is an accurate statement of the consequences of refusing testing. Far from being coercive, the notice gives sufficient information for drivers of commercial vehicles to make truly informed decisions about whether to submit to testing and the impact of that decision on their careers.

An officer's failure to warn a commercial driver that the refusal to submit to the state-administered test will also lead to the suspension of his personal driving privileges does not necessarily require the suppression of the test results. Where a commercial driver has been misinformed about his implied consent rights, suppression is not required if the misinformation did not affect his decision whether to consent to testing.

The suspect's refusal to submit to the state test results in the administrative suspension of his Georgia driver's license or his privilege to drive in this state or results in his disqualification as a driver of a commercial motor vehicle. The period of suspension or disqualification begins to run upon receipt by the department of the arresting officer's sworn report. The suspension or disqualification is subject to review. Because the state does not have a full opportunity at a license suspension hearing to litigate the question of whether a suspect refused testing, it is not collaterally estopped from presenting evidence on that issue at the suspect's DUI trial.

The refusal to take the state-administered test is admissible "in any criminal trial" and in any civil trial. This refusal itself may be considered as positive evidence creating an inference that the test would show the presence of the prohibited substance. However, this evidence, alone, is insufficient to sustain a conviction of driving under the influence.

The Georgia courts have held that the admission of the suspect's refusal to take the test does not violate the state constitution or the state statutory protection against self-incrimination. Accordingly, evidence of the suspect's consent or refusal to take the test is not rendered inadmissible by the lack of Miranda warnings at the time of arrest. Because the choice afforded a suspect under the "implied consent" statute does not rise to the level of constitutional self-incrimination, it is improper for a trial court to apply the "totality of circumstances" test to determine whether the suspect's consent to the test was freely and voluntarily given.

Even if the suspect is in custody at the time of a request to undergo additional state testing, evidence of his refusal to undergo the testing would not be rendered inadmissible by the lack of Miranda warnings.

Unless encumbered by a physical or medical limitation, a person submitting to a breathalyzer test may be considered to have refused to comply if an adequate breath sample has not been provided. As such, instructions given by a trial court regarding the evidentiary ramifications of such a refusal are both proper and warranted.

Where the undisputed evidence shows that a Spanish-speaking suspect spoke some English, did communicate with the arresting officer, and effectively withdrew his consent, an instruction that an uncommunicative suspect is incapable of withdrawing his consent by refusing to submit to a state-administered test would not be adjusted to the evidence. Furthermore, an instruction that the suspect's refusal can be considered as evidence creating an inference that the test would show the presence of alcohol or drugs is proper where the jury is also instructed that the inference is rebuttable and where the suspect is allowed to attempt to rebut it with evidence that he did not understand the implied consent notices.

It should be noted that the arresting officer's failure without cause to read the implied consent notice to the suspect at the time of his arrest renders evidence of the suspect's refusal to take the state-administered test inadmissible. Furthermore, an arresting officer's failure to comply with the statutory requirements for conveying the implied consent notice to a hearing-impaired suspect would entitle the suspect to refuse to take the state-administered test, and the admission of the suspect's justified refusal would constitute reversible error. Also, if the implied consent notice given to a suspect in its totality contains inaccurate, misleading, and/or inapplicable information, such that the suspect is thereby deprived of making an informed choice under the implied consent statute, the suspect's refusal to take to the state-administered test is rendered inadmissible.

Even if the implied consent notice given to the suspect correctly informs him of his rights, a subsequent misleading explanation of those rights would still make it impossible for the suspect to make an informed decision under the implied consent statute. Furthermore, even if the officer did not intend to mislead, if the suspect is misled or misinformed as to his rights, his ability to make an informed decision would be impaired, thereby rendering evidence of his refusal to take the state-administered test inadmissible.

Under the Georgia Supreme Court's current construction of § 40-5-55(a), consent is implied only if a person has been arrested for a violation of § 40-6-391 or if a person has been involved in a traffic accident resulting in serious injuries or fatalities and the investigating officer has probable cause to believe that the person was violating § 40-6-391. Consequently, where there has been no traffic accident resulting in serious injuries or fatalities, the suspect must be arrested before he can be deemed to have given consent to have a chemical test performed to determine the presence of alcohol or other drugs. The existence of mere probable cause to arrest is not sufficient. Thus, even where there was probable cause to arrest for a violation of § 40-6-391, an implied consent notice given to a suspect several days prior to his arrest for DUI could in no way be considered contemporaneous to that arrest and would therefore be inappropriate. Under these circumstances, the suspect's refusal to submit to a chemical test would be warranted, and evidence of this refusal would be inadmissible at trial.

The law does not require an officer to ensure that a suspect be provided an environment free from a non-state actor's "bad advice" when deciding whether to cooperate with a properly administered implied consent notice, especially when that advice does not inure to the state's benefit and especially when the suspect is equally free to ignore such advice. Thus, an officer's act of placing a contentious suspect in the backseat of his patrol car with another suspect would not provide a sufficient basis for suppression of the other suspect's subsequent refusal to submit to chemical testing, absent any allegation and evidence of defect in the implied consent notice and absent any allegation and evidence that the other suspect did not understand his rights under the notice.

Absent a showing of bad faith or a constitutional violation, an officer's misrepresentation to a suspect that the arrest is being videotaped does render evidence of the suspect's refusal to submit to a blood test inadmissible.

In 2005, the Georgia Supreme Court held in State v. Collier that an officer did not have the authority to seek a search warrant to compel a person to submit blood and urine samples for drug testing when that person had invoked his right under the implied consent law to refuse such testing. Section 40-5-67.1(d) plainly required that if an individual did not consent to the designated chemical test, then no test was to be administered. This precluded any discretion on the part of the officer to attempt to obtain such testing. Furthermore, the legislatively-created sanctions for refusing such testing did not include being compelled to submit to testing through the use of a search warrant.

In 2006, apparently disapproving of this construction of the statute, the General Assembly enacted a provision that legislatively overrules the Supreme Court's decision in Collier. This provision states that nothing in § 40-5-67.1 should be deemed to preclude the acquisition or admission of evidence of a violation of § 40-6-391 if obtained by voluntary consent or a search warrant as authorized by the constitution or laws of this state or the United States. Because this amendment, which took effect in July 2006, is not merely a procedural or evidentiary change but one eliminating a defendant's substantive right to refuse to submit to testing, it should not be applied retroactively.

Where the prosecution has been prevented from presenting evidence concerning the defendant's refusal to take a blood test, it is proper for the trial court to exclude comment by defense counsel on the inability of the prosecution to present evidence of an alcohol test. It would be manifestly unfair to prevent the prosecution from presenting this evidence and at the same time comment on the prosecution's failure to do so.

Where evidence of the defendant's refusal to submit to the state-administered test has been admitted at trial, the prosecution may argue in closing that the defendant's refusal shows that he was conscious of his impairment and guilt. It would be a reasonable inference for the prosecution to make that the defendant's refusal stemmed from a fear that the results would be unfavorable.

In all cases where the arrest is made on or after January 1, 1995, and the state selects breath testing, two sequential breath samples must be requested for the testing of alcohol concentration. No more than two sequential series of a total of two adequate breath samples each shall be requested by the state. However, after an initial test in which the instrument indicates an adequate breath sample was given for analysis, any subsequent refusal to give additional breath samples cannot be construed as a refusal for purposes of suspension of a driver's license. A refusal to give an adequate sample or samples on any subsequent breath, blood, urine, or other bodily substance test does not affect the admissibility of the results of any prior samples. Where the suspect does provide an adequate breath sample as defined in the statute, his failure or refusal to provide a second adequate breath sample does not constitute a complete refusal to submit to the state-administered test. Thus, any evidence regarding the failure or refusal to provide the second breath sample is inadmissible.

g. Discovery of Test Results

The discovery rule regarding chemical tests in DUI cases grants the defendant access to "full information concerning the test." Under this rule, the results generated by the use of a gas chromatograph to test the blood alcohol content of the defendant's blood are discoverable. Thus, the defendant has the right to subpoena the printed results generated by the gas chromatograph for the purpose of cross-examination, and if the subpoena is not unreasonable and oppressive, it may not be quashed by the trial court.

A request for blood test results from the state must be timely made. The state must provide the defendant the actual test results, and the omission of these results from the forensic laboratory reports supplied to the defense by the state constitutes reversible error. When a written scientific report is furnished late, the appropriate remedy is not for the trial court to exclude the results of the test but to grant a continuance or recess upon timely request by the defendant.

Where the arresting officer has provided the defendant with a copy of his breath test results at the time the tests were administered, any failure by the state to provide the same pursuant to the defendant's discovery request for any written scientific reports is harmless.

